A similar presentation was made to the American School at Lovetch, at the Commencement exercise, by American Minister.

AN OUTSTANDING EVENT

The most outstanding observance, according to the American Minister, was the civic meeting honoring Washington, organized under the auspices of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences. Mr. Shoemaker referred to this institution in his official dispatches as "a very dignified and influential organization, which received the direct patronage of the former Tzar Ferdinand for many years, the Tzar being noted for his scientific attainments and the broad scope of his learning." The sponsorship of a Washington ceremony by such an organization was declared to be an unusual honor to a foreign patriot.

This celebration was held in the great hall of the Academy at Sofia, beginning at 11 o'clock on the morning of February 28, and, as remarked by Mr. Shoemaker, "the report that the King expected to be present helped to draw a large and representative audience." The King, accompanied by Prince Cyril, and members of the palace staff, the Prime Minister and his Cabinet, practically all the Council of Ministers and almost all living former Ministers, as well as members of the diplomatic corps, and leaders in military, political, educational, literary, social and financial circles of Sofia were in attendance.

Quoting again from the dispatch of the American Minister:

The meeting was opened by Professor Meletitch, President of the Academy, and the discourse on Washington's career and ideals, delivered by Dr. Peef, Secretary of the Academy, was very well received. After the meeting the King expressed to me his personal congratulations on the Bicentennial.

BULGARIAN AMERICAN PROGRAM

Regarding the public George Washington celebration conducted by the Bulgarian-American Society on February 27, the American Minister says:

This organization is an amalgamation of a group of institutions in Sofia, friendly to the United States. . . . The Washington meeting held by the organization in the Teachers' Fund Hall completely filled the place, principally with professors, business men and army officers; and the address in Bulgarian by Dr. Chacaroff, associate editor of the BULGARIAN BRITISH REVIEW, much on the same lines as Dr. Peef's discourse before the King at the meeting of the Academy of Sciences, created much enthusiasm, as did a brief talk on Washington and Bulgarian-American Unity by the President of the Society, Professor Yanuloff of the Free University.

Mr. Chacaroff later embodied the principal part of his address in a pamphlet, entitled "The Great Work of George Washington—The Founder of the United States of America," which he calls, in a letter to the Director of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, "a modest contribution towards the everlasting glory of America's Man of Men"; and which, he says, was "written with enthusiasm and deep appreciation of Washington's driving personality and solid, granite-like character." In closing this letter Mr. Chacaroff expresses the hope that the pamphlet and other articles from his pen will "give an idea how Washington is appreciated in the small Balkan country named Bulgaria."

The following excerpts, translated from the BULGARIAN, set forth the spirit and the letter of Mr. Chacaroff's contribution and, indeed, the Bulgarian attitude with respect to George Washington and the United States. The first part of the booklet consists of biographical details of Washington's life and a brief history of America in Washington's day, after which it continues:

The history of Humanity knows many great men; they were great generals, statesmen, authors, philosophers, industrialists and organizers with exceptional gifts, but its annals rarely mention men whose achievements and all-round development were linked with high virtue, humanity, simplicity and democracy.

Washington's personality was elevated far above that of the average, ordinary, every-day man. "His honor," said Jefferson, "was so pure, his integrity so invincible, that his decisions were never influenced by self-interest or hatred, or by the bonds of relationship or friendship. He was truly a wise, good and great man in the fullest sense of the words."

"I can set no bounds to the excellence of his virtues. All his opinions were correct; all his acts were just," said Pickering. Tilghman added: "Washington was the most honorable man who ever graced humanity."

Owing to his granite character, virtues and qualities, Washington enjoyed the full confidence of all his fellow-countrymen. For them, he was perfect, wise and just as were none of his contemporaries.

When war with France seemed inevitable in 1798, Adams, who was then President of the United States, wrote to Washington, who had then retired to his plantation: "We need your name, if you will let us use it, for it will strengthen us more than a whole army." And Jefferson wrote him: "The confidence of the whole Nation centers in you."

Washington was extraordinarily democratic, sociable, magnanimous and humane. The fact that he was President and occupied the highest position in the United States did not prevent him from talking and associating in a natural, frank and simple manner with the most humble, and even with slaves. For instance, Washington was once out walking with an aristocrat when a Negro passed them and politely saluted Washington. The latter returned the salutation with even greater politeness and elegance. The aristocrat, astonished, asked why Washington had returned the salutation of a slave so kindly, and the latter replied that he could not let a Negro excel him in politeness.

Every one who came in contact with him or who had the pleasure of knowing him intimately came to trust him and be fond of him. Nevertheless, he really had enemies; these consisted of those who could not understand him, those who had a grudge against him, due to envy or hatred, and those who, though they respected him, were opposed to some of his acts. Most of the people, however, had a deep love and devotion for him; for them he was a national hero, who inspired them with his deeds, character and great humanity. Every one who approached him with sincerity was greatly impressed and left him with feelings of the deepest respect and love.

The private correspondence of Washington is filled with tender expressions of frank and sincere friendship. The extract quoted from a letter of Lafayette, the French nobleman who actively participated in the Revolutionary War and became Washington's friend during the struggle, shows that he occupied a high place in the hearts of his countrymen. After his return to France, he wrote Washington a letter, in which he said, among other things:

"I never expect to have the inexpressible satisfaction of greeting you in my home and welcoming you into my family, which idolizes you, but I shall surely return to Mount Vernon to renew the memories of past days. I intend to visit my friend beyond the Atlantic from time to time—the best friend that I have ever had or ever shall have. . . . The great distance that separates us from each other causes my heart inexpressible pain. All the feelings that can be inspired by rapture, respect, gratitude, friendship and filial love, unite in my heart to make me revere you with the utmost tenderness. In your friendship I find a joy that cannot be expressed in words."

Washington was very hospitable. His house was open to all, from the richest to the poorest. There were always guests at his table, and he welcomed and parted from them with the utmost sincerity. He treated all with equal respect and forgot or overlooked no one in his will; he gave to each of those who had surrounded him according to their services and necessities. All his life he was guided by a deep sense of justice. He rendered to each what he had earned, but he would not help the idle and was as severe and exacting toward his nearest relatives of this type as toward others.

Washington was an unusually enterprising and industrious man. He never thought himself better than others. In his eyes, everyone was an equal. His humility and democratic spirit are known to all. He never considered physical labor degrading; on the contrary, he regarded it as necessary and did some work of this kind throughout his life. During the Revolutionary War, some soldiers were once trying to carry a great tree which they could hardly lift from the ground. A freedman was nervously giving them orders without trying to help them. At this time a high officer came along, jumped off his horse and helped the soldiers carry the tree. He then turned to the freedman and asked him why he had not helped them himself. The latter replied, "I am a freedman." "I am George Washington," said the officer, "we will meet in your commander's quarters."

Washington insisted on strict discipline, order and punctuality. Requiring much from himself, he was equally exacting in regard to the conduct and obligations of others. When his secretary excused himself for repeatedly coming late to work on the ground that his watch was slow, Washington replied: "Either you must get a new watch or I a new secretary."

Washington's honor and truthfulness are proverbial in the United States. It is said that he never told a lie, even when he was a boy. Straightforward, frank and courageous, he never shrank from responsibility. Firm in his decisions, wise and inspiring in his counsels, stern toward men's weaknesses but frankly rejoicing in their virtues, he was firm and unyielding in his opinions and ideas. He faced the failures and sufferings of his life with patience, energy and persistence, and possessed a will with which he surmounted and endured all the difficulties and misfortunes encountered in the performance of his duty. It was this trait that elevated the character of Washington above that of any of his contemporaries.

Henry Van Dyke says: "Washington doubtless greatly surpassed his contemporaries in inborn talent. He was perhaps less brilliant than some, less eloquent than others, but he possessed rare mental power, so that he was later called by Lowell 'an imperial man.' His exhaustless energy and great ability, his sound nerves, which endured the strain of his anger, the invincible courage with which he met risks that were necessary and the wisdom with which he avoided those that were not, the calm certainty with which he accepted great ideas, and the persistence with which he attended to all details, the greatness of his mind, the depth of his convictions, the strength he showed in applying great principles and ideas to ordinary matters, and particularly his power to rise above the prejudices and illusions of the day—all these gifts place Washington at an enviable height."

Washington's moral qualities were the greatest that he possessed, and his success and fame were due to them. The hearts of his countrymen were deeply impressed by his evident magnanimity, and they had extraordinary confidence in him. No one suspected him for a moment of being guided by self-interest, or believed him capable of using others for his own advancement or of plundering them for his own enrichment." This magnanimity of his led the most highly respected men to trust him absolutely, both in war and peace, as a man who never, under any conditions, would forget his duties or responsibilities.

Henry Van Dyke says: "Would you know the depth and strength of the godlike flame that burned in his breast, you must turn back to the bitterly cold and gloomy days of the Valley Forge campaign and observe his willingness to make sacrifices in the presence of frightful difficulties in order to relieve the situation of his people."

Chateaubriand said that he saw Washington but once but that he had inspired his whole life.

Lord Erskine addressed Washington with these words: "You are the only man for whom I have great respect."

Charles James Fox called Washington in the English House of Commons a marvellous man before whom all other great men paled to insignificance.

Orison Swett Marden says: "Can you, after losing such a battle, conquer, like Washington, by your strength of character?"

Gladstone called Washington the purest figure in history, adding: "If I were asked to name, among all the public men of history respected for their nobility and purity of character, the one most worthy of honor, my choice would fall upon Washington."

And Fisher Ames said: "He changed mankind's ideas of political greatness. We gaze with wonder at such eccentric characters as Alexander the Great, Caesar, Cromwell, Frederick the Great and Napoleon, but when Washington's countenance appears, mankind cries instinctively, 'This is the man for nations to trust and revere, and for rulers to follow.'"

Washington was the personification of the complete man and citizen. The United States owes its existence to his strength of character, unsurpassed honor and devotion to the cause which he served, and he is rightly called "the father of his country," to which he gave all, receiving nothing in return. During the entire period of his public service, Washington lived on his own private income.

This is why the American people cherish Washington's memory with deep respect and reverence. He is their national hero and protector, and their imagination has created many legends and tales about his bravery, wisdom and manly worth. He occupies a leading place in the history of the United States. His name typifies all the virtues and high qualities of mankind, and is the synonym for all that is finest in the man and citizen. For the first time, perhaps, we find fulfilled the saying of Whitman, that the citizen who is noblest in mind and character shall be the leader of his people. Every American, rich or poor, learned or illiterate, reverences the memory of Washington.

When the corner-stone of the Washington Monument was laid on July 4, 1848, Robert Winthrop said: "Raise this Monument, if you will, to the heavens,—you cannot elevate it above his principles; lay a foundation of eternal rock—you cannot build anything more enduring than his fame; carve it out of the purest Parian marble—you can create nothing purer than his life."

Webster said, in one of his speeches on Washington: "America has given to the world the character of Washington, and if it had made no other contribution to our American institutions, this alone would suffice to win the respect of humanity."

No American poet has written a poem on Washington and failed to sing his strong and comprehensive spirit. Most characteristic of all, however, is what Byron wrote about him; he addressed Washington with powerful words as the first, last and best of men, whom Envy dared not hate and whose name was handed down by Providence to make men blush because there was none other like him:

Where the Wearied eye repose
When gazing on the great,
Where neither guilty glory glows,
Nor despicable state.

Yes, one—the first, the last, the best,
The Cincinnatus of the West,
Whom Envy dared not hate—
Bequeathed the name of Washington,
To make men blush, there was but one.

Great men are a people's heritage; they are its capital—its flesh and blood. They are its glory and pride and the eternal source of inspiration and of faith in its high destiny. But these great men do not belong to their native land alone, for their fame extends far beyond its boundaries. Their spirit is absorbed into the common, universal spirit of humanity. Their achievements and qualities give worth and dignity to all peoples, great and small, which, during their development, are willing to learn from them and be inspired by them.

Washington's fame long ago crossed the ocean and spread throughout every country in the world. We, who have been independent for 50 years, but who are united by racial ties with 2,000,000 of our brothers living under a foreign yoke, have much to learn from the great character of Washington. Our struggle for freedom and justice that has lasted until to-day has caused us to partake of the spirit of that great man who conquered less by arms than by his integrity, strength of will and unconquerable spirit—the only weapons that we can now use in remedying the great sufferings we have been compelled to undergo in these troublous times.

May we then, inspired by the character, qualities and deeds of this great man who founded a new, great and strong country, democratic and free, make our own people happy and prosperous through the exercise of the same indomitable will and courage, the same enthusiasm and joy in living, the same faith and self-reliance, feeling that Justice is on our side and that the dawn of its day shall chase away the darkness of the disappearing night, so that we may know that spiritual strength is invincible.

The achievements of George Washington will forever remain the glory and pride of his native land; they will inspire future generations in all the nations of the world to greater deeds and to victories of the spirit, to greater wisdom and a more intelligent life.

Washington had a mind, but he also had a heart, a will and a character. He was the greatest of the great and the most modest of the modest. He was a self-made man, and the maxim "I will find a way or make one" was one to which his enterprising and pioneering spirit was well attuned. As a man and statesman he stands in a class by himself—the class of humanity's elect. Washington's heart, will and character are his bequest to future generations. His spiritual image, bright and pure, shall abide to-day, to-morrow and forever in the hearts of all who are and shall be inspired by the deeds, life and character of this man, who, throughout his life, was strong and complete, great and unconquerable, wise and beloved.

ENGLISH SPEAKING LEAGUE MEETING

The George Washington meeting of the English-Speaking League of Sofia on March 2 drew the largest attendance of any meeting ever held by this organization and those present listened attentively to a very interesting talk in English on the life of George Washington by Dr. F. H. Black, president of the American College at Simeonovo, near Sofia. Among those in attendance were Mr. Sydney Waterlow, the British Minister, and members of his staff.

The celebration at the American College packed the large assembly hall to its full capacity with an enthusiastic audience. The address in Bulgarian by Hon. Grigor Vassileff, a deputy, former Minister of Agriculture, and one of the ablest orators in Bulgaria, who is a warm friend of the United States and was a "prospective candidate" for Bulgarian Minister to this country, touched on the character and ideals of George Washington. The address was based largely on impressions gained by the speaker from reading Bernard Fay's recent French work on Washington, and made a profound impression on the audience.

An all-American musical radio program was given for the first time in Bulgaria when a special George Washington Bicentennial repertoire was broadcast by the Rodno Radio Association of Sofia during the evening of March 5. Former Minister Vassileff repeated his address in an abridged form and the members of the staff of the American Legation and the choir of the American College supplied the music.

"Just after the broadcast," the American Minister wrote, "a telephonic message was received at the studio from a member of His Majesty's staff, saying that King Boris had listened in from his hunting lodge in the Rhodope Mountains, and was greatly pleased with the program."

The remarks of Mr. Shoemaker, who introduced Mr. Vassileff to the radio audience, were as follows:

Bulgarian friends, unseen but none the less dear; it was very opportune to have received this invitation to speak to the citizens of this beautiful and hospitable country, as I wanted to express to them the thanks of the American people for the very generous and spontaneous manner in which Bulgaria has observed the two-hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. It has been such an outstanding commemoration, in which all parts of your country have participated, that it has impressed me deeply as a tangible proof of the sincere friendship which exists between the two countries, Bulgaria and the United States.

I am sure that no country, and least none so far distant from the United States, has shown a more splendid spirit than Bulgaria at the time of our great patriotic celebration. I thank you all for this widespread recognition accorded to the memory of the father of our country. I wish to also convey to you at this time my personal appreciation of the many kindnesses received by myself and family during our stay in Bulgaria.

I came here anticipating to find much that would prove agreeable and congenial, but it has exceeded my fondest expectations. The wonderful scenery of mountains, lakes and rivers, the varied wild animal and bird life, the battlefields where the Liberation was won, the antiquities, the Black Sea, the art, literature, and music have been most enjoyable, but my heart has been touched by the cordial and hospitable spirit of the Bulgarian people. I think that Bulgaria is meeting well her problems in the world crisis, and her sturdy self-reliance will cause her to be one of the very first to emerge from it.

I hope that as time progresses there will be even closer relations between Bulgaria and the United States, as the American people are eager to know about Bulgaria, and when conditions improve I trust that arrangements can be worked out to make American tourist travel to Bulgaria far more extensive than it has been in the past. I know they will benefit by coming here.

But I will not detain you longer, as you have great treats in store; the singing and playing of real American music by our great composers, and a chance to hear again His Excellency Grigor Vassileff's philosophic address on the character and ideals of Washington, which so delighted his great audience at Simeonovo last Sunday.

MASONIC OBSERVANCE HELD

The Masonic Lodges of Sofia convened in a joint meeting on March 15, 1932, to do honor to George Washington, the great American Mason. The American Minister was invited to participate as the chief speaker of the evening. Mr. Shoemaker reported his remarks on this occasion as follows:

BROTHERS: It is a great honor and privilege to meet with this fine group of Brothers of the Craft to observe the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Brother George Washington. I feel that I am here in three capacities, as representative of the United States, as a Mason, and as a Member of George Washington's Lodge. There never was a better exemplification of the ideals of Free Masonry than Brother George Washington's life. He was a lifelong Mason. At the age of twenty, in 1752 he took the first and second degrees at the Lodge at Fredericksburg, Virginia, and the Master's Degree at the time of his twenty-first birthday, some months before he started for the Indian Country to warn the French out of Ohio and Western Pennsylvania. The traditions of Masonry were constantly before him during his stirring campaigns on the frontier.

After the close of the French and Indian War, he became even more active in the Craft, and was made Master of Alexandria Lodge. He was always regular in his attendance, and zealous for the welfare of the Order. In 1789 when he was in New York City as President of the United States, New York was then the capital, he was made an honorary member of Holland Lodge No. 8, of which it is my great joy to be a Life Member. Baron von Steuben, and other brother officers of the Revolution were present at the first meeting he attended. In the rooms of Holland Lodge Washington's Masonic apron is preserved, as well as the book with his signature on the Roll of Members. One of his last portraits show him attired in the regalia of a Master Mason. Throughout his long career Brother George Washington lived as a Mason should; the cardinal principles of the Order were the rules of his life.

Free Masonry honors itself in honoring the memory of Brother George Washington, whose love of the Order, and strict adherence to its splendid traditions and observances has made his name another landmark in the ancient and honorable history of the Craft.

In behalf of the United States and for the American Free Masons I thank the Bulgarian Masons for their magnificent tribute to George Washington's Memory.

SPECIAL ENVOYS OF KING BORIS

His Majesty King Boris dispatched official envoys to the American Legation in Sofia on the morning of February 22, 1932, the two hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth. Speaking of this graceful gesture, the American Minister says:

The ceremonial visit to the Legation of two representatives of the King, and the Prime Minister, Mr. Mooshanoff, accompanied by the Secretary General of the Foreign Office, Mr. Radeff, and the Chief of Protocol, Mr. Poulieff, on the morning of Washington's Birthday, proved to be a pleasant and informal occasion; the visitors remained over an hour talking on the greatness of Washington, and the friendly feeling which exists between Bulgaria and the United States.

At the same time calls were received from Mr. Cora, Italian Minister, and Mr. Maxa, Czechoslovak Minister. Personal letters or cards of congratulation were received from all of the Ministers in Sofia, as well as from Monsignor Stephen, Metropolitan of Sofia, Monsignor Roncalli, Papal Delegate at Sofia, members of the Government, heads of schools, private citizens and organizations, journalists and others. The Legation responded personally to all of these felicitations. Mr. Maxa, the Czechoslovak Minister, who is a warm admirer of Washington, attended all of the ceremonies in Sofia.

SPECIAL INSTRUCTIONS TO SCHOOLS

A mark of official recognition of the Bicentennial, duplicated in but few countries, was accorded the George Washington Year in Bulgaria by the Bulgarian Government, through the office of the Minister of Public Instruction. On February 20, this office dispatched to all secondary schools in Bulgaria a notice, calling upon the directors "to reserve the last hour of one of the school days of next week for a lecture to be delivered by the teachers of history on George Washington, the man and the patriot." The full text of this circular follows:

MINISTRY OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION

FEBRUARY 20, 1932.

Circular to the Directors of Secondary Schools.

The 22nd of February, 1932, is the bicentenary of the birth of George Washington, the great leader in the struggle for the independence of the United States, one of the creators of its democratic Constitution and the first President of the independent American Republic.

Keen intellect, perseverance, strong character and above all immense love for freedom and for his country are the characteristic features of this great son of the powerful America of today. Born the 22nd of February, 1732, in Virginia, he was given an excellent education by his intelligent mother, his father having died early. Having devoted himself to farming his estate, he soon gained the affection and respect of his fellow-citizens and when the conflict between England and its colonies in North America broke out, he, at the age of only forty-two, was elected a delegate to the General Congress held in Philadelphia in 1774. There he soon became prominent among the other delegates. In 1776 together with Jefferson, Franklin and others he took part in the drafting of the famous "Declaration of Independence" the principles of which are penetrated by the spirit of the French literature of the Eighteenth century and which later, became the foundation of the American Constitution and of the famous French "Declaration of the rights of man and citizen." These principles have been throughout the Nineteenth century the flag of the nations in their struggle for freedom and democracy.

Owing to his merits George Washington was elected by the Congress in 1775 Commander in Chief of the Army in the war with England. After a war of eight years, the different phases of which are well-known, right finally prevailed over force, and the success was due chiefly to George Washington, to his energy and diplomacy.

When, in 1783, the war was over, Washington parted cordially from his war-companions and like the ancient Roman Dictator Cincinnatus, laid down his arms, resumed the garb of farmer and retired to his estate in the country.

However, George Washington did not spend all his force in the liberation of his country. His experience was needed when a solid form of government was to be worked out for the new State. All know the liberal Constitution which the United States adopted and which with a few amendments is still in force. When the Constitution was passed, the Congress unanimously entrusted Washington with the rudder of government by electing him the first President of the Republic. During that period, when dissensions and disagreements endangered the unity of the United States, George Washington showed his high moral qualities. With patience and tactfulness he succeeded in restoring order and understanding and in leading the ship of state out of stormy and dangerous waters into a quiet haven. Washington was reelected for a second term at the expiration of which he refused reelection and retired to private life. He died at sixty-seven years of age and the vacancy left by his death was deeply felt by his fellow-countrymen. There was general and sincere grief at the loss of the "Father of the Country."

Many monuments have been erected to his memory in the United States and the capital of the country has been given his name.

Today one hundred million Americans will celebrate during eight months (February to November) the memory of their greatest genius who was "the first in war, the first in peace and the first in the hearts of his countrymen" and will remain first in the hearts of their descendants.

At that time we Bulgarians were awakening from a secular sleep in slavery and the glorious fight for freedom of the freedom-loving American citizens has contributed partly and indirectly through the French revolution to our own national renaissance. We consider it therefore a duty to pay a well-merited tribute to Washington by pointing out to our pupils the virtues and merits of the great American and the modest man. Among other means by pointing out his ideals and life as an example to be followed we will help our youth in the present moral crisis it is passing through.

The Ministry of Public Instruction instructs you therefore, Mr. Director, to reserve the last hour of one of the school days of next week to a lecture to be delivered by the teachers of history on George Washington, the man and the patriot.

SECRETARY GENERAL: DR. S. DONEFF.
CHIEF OF SECTION: S. MINKOFF.

BULGARIAN CULTURE IS AMERICAN

Newspapers throughout Bulgaria were filled with favorable editorial comments and lengthy articles eulogizing the character and achievements of Washington, the American Minister reported. He continued:

At the close of the radio program while he was speaking of the cordial Bulgarian reaction to the Washington Bicentennial, Mr. Ivan Popoff, Director of the Press Bureau of the Sofia Foreign Office, said:

"The reason why Bulgaria was so quick to respond to the Washington commemoration is that the culture of Bulgaria is American; we feel the same patriotic appeals the Americans do. The first of our young men to break loose from the eastern surveillance over our education were those who went to Robert College at Constantinople where they were immersed in a purely American ideal of education.

"It was there that they realized the glorious spirit of Washington, and national freedom, and after graduating returned to their homes to incite the patriotic movement which resulted in the various uprisings and our eventual liberation.

"Bulgarians see the figure of liberty through American eyes and we are one with the United States in the background of our culture and national aspirations. It seemed just as natural to us to respond to the Washington Bicentennial observance as if it had been for one of our own national heroes; or as an aged former Minister and Robert College graduate expressed it, as he left the meeting at the Academy of Sciences: 'The name of Washington has been dear to my heart ever since as a boy of eight I was given a small biography of him, every word of which was precious to my youthful mind and imagination.'"

SWEDEN

STOCKHOLM, FEBRUARY 21, 1932.

PRESIDENT OF UNITED STATES
WASHINGTON

IN THE NAME OF THE KING AND ON MY OWN BEHALF I BEG TO EXPRESS TO YOU BEST WISHES ON THE OCCASION OF THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF
GEORGE WASHINGTON.

IN THE ABSENCE OF THE KING,

GUSTAF ADOLF.

This message was supplemented by the following expression from His Excellency Mr. W. Boström, Swedish Minister to the United States, to Secretary of State Stimson:

Washington, D. C., February 22, 1932.

SIR:

On the occasion of the two-hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington I have been requested to offer to the Government and the people of the United States my Government's sincere congratulations.

In adding hereto my personal congratulations to Your Excellency, I have the honour to remain, Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

(Signed) W. BOSTRÖM.
Minister of Sweden.

In this manner did the Government and the people of Sweden express to the Government and people of the United States their interest in the nine months' celebration honoring George Washington on the two hundredth anniversary of his birth.

In Sweden the Bicentennial Celebration was concentrated in Stockholm where the principal observance took place on February 22, 1932, at the Town Hall under the sponsorship of four leading American organizations in that country. This was the most stately and impressive affair ever carried out by the Americans in Stockholm.

Among the 1,250 persons who assembled in the "Blue Hall" of the Town Hall were Their Royal Highnesses The Crown Prince of Sweden, The Crown Princess and Prince Sigvard, His Excellency The Minister of Foreign Affairs and Baroness Ramel, Count von Stedingk, the members of the diplomatic corps, and many from Stockholm society of both the Swedish and American groups.

The four organizations which sponsored the celebration were the American Club of Stockholm, the American Women's Club, the Swedish-American Society, and the Swedish-American Foundation.

The officers of these organizations formed a George Washington Bicentennial committee of which Hon. John Motley Morehead, the American Minister, was honorary chairman and Mr. John Ball Osborne, the American Consul-General, honorary vice chairman. The committee members of the four organizations were as follows: The American Club of Stockholm—Mr. Charles Melter, president; Mr. Lawrence J. McDonnell, vice president; Dr. William Borgström, member of the board, and Mr. Elis S. Hoglund, secretary; American Women's Club in Sweden—Mrs. Axel A:son Johnson, president; Mrs. Axel Appelberg, vice president; and Mrs. Ella Zadig, treasurer; the Swedish-American Society—Dr. Börje Brilioth, president; Count Nils von Rosen, treasurer; Mr. Nils Berglund, secretary; and Commercial Councilor Ragnar Sohlman, vice president; and the Swedish American Foundation—A. R. Nordvall, vice president; and Miss Eva Fröberg, secretary. The executive committee included Mr. Melter, Mrs. Johnson, Dr. Brilioth, and Miss Fröberg.

The Blue Hall where the meeting was held was decorated with American and Swedish flags. On the stage was the portrait of George Washington painted by Adolph Ulrik Wertmüller in Philadelphia in 1794. It was guarded by soldiers dressed in the uniform of the "drabanter" of the time of Charles XII.

The program was made up of speeches, music and the showing of the motion picture film, "The Life and Times of George Washington." The Royal Navy Band played the national airs of Sweden and America and furnished the music incidental to the picture. The film was greatly enjoyed by the audience as it was both instructive and entertaining.

CROWN PRINCE DELIVERS ADDRESS

A welcoming address was delivered in English by the Crown Prince and Mr. Morehead responded. Both addresses were enthusiastically received by the large audience and were broadcast by radio throughout Sweden. By special arrangement the Crown Prince's speech was also broadcast to the United States.

In his speech the Crown Prince dwelt upon the ties of friendship uniting the people of Sweden and the United States. His speech in full follows:

Ladies and Gentlemen:

The ties of friendship uniting Sweden with the United States of America are, I am happy to say, numerous and strong. In Stockholm alone there exist no less than four organizations which in their different ways are promoting good will and understanding between our two countries. It is but natural that these societies, whose names you will have found on your program, should have joined in a common effort to celebrate the Bicentennial Memorial of George Washington, the founder and father of that big country on the other side of the Atlantic, which for well-nigh a century has exercised such an attraction for the people of Sweden. I have been asked on behalf of the joint committee formed by these societies to welcome all who have answered their invitation to attend tonight.

When the other day I was walking about the exhibition rooms of our National museum my eye suddenly was attracted by a very beautiful marble bust, made by the great French sculptor of the 18th century Jean Antoine Houdon. It is perhaps the finest piece of sculpture in our museum. No wonder the artist was inspired by this model. For this eminent masterpiece represents no less a person than George Washington himself.

Only to look at this head, you at once feel what a truly noble character the person himself must have been. Dignity was one of his characteristics. But I for one have a strong feeling that George Washington must have been one of those men, whom you instantly feel you can trust, who inspires unlimited confidence. He was a leader of men such as there have been very few in the history of mankind. His services in building up his country are immeasurable. Those of his countrymen must indeed have been lucky, who were given the privilege to serve under him.

Swedes and Americans have several traits in common. One of the most conspicuous to my mind is that unlimited craving for national as well as personal independence, which I believe any outside observer will soon detect. George Washington to you Americans stands as a symbol of your independence, as a personification of the American nation itself. We on our side love our own independence more than anything else in the world. We therefore thoroughly understand the proud feelings of the American nation on this day of jubilation, and we heartily join with you in acclaiming the magnificent memory of your national hero.

There is another important reason why we in Sweden should take part in celebrating your national memorial today. Statistics, though often dull, are sometimes useful. In the case I am referring to, they reveal the rather amazing fact that something like one quarter of the Swedish race is now living within the boundaries of the United States of America. A good number of these are of course descendants of Swedish emigrants, but they must, I think, nevertheless be counted as belonging to our race. Practically all the Swedes in the United States of America have long ago become American citizens. And I was told over and over again, when I had the pleasure of visiting the United States of America a few years ago, that they are to be counted amongst your best citizens.

This is only as it should be. And it does not preclude the American citizens of Swedish descent from keeping a soft corner in their hearts for the country of their origin. This blood relation with the United States of America makes us take a keen interest in all that is going on over there.

But there are other reasons for this as well. Both the United States and Sweden are highly industrialized countries. In both there is a marked tendency to keep a very high standard of industrial equipment. Science in general and more especially the science of engineering are employed to the utmost for increasing production and for utilizing all natural resources of the country. Organizing production in the most efficient way for the purpose of saving manual labor and reducing cost seems to be an additional characteristic of modern society both here and over in the United States. In fact when one comes to think of it, many of these things which we now accept as a matter of course originally came to us from across the Atlantic together with that wonderful spirit of enterprise which forms such an outstanding feature in America's national character.

Perhaps it may not be a very popular thing to say just at the present moment, but nevertheless I firmly believe it to be true, that the countries of the world, economically speaking, all are interdependent. In fact they are much more closely dependent on one another than is generally admitted. Formerly we were more or less self-sustaining. Nowadays, if one country suffers, there will soon be a reaction on others, neighbors or not neighbors. There is in fact no limit as to the number of links which bind us all together. Communications of all kind, trade links, financial ties, cultural bonds, all these have brought us more closely together than ever before in the history of the world. This process is going on every day at an ever-increasing speed and it looks as if it were to go on indefinitely.

I am not going to try and describe to you how much nearer our two countries have come to one another in the course of the last 30 years. This I think is as obvious as it is gratifying, but more remains to be done. We can learn more from each other. We can learn from each others' success and we can equally learn from mutual mistakes. Even a word of criticism, if it is said in the true spirit of friendship, may be of considerable value.

On this day of rejoicing let us hope for a yet closer cooperation, for a yet better understanding and for a yet truer friendship between the United States of America and Sweden to the mutual benefit of both countries.

We in Sweden tender you of the great American nation, to which so many Swedes belong, on this your day of proud rejoicing all our warmest congratulations and the assurance of our deep and sympathetic understanding.

Mr. Morehead in responding spoke on "Sweden and the American Revolution." His complete speech follows:

It is a great honor and a great pleasure to have with us on this occasion His Royal Highness Prince Gustaf Adolf, Crown Prince of Sweden, and Her Royal Highness the Crown Princess.

We Americans are here tonight to join the Swedish-Americans and Swedes of Stockholm in paying homage to George Washington, to celebrate the 200th anniversary of the birth of the Father of his Country, to honor the man who contributed more than any man to the establishment of the United States as a free and independent nation.

It is peculiarly appropriate that we should have among us on this occasion His Royal Highness the Crown Prince, who represents the ruling family of the nation to which America owes the beginning of its history. One of the nations with which we have been at peace not only during the two hundred years since the birth of George Washington, but for all time. A nation which has played and is still playing an extensive and friendly rôle in the development of the new world, and particularly of that part of it which we know today as the United States.

Recorded American history starts with the expeditions to our shores of the Scandinavian Vikings. The first expedition of which we have any record being that made in the year 1000 A. D. under the leadership of Leif Ericson, called Leif the Lucky, son of Eric the Red. This was 492 years before Christopher Columbus. A statue of Leif Ericson to commemorate his expedition now stands in a park in Boston.

Another Viking expedition under the leadership of Thorfinn Karlsefne, founded a colony on American soil at about the same time, but after living three years in America, his party returned to Greenland because the Northmen were too few in number to withstand the attacks of the Indians. While Karlsefne was in America a son whom he named Snorre, was born about 1003 to him and his wife Gudrid, the widow of Thorstein, Leif Ericson's brother, according to the Vinland Saga. This was the first white child ever born in either America and as the saga tells us Karlsefne was partly of Swedish descent, it can be truthfully said that the first white person born in America in the entire Western Hemisphere in fact was of Swedish extraction. A statue of Karlsefne to commemorate this first white settlement on our shores was raised in Philadelphia in 1920. We have records of many other Scandinavian expeditions and people going to Vinland. In 1059 among others a bishop named Jon, who had preached in Iceland for four years, journeyed there. Thus, the speech used by the first white men in America was Scandinavian and it was in that tongue that the first teachings of Christ were uttered in the New World.

Getting down to a later date I will say for comparison that the first permanent settlement in America was made by the English at Jamestown in Virginia in 1607. The Mayflower brought the Pilgrims to Massachusetts in 1620.

It was in 1638 under a charter from the Great King Gustavus Adolphus himself that a party of Swedes bought land from the Indians when America was still a wilderness and established a colony in America which they called New Sweden (Nya Sverige). Their first permanent settlement was on the river Delaware, and they called it Fort Christina, the name later being changed to Wilmington. It is now a large and important city, being the seat of the powder and explosives industry in America. Thus the Swedes were the founders of the States of Delaware and Pennsylvania, and were among the earliest settlers of Maryland and New Jersey.

When at a most critical stage of the War of Independence Washington crossed the Delaware River with his army to attack the Hessians at Trenton who were hired by and were fighting for the British, the boats which bore his army across the river were manned by the descendants of the Swedes who had settled in the vicinity 140 years before and who had inherited and brought down from their forefathers the gifts and tradition of seamanship which have for all time been characteristic of the people of Sweden. But for their able assistance it is very doubtful that this expedition, all important to the cause of Independence, would have succeeded on that wild and snow-swept night of Christmas Eve 1776.

More than seventy men of Sweden, fired by zeal for the advancement of humanity to more free political opportunities, offered their military talents and training to General Washington. Their services were especially valuable and welcome because the young nation of America was poor in military experience, and whatever the hazardous undertakings assigned these soldiers from Sweden, the tasks were discharged in a manner to place their names indelibly on our military records.

One of them, Cork Raab, gave his life to the cause of American Independence, in the battle of Savannah. In the same battle, Baron Nordenskiöld, afterward a vice admiral in the Swedish Navy, received two wounds. Four of your brilliant military men shared in the ardors and in the glory of Washington's final victory at Yorktown: Count von Fersen, Aide to the French General Rochambeau, Colonel (afterward Count) von Stedingk, Baron von Fock and Magnus Daniel Palmquist.

Perhaps the most conspicuous of these was Count Johan Hans Axel von Fersen. This young Swede was in America only a short time, but during his brief stay here, his abilities and character won the favor of all with whom he was associated. He came to America with Rochambeau and was considered a Frenchman by the Americans and seldom does any writer make definite mention of his true nationality. Fersen was present at the first meeting of Washington and Rochambeau—acted as interpreter—and on one occasion was the medium through which a difference between the French and American commanders was satisfactorily adjusted. Washington himself respected the Count's abilities so highly that he intrusted him with the task of directing the embarkation of the allied troops at the Head of Elk in order to facilitate their transportation to the York peninsula.

The Duke de Lauzun paid tribute to Fersen's conduct at Yorktown. He said: "In all the operations where the fighting was intense, Fersen was present, now in the trenches and now in the midst of the attack and . . . he exhibited the most brilliant proofs of valor."

Next to Count von Fersen, the most distinguished Swedish officer to serve in the American Revolution was Baron Curt von Stedingk whose most important service was his participation in the Battle at Savannah. Here Stedingk was twice wounded, but he succeeded in covering the retreat of Washington's Army.

The premier patriotic society of America is the "Order of the Cincinnati." This was founded by the officers of the Revolutionary Army—as their Charter recites—to "perpetuate the remembrance of the war and the mutual friendships formed under the pressure of common danger." George Washington was an original member of the Society and its first President. Membership was limited to officers in the Revolutionary Army who had attained the rank of Captain or higher.

Two Swedish officers, Count von Fersen and Colonel von Stedingk, were honored for their brilliant and distinguished service to the American cause by election to membership in the Society of the Cincinnati.

I trust that I may be pardoned for saying right here that I am myself a direct descendant of Captain John Morehead who served under George Washington in the War for Independence as an officer in the Seventh North Carolina Continental Cavalry, and I am proud of membership in the Society of the Cincinnati by direct descent from him.

A Swedish naval officer, Adolf Frederik Peterson, also served throughout the entire American Revolution, first with the French and later in conjunction with the Spanish at the capture of Pensacola, Florida, May 8, 1781. There he commanded a brigade of artillery and saved his corps after it had been abandoned. He displayed such great courage, initiative and cool judgment, although severely wounded, that he was highly honored by both the Spanish and French and was knighted by the King of Sweden, Gustavus III, under the name of Rosensvärd, and was finally promoted to the rank of Read Admiral in the Swedish Navy.

A patriot Samuel Hanson by name, descendant of that famous family of Swedish descent presented to General Washington during the dark hours at Valley Forge 800 pounds sterling to provide shoes for his barefoot soldiers.

It was not alone in battle that Sweden and the Swedes rendered unforgettable service to the United States in the dark days of the struggle for independent existence, for Sweden was the very first nation in the world to recognize the independence of the United States, extending such recognition prior even to our own Declaration of Independence in 1776. Of all of the nations of the earth Sweden is, therefore, officially our oldest friend. The first treaty made between the United States and a neutral nation was our treaty with Sweden, April 3, 1783, and Benjamin Franklin termed Sweden "America's First Ally."

In connection with the signing of that memorable document, the Declaration of Independence, the name of John Morton, a descendant of a Swedish settler in New Sweden on the Delaware stands out with especial prominence. John Morton was a surveyor, a judge, a legislator, speaker of the Pennsylvania Assembly and delegate to the Continental Congress in 1776. At this Congress when the momentous question of actually severing relations with England by the overt act of signing and proclaiming the Declaration of Independence was considered, the delegates had come to a deadlock. There were 13 original colonies—hence the 13 stripes in our flag—six of these colonies as represented by their delegates had voted for the Declaration and six against it. Two of the five members of the Pennsylvania delegation had voted for it and two against it leaving the Pennsylvania delegation tied. John Morton, the fifth member of the Pennsylvania delegation, was too ill to attend the Congress. As the cause of the Declaration was deadlocked and hanging in the balance, they rigged up a litter borne between two horses and sent it to the home of John Morton and brought him to where the Continental Congress was in session. They carried him into the hall on the litter and he cast his vote for the Declaration, which was proclaimed on July 4, 1776, and thus he became the Man of Destiny. John Morton is one of the signers of the Declaration. In 1876 a memorial tablet was erected to him in Independence Hall, that famous building in Philadelphia in which Washington was chosen Commander-in-Chief of the Continental Armies and where John Morton cast his memorable vote, and the Declaration of Independence was adopted and the Liberty Bell is installed. Furthermore, a beautiful building was erected in his honor in Philadelphia, 1926-1929, and is called after him the John Morton Memorial.

Another distinguished patriot of the Revolutionary period of the same Swedish descent is John Hanson of Maryland, a grandson of a Colonel Hanson who died at the battle of Lutzen, 1632, fighting under the Great Gustavus Adolphus for the religious liberty of Europe. American writers are unanimous in extolling the virtues of John Hanson who filled one public and patriotic post after another until he was finally elected President of the United States in Congress Assembled and served as such from November 5, 1781, to November 5, 1782. As President of the Continental Congress he extended to General George Washington the official felicitations of Congress when Washington visited that body on November 28, 1781, shortly after the surrender of the British at Yorktown.

Each State in the American Union is permitted to erect two statues in Statuary Hall in the National Capitol at Washington.

Maryland, the home of John Hanson, did not forget his service, when it became her turn to select her two names. She chose as one of her two most illustrious sons John Hanson, whose statue was placed in the National Capitol, January 31, 1903.

Other distinguished members of the Hanson family were his brothers, Judge Walter Hanson, and the patriot Samuel Hanson mentioned above, and William Hanson who was Examiner General of the State, and his son, Alexander Contee Hanson, was an intimate of George Washington's and compiled the Laws of Maryland. A Miss Hanson married a member of the Stone family and became the mother of Thomas Stone, another signer of the Declaration of Independence.

The contributions of Swedes in these early days also extended to the realm of art. Gustavus Hesselius became the father of American painting, as he arrived in Philadelphia in 1711, twenty-one years before the birth of Washington and nine years before the Scotch painter, Smibert, the second artist of note in America.

Adolf Ulrik Wertmüller, a Swedish artist, born in 1751, moved to Philadelphia in 1795 and executed from life a portrait of Washington. Washington was then in his 64th year and it was during his second term of President that this portrait, was painted. This original portrait of Washington, painted from life by a great Swedish artist, is owned by the Swedish Government and kept in the official residence of the Minister for Foreign Affairs in Stockholm. Baron Ramel has very kindly loaned this portrait to us for this occasion and it is on exhibition in this Hall.

In religion and culture the Swedish colonial settlers took a prominent place. Of the three churches remaining from the Colonial Period before 1700 and which are still in regular use, two are Swedish, viz., Gloria Dei (Old Swedes), Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and the Trinity (Old Swedes) Church, Wilmington, Delaware, where from 1655 to 1760, that is even after Delaware was no longer a Swedish colony, the Swedish Government paid the salary of a Swedish clergyman. The third is the English St. Luke's Church, Isle of Wight County, Virginia.

Dr. Nils Collin, the last Swedish born rector of the old Swedes Church in Philadelphia, assisted the cause of the Revolution ably by his writing and personal influence. The Swedish language was used for Church services once a month by the descendants of the original settlers up to the time of Dr. Collins' death in 1831.

The Swedish language has been in constant use in America since the first settlement in 1638, because, before Dr. Collin died, a new and far greater wave of Swedish settlers than that of the first colony, had reached our shores and has in the last hundred years added more than two million souls to our race, and today in Chicago and Minneapolis, America has the third and fourth largest Swedish cities in the world.

There are now in the United States no less than 19 daily or weekly papers published exclusively in Swedish. There is one in Canada. There are now 1,193 Swedish Lutheran Churches in the United States and 290 in Canada where at least one service each church-day is held in the Swedish language.

The Civil War, 1861-1865, brought again to the front prominent Swedes or men of Swedish ancestry, Captain John Ericsson, born in Sweden in 1803, Admiral Dahlgren and his son, Colonel Dahlgren, General John Stolbrand, Colonel Oscar Malmberg, Colonel Hans Mattson, and many others.

John Ericsson's memory and his contribution to our nation was eloquently eulogized by President Calvin Coolidge and Your Royal Highness at the dedication of the Ericsson Monument in Washington, D. C., May 29, 1926.

As we are celebrating tonight the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington I am sure my people will wish me to extend thanks once again to the Swedish people for the aid that a number of her gifted and liberal men brought to General Washington during the eight years of his struggle for our Independence, and on this occasion I have attempted to enumerate some of the bonds which have united Sweden and the United States, not only during the time of George Washington, but also before and since the day of that Great Patriot.

In mentioning the ties which bind Sweden to America I would be remiss in my duty if I did not call attention to the Royal visit paid to America by Your Royal Highness in 1926. We have had other Royal visits from time to time but no Royal visitors to America have ever made a more pleasant, a deeper or more lasting impression than Your Royal Highness, and I speak both personally and officially when I say that all of my many countrymen in America and all of your many countrymen there are awaiting with great interest, eagerness and pleasant expectations the time when Your Royal Highnesses will return to America to pay your party call, to shake hands with us all around and say to us TACK FOR SIST!

THANKSGIVING DAY, 1932, IN STOCKHOLM. THE SWEDISH AMERICAN SOCIETY GAVE THIS DINNER IN HONOR OF GEORGE WASHINGTON TO MARK THE END OF THE BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION IN SWEDEN.

DESCENDANTS OF SWEDISH OFFICERS ATTEND

Immediately following the exercises in the Blue Hall about 450 persons, guests of Mr. and Mrs. Morehead, sat down to supper in the magnificent Golden Room of Town Hall. The evening closed with dancing in the galleries for which permission had been obtained by the committee.

An interesting feature of the meeting was the fact that the audience included descendants of those gallant Swedish officers who fought in the American Revolution. It will be remembered that among the charter members of the Order of the Cincinnati were two Swedish officers who fought through the Revolution. They were Count von Fersen, aide to the Marquis de Rochambeau, and Colonel, later Count von Stedingk. At the meeting on February 22 were a collateral descendant and a direct descendant of these two Swedish officers: Baroness Ramel, wife of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, whose ancestor was Count von Fersen's brother, and Count Hans von Stedingk, Chamberlain of the Swedish court, whose ancestor was Colonel von Stedingk. The latter, being the eldest male descendant of the original member of the society, holds the Order of the Cincinnati.

"This celebration," wrote Mr. Morehead in a report to the Secretary of State, "was a thoroughly appropriate and highly gratifying manifestation of the profound interest which the Swedish people have in America and the American people."

The press of Stockholm on the day following devoted much space to accounts of the celebration, as it had for months previous in giving the plans as they progressed toward fulfillment.

Mr. Morehead visited Washington in 1931 and called at the office of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. As one result of his visit two busts of George Washington were sent to Sweden by the Commission, one being placed in the office of the chancery of the American legation and the other presented to the Scandinavian-American Society, whose aim is closer relations between the United States and Sweden. This Society arranges the exchange of students and of professors between American and Swedish institutions of learning. Two full size reproductions of the Gilbert Stuart Athenaeum portrait of George Washington were also sent to the legation, as well as the historical and other literature published by the Commission, which Mr. Morehead distributed to the members of the committee in charge of the celebration.

THANKSGIVING DAY EXERCISES

Concluding the Bicentennial Celebration in Stockholm was the annual Thanksgiving dinner and celebration held in that city under the auspices of the Swedish-American Society. Among those in attendance were the Swedish Minister for Foreign Affairs, Richard Sandler, the President of the Swedish Olympic Games Committee, Mr. Edström, and the United States Minister to Sweden, John M. Morehead. The dinner consisted of turkey, cranberry sauce, sweet potatoes, and other typically American and seasonal dishes, and at the conclusion of the feast a short play was presented by members of the American colony. Dancing provided entertainment for the rest of the evening.

Brief and informal remarks were made by Foreign Minister Sandler, Mr. Edström and United States Minister Morehead. Each speaker referred appropriately to the significance and success of the Bicentennial Celebration as a means of more closely uniting Sweden and America. An especially interesting feature in connection with the celebration, which was carried out by the Swedish-American Gustavus Adolphus Committee, was referred to by Mr. Morehead when he spoke of the medal struck at the request of the committee to commemorate the 200th anniversary of Washington's birth and the 300th anniversary of the death of Gustavus Adolphus. The medal bore on one side the portrait of George Washington while that of Sweden's great leader appeared on the other.

The Bicentennial Celebration was received throughout Sweden with the same friendliness which has always characterized the relations of that country with the United States.

ALBANIA

THE George Washington Bicentennial spirit was awakened in the hearts of the million inhabitants of the Kingdom of Albania as early as October, 1931. "We must do something," was the sentiment of the people as voiced through the BESA, leading newspaper in Tirana, Albania, "the Bicentennial celebration will be as great and as impressive in the different parts of the world as in the United States. . . . It cannot be disputed that we must take part in such a celebration."

Continuing, the same newspaper stated:

We have many bonds of patriotic activity and financial interest with the United States. For us the United States has been a second fatherland, a rich field which helped us to maintain our families and from whose support we realized freedom for Albania. . . . America was the asylum which sheltered all those ruined by the Balkan War, and in that very America they were able to earn and return to the fatherland with new powers to rehabilitate the regions burned and ravaged. . . . From this celebration in honor of the memory of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington we are enabled to learn a lesson because we also have had patriots, apostles, and martyrs of our national sentiment. . . . We should pay attention to the two hundredth anniversary of Washington in order that we may profit by his example in the interest of our country and of humanity itself.

His Excellency Ahmed Zog, King of Albania, gave official expression of the sentiment in the hearts of his people with respect to George Washington in the following message to the President of the United States on the opening day of the Bicentennial:

TIRANA 77 22 1140

HIS EXCELLENCY
MR. HOOVER
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC
WASHINGTON

ON THIS MEMORABLE DAY OF THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF THE ILLUSTRIOUS PATRIOT, GEORGE WASHINGTON, WHO BY HIS COURAGE, PATRIOTISM, AND HIS GREATNESS OF SOUL, GAVE AN EXAMPLE OF MOST SUBLIME PATRIOTIC SELF-SACRIFICE, I OFFER IN THE NAME OF THE ALBANIAN PEOPLE AND MYSELF, ALL MY MOST SINCERE WISHES FOR THE PROSPERITY AND HAPPINESS OF THE NOBLE AMERICAN NATION AND OF YOUR EXCELLENCY.
ZOG (KING OF ALBANIA)

The Minister of Foreign Affairs, His Excellency H. Vrioni, also cabled greetings from the Albanian Government to the American Secretary of State, Hon. Henry L. Stimson, on February 22, 1932, as follows:

TIRANA

HIS EXCELLENCY MR. STIMSON
SECRETARY OF STATE OF THE UNITED STATES
WASHINGTON

AT THE MOMENT WHEN THE NOBLE AMERICAN PEOPLE ARE ENGAGED IN CELEBRATING THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE BIRTH OF THE ILLUSTRIOUS PATRIOT AND STATESMAN, GEORGE WASHINGTON, FATHER AND CREATOR OF THE UNITED STATES, WITH MAGNIFICENT COMMEMORATIVE CEREMONIES, I HAVE THE HONOR TO EXPRESS TO YOUR EXCELLENCY, IN THE NAME OF THE ROYAL GOVERNMENT, MY SINCEREST CONGRATULATIONS, AS WELL AS THE ARDENT WISHES WHICH I CHERISH FOR THE PROSPERITY AND GREATNESS OF YOUR CHIVALROUS NATION. PLEASE ACCEPT, EXCELLENCY, THE ASSURANCES OF MY HIGH ESTEEM.

H. VRIONI,
MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

On the morning of February 22, 1932, the Council of Ministers, led by their Excellencies the Prime Minister, Pandeli Evangheli, and members of his cabinet, crossed the threshold of the American Legation to express personally the felicitations of the Albanian government to the American Minister to Albania, Hon. Herman Bernstein. Mr. Bernstein mentions in his dispatch reporting this notable event that "a most important cabinet meeting under the presidency of the King was to be held that morning and that the King had postponed the meeting from 9.30 to 11.00 a. m. in order to enable the cabinet to visit the American Legation for the purpose of extending the Government's felicitations on Washington's birthday."

The BESA for February 24, 1932, says of the affair:

Toasts were exchanged between His Excellency the American Minister and the members of the cabinet, and Mr. Bernstein made laudatory remarks in honor of His Majesty the King, for our national hero Skanderbeg, and for the Cabinet of His Excellency Mr. Pandeli Evangheli. The Prime Minister replied in the following words:

"I thank Your Excellency for the laudatory sentiments toward His Majesty the King, our national hero, and the members of the Cabinet I have the honor to head. On the occasion of the two hundredth anniversary of George Washington's birth, we express our cordial wishes for the prosperity of the American people."

At the conclusion of this official call the doors of the Legation were thrown open to a general reception and celebration in honor of the day. The American Minister reports that more than two hundred guests attended this function, among whom were, in addition to several of the distinguished persons already mentioned, the entire diplomatic corps, the President of the Council of State, the President of the Parliament, the heads of various religious communities—Mussulman, Orthodox, and Catholic—deputies, prominent Albanians, members of foreign colonies, and most of the Americans in Tirana and nearby places.

A report of the event appeared in the ORA, a newspaper of Tirana, for February 23, 1932, part of which is reprinted:

The guests, and especially the Albanian guests, were happy to be present at the ceremony in memory of one of the world's greatest men—George Washington—the founder of the United States of America, who has many resemblances to our own national hero of centuries past, Skanderbeg.

At 11.20 the two reception rooms were full to capacity. It is customary to say that the "elite and choicest of Tirana" were present; but one lays himself open to criticism by making such a statement here. For the reason that as there was a council meeting under the presidency of His Majesty the King, none of the Ministers were present. Let us say, therefore, prudently that we saw yesterday at the American Legation the greatest majority of the most distinguished persons in Tirana, the aristocrats and the privileged bourgeoisie of big salons, a majority augmented also by the presence of heads of the religious sects: Mussulman, Orthodox and the Bektashi communities, including the Baba of Kruja accompanied by his two dervishes and by Messrs. A. Dibra and Javer Hurshidi.

The cordiality was real and it brightened the faces of all, and especially the Albanians, who had not brought with them any cares or political hypocrisy but came only with the affections they possess for the American people and with great respect for the memory of George Washington. . . .

The guests began numberless conversations. At this time, when every one conversed with whomsoever he desired, taking refreshments, the Legation's reception rooms seemed like the League of Nations, except that all present were in accord with each other. . . .

The brilliance of this beautiful gathering was increased by the arrival of 450 Technical School students, who expressed to Mr. Bernstein their wishes for the prosperity of America. They could not resist the opportunity to collect in the garden of the Legation to sing American anthems and to cheer for the prosperity of the people with whose culture they are being brought up so ably at the school directed by the distinguished American, Mr. Fultz. Their singing was so moving that it was noticed that Mr. Bernstein's eyes were full of joyful tears.

The American Minister made the principal address of the occasion, which was translated for the guests by Mr. Koq Kuquali and reads as follows:

Today the American people are celebrating the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. His deathless name and living achievements are honored in many lands, not only by Americans, but also by others who know and value the work of the master builder of America's independence.

We do not worship Washington as a saint free from human frailties, nor do we glorify him merely as a conquering hero on the field of battle. Not all his military campaigns were brilliant triumphs. But with an army that was small and poorly organized, lacking provisions, munitions and uniforms, he nevertheless often turned his military defeats into decisive victories by his dazzling strategy and surprising resourcefulness. He was neither discouraged nor disillusioned by the hardships and obstacles on his thorny road. He firmly believed in the might of the right. He mastered the art of leading without dictating. The righteousness of the people's cause and the justice of their grievances permeated his soul. Every inch a man, he was a great organizer and inspirer of men. His own indomitable faith in the cause of liberty spurred him and his men on to deeds of unparalleled valor and sacrifice. A visionary, an idealist, he was endowed with extraordinary will power, tenacity, perseverance and courage which helped him to translate his dreams and ideals into inspiring realities.

And when the victory of national independence was won chiefly through the genius of his leadership, when the formative period of the new-born liberty had set in, and Washington was chosen as the first President of the United States, he collaborated with his colleagues and together with them built wisely and conscientiously the edifice that is America.

There were times when he was subjected to unwarranted, cruel political attacks, just as President Lincoln was in his day, just as President Wilson after the World War, just as President Hoover is today. It has always been thus. But brave, sincere men of vision and character, sure of their course, lead their nations toward a better life, according to their lights and their consciences, building for the future, undismayed by partisan attacks and political calumny.

The accomplishments of Washington as a great soldier in a noble cause, as a far-sighted statesman during America's most trying period, as the founder of a great nation dedicated to liberty; his religious broad-mindedness which recognized no denominational frontiers or discriminatory barriers; his compassion for the oppressed and the downtrodden; his genius for securing for the nation the best help and the wisest counsel from among his ablest associates and contemporaries; his dignity and sense of responsibility in high office; his chivalry, his loyalty and his sympathetic understanding of the people's needs and the nation's hopes; his genuine comradeship with the men who served with him during the years of storm and stress; his prophetic wisdom in fashioning America's policy in its relations with other nations,—all these have enshrined Washington in the hearts of the American people for all time.

The famous British statesman, Gladstone, paid one of the finest tributes to Washington when he said:

"If among all the pedestals supplied by history for public characters of extraordinary nobility and purity I saw one higher than all the rest, and I were required at a moment's notice to name the fittest occupant of it, my choice would light on Washington."

It is my privilege to celebrate this historic occasion in Albania whose people suffered and struggled so long before they have attained their independence, and whose own national hero, Skanderbeg, was one of the world's greatest personalities both as a leader of men and as a champion of his people's independence.

Many Albanians, who went to the United States and have become part and parcel of America, have retained their deep affection for their native land, and have contributed both morally and materially toward the establishment of Albania's independence. There is a strong bond of friendship between our nations. On many occasions I have heard in various parts of Albania expressions of genuine gratitude to the United States for its services to the cause of Albanian independence.

To commemorate the Bicentennial birthday of George Washington, it is my honor and pleasure to dedicate the seeds of trees planted by Washington in Mount Vernon, the home of Washington, and to plant them in Albanian soil, on the grounds of the American Legation.

During the evening a second Washington reception was held at the Legation and was attended by leading Albanian officials and prominent residents of Tirana. On this occasion a four-reel film, entitled "The Life and Times of Washington," was shown. Mr. Bernstein, the American Minister, makes the following summary of the events of the day:

These receptions attracted much favorable attention in the press. Numerous telegrams were received during the day from Albanians in various parts of the country who offered their congratulations and good wishes. Many of these Albanians have resided in the United States.

During the morning reception the students of the Albanian Vocational School, numbering over 400, appeared in the garden of the Legation and sang the American anthem and other American songs. This demonstration was entirely unexpected and was arranged by the Albanian students themselves. It was a surprise to all present at the celebration and added an unusual and effective feature to the program.

All the newspapers of Tirana have devoted laudatory articles and editorials to George Washington, to the United States, and referred to the gratitude which Albania owes to the United States.

Mr. Fultz, the American Director of the Albanian Vocational School, commenting on this demonstration by the students of his school, remarked as follows:

"I suppose it would be difficult to make anyone believe that the trip of the boys to the Legation was more or less spontaneous and because they wished to do it. I had less than nothing to do with it, not even so much as making a suggestion. In my opinion it was entirely natural and expresses their true feeling toward America and Americans. I do not believe it could possibly happen with any other Legation here."

In a letter of March 10, 1932, to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, the American Minister informed the Director of the Commission that "His Majesty the King of Albania intends to name several streets and squares of various towns of Albania in honor of George Washington." During September, 1932, information reached the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission that two of the principal streets of Scutari and Korcha were named in honor of George Washington at appropriate ceremonies in each of these Albanian cities. The Minister also wrote that the walnut seeds from Mount Vernon were planted in Albanian soil and that when these seeds sprouted and the trees were of sufficient size, transplanting exercises would be held.

At the request of the Americanization School Association, with headquarters at Washington, D. C., several prominent Albanians were asked to contribute George Washington tributes for inclusion in a special booklet, "Tributes from Many Lands." From the American Legation in Albania were received three translations of tributes prepared as a result of this invitation. One of these tributes—"George Washington as a World Statesman," by Constantine A. Chekrezi—also appeared in an edition of LABOREMUS, dated February 22, 1932, a bulletin founded by the American Junior Red Cross and published semi-monthly by the Albanian Vocational School.

The full texts of the three tributes mentioned above follow:

GEORGE WASHINGTON AS A WORLD STATESMAN

By CONSTANTINE A. CHEKREZI

(Formerly Professor of History at the National University, Washington, D. C.—Member of the Council of State of the Kingdom of Albania—Author, "Albania, Past and Present.")

To speak of FARMER WASHINGTON as a statesman of the world might seem somewhat strange. For, was it not he who originated, preached and bequeathed the injunction about entangling alliances, through the interpretation of which America was to lead a life of perfect political aloofness from the rest of the world?

Yet, in that very injunction he showed himself as the greatest statesman of the world, not only of the one he lived in, but of that world today, and in particular of that universal aggregate that is now gathering to pay him a perfect tribute on the occasion of his two hundredth birthday anniversary.

To estimate properly the value of that far-reaching injunction, we must needs go back to the political conditions of his time. Had the United States, which had just come out of a hard-won war of independence, entangled themselves in the affairs of the heaving and splitting Europe, could they have ever stood apart as the great example of peaceful development under the unwavering light of liberty and freedom?

And, had every other great State or Empire of the world kept itself from entangling alliances, how many world catastrophies would have been avoided?

What Washington did, then, was to set down a rule of guidance for all nations and for all time, if only the nations should be wise enough to abide by that rule.

It is befitting, therefore, that not only America, but the whole world as well, should join in paying a too well deserved universal tribute to the living memory of the farmer boy of Virginia who was to become the founder of American liberty; to the great man who laid down a national ruling principle whereby the United States achieved greatness and prosperity, because they complied with it, while the rest of the world marched blindly to self-ruination, because it chose to ignore it.

In paying this tribute to George Washington, the Albanians join reverently and gratefully, because myriads of Albania's sons and daughters saw first the light of liberty in His country, and because His life exemplifies what is finest and most inspiring in the political career of any founder of State or Empire of States.

GEORGE WASHINGTON

By MEHDI FRASHERI

(President of the Council of State. Formerly Member of Parliament, Cabinet Minister, Albanian representative in the League of Nations. Author.)

Providence sometimes presents itself in the form of a man to carry out the destiny of nations and humanity.

George Washington is one of the greatest figures of this category. Endowed with clear mind and conscience, just, courageous and with deep faith in his personal and social duty, he started his career as an engineer in which he showed conspicuous skill. His great talents made him change his career according to circumstances, thus becoming an officer and participating in the French and Indian war in which he displayed courage and devotion to duty. When the time came to save his country from foreign rule, he took up the sword for that purpose. After America had won its independence by the Treaty of Paris, he returned to his estate with the modesty that characterizes great men, and worked as a simple citizen.

While farming he was offered the Presidency of the new Republic, for the creation of which he spared no sacrifice. Such examples are found only during the period of creation and development of ancient Rome, but with one difference: Rome sought to conquer the world, whereas America fought for its own independence.

The results of this struggle are the present United States with 120,000,000 of inhabitants, at the culminating point of prosperity and civilization. It is the duty of all people to bow before the statue of this figure, and to participate in spirit in the celebration honoring his memory.

PRESENT ARMS!

By DR. TERENC TOÇI

(Jurist. Author. Formerly Member of Parliament, President of the Court of Cassation, Secretary General to the President of the Albanian Republic, and Chief of the Press Bureau.)

Is the national hero of America great because he was a general without equal, or because he was a legislator with unparalleled discernment, or because he was the first President of the United States? Is he great because he humbled himself in his greatness or because his humanity respected even the negro?—He was great because of all these! And his greatness shone even more when from commanding the powerful federation he retired to do farming and to teach the world that man's greatness is measured by work and achievement.

But for me, for us Albanians, George Washington is great and sublime, glorified and honored, chiefly because his name suggests to us the noble nation which, to those Albanians without nation or country, without home or food, opened wide its arms, received and respected them as brothers, improved their lot and advanced them, and warmed their hearts with the rays of liberty's sun.

When I entered New York for the first time and saw the Statue of Liberty, in the distance, I imagined I saw George Washington because he is the symbol of North America, the national hero who personifies the true and noble spirit of the Colonies which rose, for independence and liberty, against the Kingdom that ostensibly was their motherland.

In George Washington, that spirit of affection for liberty, we see the nation which welcomed us, since we needed work and food, and it not only fed thousands of us for the labor which we rendered, but it opened our minds as well. And to a vast majority of our brothers, it inculcated the meaning of political freedom, liberty, justice, civilization!

The goodness of the Albanians of America shall never be forgotten! To their fatherland, which was held in bondage by aliens, crushed by foreign intrigue, and persecuted, they remitted millions from the land of George Washington, and even brought back here from that land blood tempered to a new life!

And now that America and the whole world are celebrating the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of this hero, the Albanians, knowing that this national structure begun by him contains in its foundations many stones laid by Albanian workers who emigrated to America, to George Washington—through the American Nation—present arms in honor, in admiration and in gratefulness, for only by lessons learned in free America are small nations enabled to write a page in the history of the earth!

Great credit is due the newspapers of Albania for taking an especially active part in the Bicentennial celebration, thus reflecting the sentiments and estimates of the Albanian people as a whole regarding George Washington and his ideals as perpetuated in the Government of the United States.

The GAZETA E TIRANES of February 21, 1932, in an editorial, states in part:

Happy are the people who on a day like this have found inspiration in the life of a man. Such are the American people. Tomorrow George Washington will be attaining his two hundredth birthday. . . . He who regards the place of America in the present world, or who follows its progress in human achievement cannot but be astonished and amazed by the life of Washington who created, who laid the corner stones and started it on the road to a great place. For the Americans, George Washington is the Messiah, the savior, the liberator, and is really glorified by them as such. He is the creator of a great and powerful nation of outstanding distinction among the family of nations. . . . We, who have felt the influence of America in every step of our national life, respond to the joy of the Americans, to whom we wish a future ever brilliant in every field of activity.

The BESA of Tirana of February 19, 1932, in an editorial, setting forth the high points of George Washington's life, declares:

George Washington, first President of the United States of America, first General of the American Colonists and their liberator, was a man of deeds and not of mere dreams. In all his acts, he had complete confidence in their ultimate success. He was ever interested in the practical side and never losing sight of that feature, he was able to organize an army which defeated the British Continental Forces, to convince Congress to accept his suggestions, to confront the fiercest and most refined intrigues of some of the envious generals who sought to discredit and depreciate him in the eyes of public opinion. But in everything Washington was actuated by his good sense and not by ambition. He knew when to yield and when to be insistent and firm.

The LEKA, monthly review magazine of Scutari, Albania, in its February, 1932, issue gives prominent place to a biography of the life of Washington. The foreword to this article says, among other things:

"We, who at other times have written of what the Albanian will do for a friend, especially for the one for whom he bears affection, should allow a page or so to the life of this great statesman, whose name has been given to one of the most important cities in the world."

NETHERLANDS

HERE is a reciprocity of friendly relationship existing between the Netherlands and the United States that had its origin in the days of George Washington and that ever since has been perpetuated unfalteringly. This mutual feeling of good will was made manifest throughout all Holland during the bicentennial year and was echoed on American shores by words and actions of the Netherlands Legation in Washington, D. C. George Washington observances were held in Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and The Hague, and the Minister from the Netherlands to the United States as a memento of the long friendship and cordial association between the two governments presented to President Herbert Hoover a portrait of the first Minister from the Netherlands to this country.

It should be mentioned as an incident to this record that American relationship with the Netherlands began with the settlement of America by the pilgrims in 1620. It will be recalled that this faithful band, though English in origin, had sought refuge in Holland for a generation or more before sailing to the shores of the New World, where undoubtedly they had assimilated much Dutch culture and knowledge. When the two English colonies were planted in America, the Virginia settlement in 1607 and the Plymouth settlement in 1620, the Low Countries, now called Holland, had formed in 1579 the first federation of the modern type under a document known as the Union of Utrecht. That document had a remarkable relation to the Constitution of the United States. The success of the little confederation with its seven provinces each sending delegates—"Their High Mightinesses the States General"—to a federal body, attracted the attention of the four little New England colonies which in 1643 formed the so-called New England Confederation. The brief constitution of that federation contains some significant clauses drawn from the Dutch document. One historian remarks that "it must have reached Benjamin Franklin's hands, because he took from it some of the details of the plan of union which was submitted to Congress in 1775. The Articles of Confederation of 1781 and the subsequent Constitution of the United States of 1787 incorporated some of those ideas from Franklin's draft. In that sense the United States of America is a great grandchild of the Dutch Republic."

A more direct entry into American politics was the establishment of a Dutch colony on the river previously explored by Hendrick Hudson. From 1613 to 1664 they maintained the colony of New Netherland with its capital, New Amsterdam, and its responsibility to "Their High Mightinesses the States General." In 1655 the Dutch took over the little Swedish colony on the Delaware. It looked as though a considerable Dutch colony might result, but the future of Dutch holdings on the North American continent was settled by the English conquest of 1664. The result was the transformation of New Netherland into the English colonies of New York and New Jersey. The Dutch settlers were an important addition to the future American Republic. They were famous traders both in Europe and America, and were the most successful bidders for the Indian trade.

When the Revolution broke out there was still a recognizable population of sturdy Dutch farmers and traders, chiefly in the Hudson Valley. Their strong houses and broad farms bespoke their industry. Van Braam, a Dutchman, early came into relation with George Washington, accompanied him on his western expedition of 1754 and erroneously translated the unfortunate document in which Washington unwittingly appeared to admit "assassination" of Jumonville, the French commander, which enemies of Washington attempted to treat as a confession of perfidy.

The Dutch also played a prominent part in the American Revolution. Although colonists of Dutch extraction were not very numerous in 1775, perhaps not more than 80,000, almost all of them in the states of New York and New Jersey, in general they stood by the patriot cause. The man of most distinction from that race was General Schuyler, who belonged to a patroon family at Albany, and was in command in the north at the time of Burgoyne's invasion, until superseded by General Gates, who, it is said, was much inferior in military ability. Among the Dutch of military distinction was Brigadier General John P. de Haas, who came over to America in 1750 and took the patriot side.

MR. J. H. VAN ROIJEN, MINISTER OF THE NETHERLANDS, ON THE WHITE HOUSE STEPS, WITH THE PORTRAIT OF B. J. VAN BERCKEL, FIRST NETHERLANDS MINISTER TO THE UNITED STATES, WHICH WAS PRESENTED TO PRESIDENT HOOVER.

Lt. Col. Jacob Gerhard Derick served five years in a Pennsylvania regiment. Baron Glassbeech did good service as volunteer aide to General Morgan in the South. Besides these three foreigners, various natives of Dutch blood stand out—names such as Van Schaick, Gansevoort, Van Cortlandt, Van Rensselaer, Willett, Richard Varick, who was Washington's secretary at headquarters, and Simeon de Witt, the Geographer.

Sixty-one members of the famous Society of the Cincinnati were Dutch; ten members of the Congress of the Confederation from 1774 to 1789 were of Dutch descent, as were also ten members of the Congresses of the United States from 1789 to 1797.

At the other end of the trans-Atlantic channel the States General of the seven United Provinces of the Netherlands were of great service to the United States by their reception in Dutch ports of American vessels, by the use of the island of St.

Eustatius for American trade, and by their confidence in the future success of the Revolution, which led them to lend considerable sums of money, under the influence of our minister, from 1781 to the establishment of the Constitution. England declared war on the Netherlands in 1780 because of this aid.

Mention should be made also in connection with this record of the Bicentennial in the Netherlands that Holland was the second country in the world to recognize the United States of America as an independent nation, being preceded only by France, ally to the United States in the War for Independence. Leading up to this recognition was the famous but ill-fated mission of Henry Laurens, who was commissioned Minister Plenipotentiary to the Netherlands in 1779 to negotiate a treaty and a loan. Laurens, while en route to Holland, was captured by a British cruiser and imprisoned in the tower of London. His release was effected when the provisional government in the United States demanded the return of Lord Cornwallis who had been given up to the British following his surrender at Yorktown, unless Laurens was released. On December 29, 1780, John Adams was commissioned Minister Plenipotentiary to the Netherlands to negotiate a treaty of amity and commerce. He was received on April 22, 1782, by the Prince of Orange and the famous treaty of amity and commerce was ratified on October 8, 1782. Prior to this time, on February 14, 1782, the Congress of the United States had ratified John Adams' contract with the Netherlands for a large loan to America. It is also asserted by creditable historians that the American flag was first greeted by the Holland Governor of St. Eustatius.

Thus it is clear that our relationship with the Netherlands extends into the fields of colonization, finance, commerce and diplomacy.

On the closing day of the Bicentennial, as if to verify the sincerity of its Bicentennial activity, the Government of the Netherlands through its Legation in Washington, D. C., conveyed the following message to the "American Nation," submitting the same to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission:

The Government of the Netherlands gladly complies with the request of the United States Commission for the Celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington to send a message on the occasion of the closing of the commemorating celebrations which have taken place in the honour of the first President of the United States of America.

Her Majesty's Government has watched the celebration with great interest and warm sympathy and has desired to present to the American Nation a lasting token to honor the memory of the great statesman and at the same time to lay stress upon the close ties of secular friendship and collaboration which exist between the American and the Dutch people.

It was deemed that the most suitable present would consist in offering to the President of the United States a portrait of Pieter Jan van Berckel, first Envoy of the Netherlands in America, who fulfilled his mission from 1783 to 1788.

On July 7th, 1932, the present Netherlands Envoy offered this portrait to President Hoover.

The commemoration of the birthday of George Washington has roused keen interest in the Netherlands. This can easily be understood in respect of a country, where the heroes of the independence of other nations are always assured to find the greatest admiration.

The commemoration of George Washington has proved once more the close resemblance between the history of the United States of America and the Netherlands. Both nations are champions of the same ideals of independence, liberty and peace.

Her Majesty's Government has gladly seized the opportunity to participate in the commemorating festivities.

The Hague, seat of the Government of the Netherlands, residence of the sovereign, Her Majesty Queen Wilhelmina, and city of the world famous Peace Palace, celebrated the Bicentennial with the Americans resident in the city at a Legation reception, and an American Women's Club observance, heard Washington extolled by leading educators of the land, and learned the story of the major details of the life of the great American through a unique philatelic exhibit.

The Washington birthday reception at the American Legation, with Honorable Laurits S. Swenson, American Minister to the Netherlands acting as host, was a brilliant affair. As reported by Mr. Swenson "it was attended by a hundred and seventy-two persons who showed a gratifying interest in the Bicentennial, among whom were such prominent personages as Dr. H. Colijn, former Prime Minister and present Minister of State; Jhr. H. A. van Karnebeek, former Minister for Foreign Affairs and now a Minister of State and Governor of the Province in which The Hague is located; Jhr. A. M. Snouck Hurgronje, the acting Minister for Foreign Affairs; Judge Loder, the first President of the Permanent Court of International Justice; the diplomatic corps; representatives of the Netherlands-America Chamber of Commerce, of the Netherlands-American Foundation, the Leyden Pilgrim Fathers Society, the Chamber of Commerce of Rotterdam, the Bulb Growers Association and the Bulb Dealers Association of Haarlem, who brought with them gorgeous floral decorations. The general interest of the Netherlands in this celebration was shown by the presence of editors of the leading Dutch newspapers and professors from the Universities of Leyden, Amsterdam and Delft. There were also present many members of the American Club of Holland, the American Women's Club of The Hague, and others of the American Colony from Rotterdam, Amsterdam and The Hague."

TELEGRAAF, leading Dutch newspaper, in commenting on the occasion remarked that European eyes still often view America as a young country, without traditions, but on the commemoration of striking events in its history it is already counting in centuries. It was two hundred years ago that the great hero of liberty, George Washington, was born, and this anniversary was commemorated by the American Minister. There were a great number of visitors and the reception was interesting.

An unusual feature of the reception was the exhibition of a collection of George Washington relics, concerning which the NEW YORK HERALD-TRIBUNE, European Edition, says in its issue of February 23:

The Americans at The Hague are determined not to be behind their compatriots in other countries, and in this determination they have been considerably assisted with regard to the celebration of the Bicentennial of George Washington by the fact that there are several people in The Hague whose ancestors were in close touch with the First President. One of these people, Walton White Evans von Hemert, is a great-great-grandson of General Anthony Walton White, Washington's aide de camp, and as such has a number of heirlooms of historic value which he was kind enough to lend to the American Minister in The Hague, who had them exhibited for his reception guests. . . .

The relics included a gold pen used by Washington to write his dispatches of the Revolution, which at the close of the war he gave to General White, twelve silver cups which belonged to General White and one of which is engraved "General Washington drank from this cup"; a medal of the order of Cincinnati, which order was instituted by Washington and given to colonial and foreign officers who served in the army during the War for Independence; two certificates of that order; a silver snuffbox and gold ring formerly owned by Thaddeus Kosciuszko, which were given to Mrs. Anthony Walton White at the end of the war by the Polish General before his return to his native land, the ring being one he had previously received in England from the Duchess of Devonshire; a silver canteen used by Washington when on campaign; a sword which belonged to the British General Tarleton and which was handed to General White when Tarleton was captured in Virginia; and various other objects.

The American Women's Club in The Hague observed the Bicentennial at two celebrative events, the first of which was a Washington program at the Hotel Vieux Doelen on February 19, 1932. The President of the Club, Sadie Kennedy von Tresckow, reports that the event "was attended by almost all Americans in The Hague and Rotterdam and also by many Dutch, English and other nationals." The program consisted of the reading of "The American's Creed," patriotic songs; a tribute to Washington by Mrs. Angenent; American spirit-uals, colonial dances and the reading of excerpts from Camden's historic account of Washington's visit to South Carolina in 1791.

The second celebration of the Club was a dinner dance given on Washington's birthday by the Americans under the auspices of the American Women's Club of The Hague and Rotterdam at the Witteburg Hotel. The American Minister to the Netherlands was the guest of honor and made a short address. The hall was appropriately decorated, a picture of Washington being the outstanding feature. Colonial dances in costume were performed during the intermission and national airs enlivened the evening.

The Peoples University, one of the leading educational institutions in The Hague, observed the Washington Bicentennial on February 20, when the student-body and many outside guests gathered to hear Professor Dr. J. G. Sleeswijk of the Technical University of Delft deliver, at the request of the Board of Directors of the University, an address concerning the life and work of George Washington and the part he took in establishing and building the American commonwealth. The American Minister was invited to attend this lecture.

Dr. Sleeswijk, also, at the request of the American Minister, contributed the following article concerning George Washington to the Bicentennial Number of the Americanization Bulletin "Tributes from Many Lands":

TWO FATHERS OF THEIR COUNTRY

In these days of crisis in nearly every respect, in this time considered as the doom of occidental civilization, in these years when mankind wants so many great men and has so few, we turn to history. We go back to a period like the eighteenth century especially, at which time ideas about men and the organization of society were in revolutionary movement, as they are now, in the midst of which several men, as leaders, of their country, rose high above the level of their contemporaries. Historical biography now flourishes more than ever. As if to compensate to a certain degree for the present lack of leaders, we study the life of those from times gone by, but who are still ranging among the great in the history of mankind.

Such a great leader was George Washington.

Fighting for national and spiritual freedom has been the basis of the history of the Dutch people. We were, like the Americans, revolutionists against a tyrannical king, who was far away and who, by means of his authorized deputies, tried to violate the well-established rights of the people. Generally, the connection between the Declaration of Independence and "La Declaration des Droits de l'Homme et du Citoyen" is pointed out and we know the role of Jefferson in the formulation of both. But one usually forgets, that there has been another Declaration of Independence, two centuries earlier, not written in so lapidary a style as that of the United States, but animated by the same spirit. That manifesto was the so-called "Acte van Verlatinghe" (Act of Desertion), in which the King of Spain was solemnly abjured by the people of the Netherlands.

Making this comparison, we remember both the leading men of these two revolutions—Washington and William of Orange. They both fought the good fight for the freedom of their people, facing and overcoming with never failing energy the most incredible difficulties, and it is not by chance that both of them bear the title of honor—Father of his Country—though William could not accomplish his task, like Washington, because he was murdered. William of Orange is called the Silent; George Washington also was a man of action and not of words.

Such were my reflections as I walked respectfully through that shrine of the American people on Mount Vernon and as I stood before the house, looking down over the graceful and majestic windings of the Potomac River. And so the reader will understand why a Washington Memorial Book would not be complete without a voice from Holland. Parallelism in the fundamental events in the national history of the two countries is the best way to understanding and sympathy.

One of the most interesting and unique bicentennial exhibits in Europe was a philatelic display at the firm of Keizer in The Hague, which display was opened to the public on February 22, 1932. A letter on file at the Netherland Legation in Washington, D. C., describes the exhibit as "a beautiful collection of Washington stamps as well as a collection of town stamps of New York and a large number of portraits and photographs of Washington and Mt. Vernon." The exhibit aroused favorable comment and was visited by large numbers of Dutch folk.

With respect to philately and its relation to Washington, it might be mentioned also in this record that Dr. J. H. Van Peursem of The Hague, in a very attractive and unusual manner retold the story of Washington's life in pamphlet form and illustrated the story completely with Washington stamps and stamps bearing likenesses of other Revolutionary War heroes and heroines. The brochure was written in Dutch and translated into English by J. H. Brinkman and published in 1932 through the Society "Philately and History" at The Hague. The following quotation is indicative of the spirit actuating the pamphlet:

A German historian wrote the following words regarding Washington, which seem to us also to be characteristic of his entire personality: "In the midst of numberless difficulties and human imperfections Washington displayed a surpassing greatness. Uncorruptible, upright and of unconditional integrity, he stood as a man; untouched by intrigues, unwilling to enter the plots with which he was approached; sparing in his words, with not much hope for success, in perfect poise, quietness and steadfastness, he stuck to his post. During these sombre and difficult years his person, as no other, was inseparably linked to the lot of his people and he, as no other, personified the unity and determination of his countrymen and their indomitable desire to carry on to the end the war for independence."

Many small and unreported gatherings honoring Washington were held all over the world. A typical one, however, has been reported from The Hague by Mrs. Marie Hissink, who writes:

On the occasion of the bicentenary of George Washington, a small party met at my house to listen to a talk on the famous American hero by Mrs. Van der Ney. The meeting was attended by Mrs. Idah S. Foster, wife of the American Consul at Rotterdam; Mr. J. W. Cohen-Stuart, an ex-Secretary of the Navy; his son; and a retired administrator of a sugar factory, their wives and several other ladies. It was an interesting meeting which gave the Dutch people a better insight of the significance of George Washington's life to the American nation.

From the American Consul General in Amsterdam, Holland, Honorable Charles L. Hoover, word was received by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission in a letter of September 28, 1932, that about a year ago Her Majesty the Queen stated in connection with a visit to this city, that all fetes and festivities are inopportune at this time and that no functions whatever would be held at the palace while she was here. This year even the formal drives through the city were omitted. Her example in this respect was naturally followed by the officials of the city who have been sorely pressed by the difficulties incident upon caring for a great number of unemployed and the problems connected with the raising of the necessary funds from taxation in the face of constantly dwindling values. I feel sure that in happier circumstances they would have wished to join in the celebration and the fact that they have not done so, must be ascribed to lack of the means rather than to the absence of interest.

Despite this justified curtailment of public celebrative functions, the message of the Bicentennial reached Amsterdam in a very worthwhile manner—through public lectures and through the press.

On the 22nd of February there assembled in the meeting hall of the University of Amsterdam a large audience to hear Dr. E. van Raalte, Professor of Law of the League of Nations at the University, deliver a comprehensive address on the life of George Washington and its influence on current world problems, with particular reference to the doctrine of "no permanent alliances," promulgated by Washington. The following translated outline of Dr. van Raalte's speech was submitted by the Netherland Legation in Washington, D. C.:

The speaker opened his lecture by pointing out that for those who occupied themselves with a subject such as the one he teaches, namely the Law of the League of Nations, that attention has to be paid not only to the texts of treaties but also, and often to a much greater degree, to the happenings in the lives of the nations and to the memorable deeds and actions of their citizens. With this in mind on this commemorative day there are abundant reasons to dwell on the life of George Washington.

In the first place it was especially due to George Washington that the former English colonies in the New World acquired their liberty. Washington has meant a great deal to the political growth of the United States, the speaker averred, showing how this Republic was originally a loose Federation of States, but was converted finally in 1787 into a united whole. He mentioned the contact which G. K. van Hogendorp, an eminent Dutchman, had in his younger years with Washington as set forth in The Memoirs of G. K. van Hogendorp.

The speaker dwelt on the significance of Washington's Farewell Address, which was said to have virtually laid the foundation for what was afterwards called the Monroe Doctrine. Continuing, Prof. Van Raalte demonstrated how the theory of no entangling alliances was perfectly tenable and understandable more than a century ago, but that in the course of years an evolution has taken place in the international position of the United States, which in his opinion has made strict adherence to the Monroe Doctrine impossible. He pointed out how the document which founded the League of Nations has taken the Monroe Doctrine into account, but that the United States has not followed the admonition of President Woodrow Wilson in his conception of this question. It was shown that how finally, in 1919, the United States refrained from entering the League for fear of the "entangling" character of the League of Nations' Treaty.

After demonstrating that since 1919 in an indirect way the United States has supported the League and after having mentioned the moral significance of the Kellogg-Briand treaty, the speaker concluded with the statement that although he felt obliged to point out results, which in his opinion were regrettable, of a too dogmatic adherence to the Monroe Doctrine idea, which is not suitable to the conditions of our present generation, and although Washington's influence was instrumental in the founding of the Monroe Doctrine, there are abundant reasons to commemorate this grand figure of history with respect and with the deepest admiration.

Above all it should not be forgotten that the world sees in Washington the man who without thought of self fought for a high and lofty ideal to which he devoted his life in the most noble way and that he had been able to realize that ideal—the birth of the independent Republic of the United States of America. It must be remembered that it has been this republic which, on account of the relations between the various states, has offered a brilliant example of the way in which nations should conduct themselves as regards each other.

Valuable lessons can be drawn by the signatories to the League of Nations treaty from the example of the relations existing between the member states of the American Commonwealth.

An indication of the part the Amsterdam press played in the Bicentennial may be gathered from reading the following translated captions of Bicentennial news and feature articles appearing in HANDELSBLAD AND TELEGRAAF during the first two months of the Celebration:

George Washington's Policy: His Opposition to "Entanglements."

An event both of historical and sentimental importance with respect to Dutch participation in the Bicentennial took place at the White House in Washington, D. C., on July 7, 1932, at high noon, when the Netherlands Minister, Honorable J. H. van Royen, presented to the President of the United States a portrait of Hon. B. J. van Berckel, first Minister from the Netherlands to the United States, who tendered his credentials in America in October, 1783.

The presentation was made as a token of the long friendship and close association between the two governments, dating from the time of George Washington and continuing to the present day. A memorandum on the subject of the presentation received from the Netherlands Legation by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission states:

It has been ascertained that the Netherlands Government, desirous of commemorating the Bicentennial of Washington's birth, elected to cause a painting to be made of its first diplomatic representative to the United States. This painting was prepared in Holland and was taken from one of two known steel engravings of van Berckel.

The token was evidence of the great interest Holland demonstrated during the Bicentenary year but was also meant to be a souvenir of the time when the Dutch were watching with the greatest sympathy the War of Independence that made of the thirteen colonies a free and powerful Confederation. For the Hollanders the American revolt followed in a hundred interesting details that of their forefathers in the sixteenth century. On the American ships they saw the same red, white and blue colors and the same red and white stripes that floated from the mastheads of Tromp and de Ruyter.

A press dispatch concerning the presentation of the portrait issued by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission stated that "the government at the Hague thought that there was no better way in which to recall to mind the time in which the hope and wishes of the majority of the Dutch were constantly with the struggling Colonies, than to present to the President a portrait of Minister van Berckel, the man who was sent here by Holland as the first diplomat after she had recognized America's independence, for next to France, Holland was the first nation to proceed to that recognition."

Great was the sympathy that was manifest in Holland when in 1779 John Paul Jones captured several prizes from the British and brought them to the Dutch island of Texel. Notwithstanding the protest of the English Government, he was allowed to stay there three months, the wounded were housed ashore, Dutch ladies offered generous help. Jones was applauded in the theatre at Amsterdam and a popular song, not yet forgotten, was sung in his honor.

From the beginning the thirteen colonies understood the importance a friendly attitude on the part of Holland could have for them. Holland's commerce, especially that of the Island St. Eustatius, provided America with a great many articles of first necessity and it was in Amsterdam, the great financial center of those days, that Congress intended to place, and did place, part of its loans. As was foreseen, Holland had to pay the price for its friendly attitude toward America when, in December, 1781, England declared war on the Dutch Republic.

On January 31, 1862, Mr. van Berckel, until that time Burgomaster of Rotterdam, was appointed by the States General as the first Minister from the Netherlands to the United States. He left Holland on the man-of-war Overyssel, accompanied by three other war ships, in June of that year and arrived in Philadelphia in October. He was received by the Congress then in session at Princeton a short time afterwards with great solemnity, in the presence of Monsieur de Luzerne, the French Ambassador and many other gentlemen of prominence. His credentials were received and most cordial speeches were exchanged between him and Mr. Boudenot, President of the Congress.

Mr. van Berckel, who was treated with the customary hospitality of the United States, later made his abode here definitely. After his resignation in 1788 on account of political difficulties in Holland, he remained in America and lived in Newark, N. J., until his death in 1819 and was laid to rest in the First Church Cemetery in that city.

It is, accordingly, the picture of this distinguished citizen which the Government of the Netherlands has through the instrumentality of its Minister, delivered to the President of the United States as its gift to this Government. The picture now graces the wall of the Department of State.

JAVA

BATAVIA, the capital city of Java, an island in the Dutch East Indies and the most densely populated land mass in the world, received the message of the George Washington Bicentennial through the medium of an official commemorative event held at the American consulate during the evening of February 22, 1932.

The American Consul General, Honorable K. S. Patton, in reporting the affair described it as a George Washington reception "at which the high officials of the Netherlands Indian Government, the municipal authorities, members of the consular corps, the American residents, prominent personages of the business community and friends—in all some 300 persons were in attendance."

The guests were received by the Consul General and Mrs. Patton, Vice Consuls Ailshie and MacDonald, the American Trade Commissioner and Mrs. Hendren and the Assistant Trade Commissioner.

Her Majesty, the Queen of the Netherlands was toasted by Mr. Patton and Hon. Raden Adipati Achmad Djajadiningrat of the Council of India responded with a complimentary toast to the President of the United States. The entire assembly toasted George Washington.

The American authorities were the recipients of many felicitations directed to the occasion, and the Javanese guests present left with a greater knowledge of and respect for America's founder.

NORWAY

NORWAY'S chief interest in the Bicentennial seemed to be to furnish the citizenry of this great Scandinavian land with a more complete knowledge of and deeper appreciation for George Washington. To achieve this object the press of the country volunteered its hearty support, and according to his Excellency Mr. Halvard H. Bachke, Norwegian Minister to the United States, most important newspapers of Norway "contained extended articles about the great patriot and his accomplishments for his country and the world."

To set the seal of its approval on the Washington celebration at home and abroad, the Government of Norway, through its Foreign Minister, Hon. Birger Braadland, cabled the following message on February 22, 1932, to the Secretary of State of the United States:

OSLO, NORWAY,
FEBRUARY 22, 1932

HON. HENRY L. STIMSON,
SECRETARY OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, D. C.

NORWEGIAN GOVERNMENT DESIRE EXPRESS TO AMERICAN GOVERNMENT THEIR HEARTIEST FELICITATIONS OCCASION BICENTENARY OF GEORGE WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY AND BEST WISHES FOR THE PROSPERITY OF AMERICAN NATION.

(SIGNED) BRAADLAND,
FOREIGN MINISTER.

In answer the Secretary of State cabled:

WASHINGTON, D. C.
FEBRUARY 23, 1932

HIS EXCELLENCY MAJOR BIRGER BRAADLAND, MINISTER FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS OF NORWAY
OSLO.

I AM HAPPY IN THE NAME OF THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT TO EXPRESS SINCERE APPRECIATION THE COURTEOUS FELICITATIONS EXTENDED BY YOUR EXCELLENCY ON BEHALF OF THE NORWEGIAN GOVERNMENT ON THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF WASHINGTON AND TO OFFER RECIPROCAL GREETINGS.

(SIGNED) HENRY L. STIMSON,
SECRETARY OF STATE.

The most impressive and extensive Washington newspaper publicity in Norway originated in the capital city of Norway, Oslo. AFTENPOSTEN carried in its issue of February 20, 1932, a richly illustrated magazine-section article on the life of Washington and a two column description of the city of Washington, D. C. MORGENBLADET, for February 24, 1932, featured an equestrian portrait of General Washington, a photographed collection of Washington stamps, and a semi-editorial article setting forth the greatness of Washington's character under all circumstances. TIDENS TEGN for February 22, 1932, outlined the Bicentennial celebrations among the nations of the world and likewise extolled the virtues of the Great American. ARBEIDERBLADET, NORGES HANDELS OG SJOFARTSTIDENDE, and FILM OG RADIO gave liberally of their space for Bicentennial themes.

Stavanger newspapers joined with those of Oslo in the campaign of disseminating Washington news and history. The following translated quotation from STAVANGEREN, for September 14, 1932, is typical of the tenor of the articles in general:

Washington was as splendid a statesman as he was a general. After peace was declared he devoted all his statesmanship to the work of preserving the new nation, and entering into good relations with the defeated country, England. It has been said that without Washington, no United States would have come into being. This may be a strong statement, but it is not far from the truth. There would certainly not have been any United States at that time, if Washington had not been the man he was. To all his other brilliant abilities were added the best human qualities, so it is surely just that the Americans honor him as one of the greatest men of history.

PROGRAM IN BERGEN

The principal Bicentennial observance in Norway, as reported to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, occurred in Bergen, Norway's beautiful port on the North Sea. There, not only the newspapers joined in spreading the message of the celebration, but the radio played an important role as well. On the evening of George Washington's birthday in 1932 a special radio program was broadcast over the Bergens Kringkaster Station. The American Consul, Honorable E. Talbot Smith, as guest speaker, introduced the program with the following remarks:

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:

I wish in the first place to thank the Bergens Kringkaster for its kindness in inviting me to say a few words as an introduction to the excellent program planned for this evening in commemoration of Washington's birthday. This is the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, and the occasion is being celebrated, not merely in the United States, but throughout the entire civilized world. Wherever there are those who love ordered liberty, his name is revered. His struggles against oppression, his idealism, his constructive statesmanship have given him a position so that it may be said of him that he belongs not to us alone, but to the world. And, therefore, this anniversary is being celebrated throughout the world, not only by Americans who happen to be stationed in various parts of the world, but by all the friends of liberty. And so, my friends, I want you to feel this evening that you are not taking part simply in a local, but in a world-wide celebration, not merely in an American holiday, but in a world-wide act of veneration to a great leader against political oppression.

I shall not take up your time with details of Washington's life and activities, as Konservator Kristofer Visted will address you later in Norwegian and I am sure, as a student of history, more learnedly than I could. But in emphasizing the international character of this celebration, I shall quote a tribute paid to the memory of Washington by the famous English statesman and historian, James Bryce. Washington, he said, stands alone and unapproachable, like a snow peak rising above its fellows into the clear air of morning, with a dignity, constancy and purity which have made him the ideal type of civic virtue to succeeding generations.

In America, Washington is honored by the title of "Father of his Country," and that country, which has ever tried to live up to Washington's ideals, has attracted many Norwegians who have contributed much to its development. At the present time there are in the United States some 350,000 who were born in Norway, and the number now in the United States born of Norwegian stock equals the present population of Norway. How many of you knew that seven cities in the United States are named "Norway" and three are named "Bergen." Also, just across the Hudson River from New York City is Bergen County, one of the most important in New Jersey. So you see Norway and Bergen are well known to us in the United States.

I have just recently been informed that a street in Bergen is to be named after George Washington in commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of his birth, and I wish to take this occasion to express in behalf of my countrymen my sincerest and deepest appreciation of this act of courtesy. Such a street will be a constant reminder of the innumerable common interests, common ideals and common love of political freedom shared by Bergen and the people of the United States.

I thank you.

A radio orchestra continued the broadcast with the rendition of the "Star Spangled Banner," and several John Philip Sousa marches and other American music. Promptly at 9.00 p. m. Konservator Kristofer Visted "went on the air" with a detailed biographical sketch of the life of George Washington, and this was followed by a series of American patriotic and folk-lore songs rendered by a male quartette.

TO NAME STREET FOR WASHINGTON

It is on record also that Bergen contemplated naming one of the principal streets in the city for George Washington during the Bicentenary year. On this point Consul Smith writes as follows, in a dispatch of February 23, 1932, to the Department of State:

Several weeks ago the thought occurred to me that if Berlin and other cities in Europe were naming streets after George Washington on this particular occasion, it might be possible to have a street so named in Bergen, although, to the best of my knowledge, there is at present no street named after a foreigner. Nevertheless, I personally interviewed the Chairman of the Street Naming Committee, Mr. Asbjorn Stensaker. . . . The proposition was favorably received by the Street Committee and several days before Washington's birthday I received a formal notification from Bergen's second mayor advising me that in commemoration of Washington's birthday it had been decided to take the step. Although a particular street has not yet been chosen, I am assured that it will be a fairly prominent street near the waterfront where tourists usually embark.

GUATEMALA

UATEMALA joined with the sister Republics of the Americas to honor the memory of George Washington on the Two Hundredth Anniversary of his Birth.

In a radiogram from Jorge Ubico, President of Guatemala, to Herbert Hoover, President of the United States, the Republic of Guatemala signified officially her intention to participate in the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration. The radiogram, in translation, is as follows:

THE PRESIDENTIAL MANSION,
GUATEMALA,
(Via Tropical Radio to New Orleans, Louisiana, Feb. 22, 9:15 A. M.)

HON. HERBERT HOOVER,
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C.

ON THE MEMORABLE DATE WHICH MARKS IN HISTORY
THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE BIRTH OF GEORGE WASHINGTON,

TON, THE GREAT APOSTLE OF LIBERTY AND DEMOCRACY AND THE GLORY OF NORTH AMERICA, THE PEOPLE OF GUATEMALA, THROUGH THE CHANNEL OF THEIR GOVERNMENT, FEEL HONORED AND PLEASED TO OFFER A SINCERE TRIBUTE OF ADMIRATION TO THE MEMORY OF THAT ILLUSTRIOUS LEADER BY GIVING HIS ILLUSTRIOUS NAME TO THE PROLONGATION OF THE PRINCIPAL AVENUE OF THE CAPITAL. IT ALSO AVAILS ITSELF OF THE HAPPY OCCASION TO OFFER A GREETING OF CORDIAL SYMPATHY TO THE GREAT AMERICAN PEOPLE AND ITS WORTHY HEAD.

(SIGNED) JORGE UBICO,
PRESIDENT OF GUATEMALA.

Even previous to the sending of this message, plans for participation in the Bicentennial Celebration by the Government and people of Guatemala were made. Through the American Minister in Guatemala, Mr. Sheldon Whitehouse, literature and pictures, issued by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, and pertaining to the career and times of George Washington, were distributed in Guatemala, principally in the schools.

On February 15, President Ubico issued an official decree, in which he pointed out that the Republic of Guatemala was born as a result of George Washington's achievements in winning the independence of the United States, and that its institutions and form of government were modeled after those of the United States. In the same message to his people, President Ubico decreed that on February 22, 1932, the birthday of George Washington, "Avenida Washington" be named and dedicated with appropriate ceremonies; that in all elementary and secondary schools in Guatemala, one hour be set aside to recall the life and deeds of George Washington.

The translation of the decree of President Ubico is here quoted in its entirety:

JORGE UBICO
President of the Republic

WHEREAS the 22nd of February will be the second centennial of the birth of George Washington, leader of North American Independence, founder of the Republic of the United States, and First President of the same;

WHEREAS his liberating work extended to the world in fruits of restoration and resuscitation, as the French Revolution spread over Europe and the War of Colonial Emancipation triumphed in all Spanish America;

WHEREAS the Republic of Guatemala derives from that origin its political independence and has since modeled its institutions on the democratic principles of the Republic of Washington;

THEREFORE DECREES:

Article 1.—On the date indicated and with due solemnity will be unveiled a permanent tablet explicatory of the motive for which, from that day will be denominated "Avenida Washington," that which beginning behind the Church of the Calvary is being constructed, as a prolongation of Sixth Avenue South, as far as the street which will unite it with the West of Plazuela España.

Article 2.—In all the elementary and secondary schools of the Republic, an hour will be set aside on that same day, to recall the life and deeds of Washington and his collaborators, making clear their evolutive effects for the good of America and of Humanity.

Article 3.—The Minister of Public Education is charged to give to these arrangements the most effective execution and success.

The present Decree shall be reported to the National Legislative Assembly at its next regular sessions.

Given in the House of the Government: in Guatemala, on the fifteenth day of the month of February one thousand nine hundred thirty-two.

JORGE UBICO.

Ministry of Government and Justice.

PAN AMERICAN DAY TRIBUTE

The President of the Republic was again a participant in the world-wide celebration of the Bicentennial of the Birth of George Washington during Pan American Day exercises at the tomb of Washington at Mount Vernon on April 14, 1932.

The message from President Ubico read on that occasion was as follows:

TWO CENTURIES AGO, BY THE GRACE OF PROVIDENCE, THERE WAS BORN IN THE THIRTEEN COLONIES OF THE NEW WORLD THAT GREAT MAN BY WHOSE HANDS HUMAN LIBERTY, SACRIFICED THROUGH THE ABSOLUTISM OF THE PAST, WAS TO BE REVIVED, AND WHOSE REDEEMING SWORD WAS TO ERECT ON A FOUNDATION OF LAW THE FIRST DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC, THE EXAMPLE OF WHICH WOULD FURNISH TO ALL NATIONS ON EARTH THE MEANS OF THEIR POLITICAL REDEMPTION.

BY VIRTUE THEREOF, GEORGE WASHINGTON CEASED TO BE MERELY A HERO OF THE UNITED STATES AND BECAME THE FOUNDER OF A NEW ERA WHICH UNITED ALL MEN IN THE SAME IDEALS OF PROGRESS THROUGH EQUALITY AND JUSTICE. BUT IT WAS IN SPANISH AMERICA THAT HIS WORK FOUND THE UNANIMOUS WELCOME AND IMMEDIATE APPLICATION THAT BROUGHT FREEDOM FROM LONG-ENDURED ENSLAVEMENT.

FOR THIS REASON GUATEMALA TODAY SPONTANEOUSLY AND ENTHUSIASTICALLY JOINS THE GREAT REPUBLIC OF WASHINGTON AND UNITES WITH THE REST OF THE CONTINENT IN PAYING HONOR TO HIS NAME. ALL HER SCHOOLS ARE TEACHING THE LIFE AND WORK OF THAT BLAMELESS PATRICIAN AND OUR PRESS IS PUBLISHING THE DIFFERENT VIEWS BY WHICH HISTORICAL CRITICISM DISCOVERS IN GEORGE WASHINGTON THE MOST UNTARNISHED OF MEMORIES, THE PUREST OF STATESMEN, AND THE MOST PERFECT OF PATRIOTS.

MAY IT PLEASE HEAVEN THAT HIS EXAMPLE SHALL CONTINUE TO SERVE AS A BEACON TO OUR REPUBLICS IN THEIR DARKEST MOMENTS OF DOUBT AND ADVERSITY.

JORGE UBICO,
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

HE following cablegram to President Hoover from President Masaryk, of Czechoslovakia, sounded the keynote for the programs and other demonstrations which were conducted in that country in commemoration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington:

PRAGUE, FEBRUARY 21, 1932.

HIS EXCELLENCY HERBERT HOOVER
PRESIDENT OF THE U. S. A.
WASHINGTON

ON THE DAY ON WHICH TWO HUNDRED YEARS AGO GEORGE WASHINGTON WAS BORN, OUR THOUGHTS GO TO THE GREAT NATION THAT HE MADE FREE AND TO WHICH WE ARE ALL INDEBTED FOR THE BLESSING IT BROUGHT TO HUMANITY.

T. G. MASARYK.

The extent of the celebration in Czechoslovakia is shown in the following excerpt from a communication to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission by Frederick P. Hibbard, United States Chargé d'Affaires at Prague, dated February 27, 1932.

This anniversary has been observed throughout Czechoslovakia, wrote Mr. Hibbard. Great credit is due to the American Institute for its effort in instigating celebrations in cities throughout Czechoslovakia. All the Anglo-American institutions, of which there are a number scattered through Bohemia and Slovakia, held special meetings at which some phase of Washington's life was discussed. The Ministry of Education was requested to issue instructions that in all the public schools some special notice should be taken of the day.

The principal feature of the celebration in Prague was a meeting held on February 22, 1932, in the historic old Town Hall of that city under the auspices of the American Institute and the patronage of President Masaryk. The following cablegram was sent to the President of the United States:

PRAGUE, FEBRUARY 22, 1932.

PRESIDENT HOOVER
WASHINGTON, D. C.

OFFICIAL CELEBRATION TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY GEORGE WASHINGTON IN OLD TOWN HALL PRAGUE EXPRESSES FELICITATIONS TO YOU, AND THROUGH YOU, TO AMERICAN PEOPLE.

PROF. B. NEMEC,
PRESIDENT AMERICAN INSTITUTE.

There being but a small number of Americans in Prague, this program was arranged chiefly on the initiative of Czechs who had visited or studied in the United States.

In addition to the beloved President of the Czechoslovakian Republic, the meeting was attended by the acting Minister of Foreign Affairs, the President of the Senate, and the Chief of Staff of the army. Other cabinet ministers were represented as were the Mayor and City Council of Prague.

Professor B. Nemec, of the American Institute, delivered the opening speech of welcome, during which he called attention to the white and red flag which draped the speaker's desk. This was the same flag, said Professor Nemec, which was flown from Independence Hall in Philadelphia when President Masaryk signed the Czechoslovak declaration of independence on October 26, 1918.

Following Professor Nemec's welcome, F. P. Hibbard, United States Chargé d'Affaires, addressed the assemblage on George Washington's place in American life and the extent of the celebration in his honor. Mr. Hibbard said:

May I first express to you my great appreciation for this commemorative service which has been organized by the American Institute of Prague with the kind assistance of the Government of Czechoslovakia and the Municipality of Prague. It is a signal honor that His Excellency, the Mayor of Prague, has permitted us to gather in this council hall, the scene of so many historic incidents in the life of this country, to commemorate the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of a foreign patriot, George Washington, the first President of the United States of America. It is an even greater honor that the President of Czechoslovakia, His Excellency Dr. Masaryk, has accepted the patronage of this gathering. I feel that it is both a characteristic and fitting gesture on his part for in his long struggle for the creation and welfare of this republic he has paralleled the ideas and ideals of Washington and by the splendor of his character, the worth of his talents and the white flame of his patriotism, he has won the love and veneration of his compatriots, the respect and admiration of the world.

DESCRIBES BICENTENNIAL IN UNITED STATES

I do not propose to elaborate extensively on the character of Washington or his accomplishments. I think, however, it may be of interest to you to know something of the nature of the celebration throughout the United States by the American Government. The ceremonies begin today, the actual anniversary of Washington's birth, and will continue practically the entire year or until Thanksgiving Day, November 24th. By a joint resolution of the Congress of the United States approved December 2, 1924, the George Washington Bicentennial Commission was established to study and recommend a proper celebration in 1932 of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. The motive or the keynote of the celebration was expressed in the Congressional resolution in this manner:

"That future generations of American citizens may live according to the example and precepts of his exalted life and character and thus perpetuate the American Republic."

In pursuance of a provision in the resolution of Congress that an address be delivered to the American people on the significance of the event, it was most fitting that the address should be delivered by the person whose voice was most powerful in the affairs of the world at the time the resolution was passed, President Calvin Coolidge. President Coolidge delivered a masterful and inspiring address before both Houses of Congress, the members of the Cabinet, Supreme Court, members of the Bicentennial Commission, and many distinguished guests.

"My fellow Americans," spoke President Coolidge, "on the time when there were scanty reports in the public press, coupled with the inclination of early biographers, resulted in a rather imaginary character being created in response to the universal desire to worship his memory. The facts of his life were of record, but were not easily accessible. While many excellent books, often scholarly and eloquent, have been written about him, the temptation has been so strong to represent him as an heroic figure composed of superlatives that the real man among men, the human being subjected to the trials and temptations common to all mortals, has been too much obscured and forgotten. When we regard him in this character and have revealed to us the judgment with which he met his problems, we shall all the more understand and revere his true greatness. No great mystery surrounds him; he never relied on miracles. But he was a man endowed with what has been called uncommon common sense, with tireless

GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION IN PRAGUE, CZECHOSLOVAKIA. THE PROGRAM WAS GIVEN UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE IN THE HISTORIC TOWN HALL. ON THE BALCONY IS THE PRAGUE TEACHERS CHORUS, WHICH SANG THE CZECHOSLOVAKIAN AND AMERICAN NATIONAL ANTHEMS.

22d day of February, 1932, America will celebrate the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. Wherever there are those who love ordered liberty, they may well join the observance of that event. Although he belongs to us, yet by being a great American he became a great world figure. It is but natural that here under the shadow of a stately monument rising to his memory, in the Capital City bearing his name, the country made independent by his military genius, and the Republic established by his statesmanship, should already begin preparations to proclaim the immortal honor in which we hold the Father of our Country.

"It is greatly to be hoped that out of the studies pursued and the investigations made a more broad and comprehensive understanding and a more complete conception of Washington, the man, and his relation to all that is characteristic of American life may be secured. It was to be expected that he would be idealized by his countrymen. His living at a industry, with a talent for taking infinite pains, and with a mind able to understand the universal and external problems of mankind.

"We all share in the benefits which accrued from the independence he won and the free Republic he did so much to establish. We need a diligent comprehension and understanding of the great principles of government which he wrought out, but we shall also secure a wide practical advantage if we go beyond this record, already so eloquently expounded, and consider him also as a man of affairs. It was in this field that he developed that executive ability which he later displayed in the camp and in the council chamber.

"Washington has come to personify the American Republic. He presided over the convention that framed our Constitution. The weight of his great name was the deciding factor in securing its adoption by the States. These results could never have been secured had it not been recognized that he would be the first President. When we realize what it meant to take thirteen distracted colonies, impoverished, envious, and hostile, and weld them into an orderly federation under the authority of a central government, we can form some estimate of the influence of this great man. But when we go further and remember that the Government which he did so much to bring into being not only did not falter when he retired from its administration but withstanding every assault, has constantly grown stronger with the passage of time and has been found adequate to meet the needs of nearly 120,000,000 people occupying half a continent, we can judge something of the breadth and soundness of his statesmanship.

"We have seen many soldiers who have left behind them little but the memory of their conflicts, but among all the victors the power to establish among a great people a form of self-government which the test of experience has shown will endure was bestowed upon Washington, and Washington alone. Many others have been able to destroy. He was able to construct. That he had around him many great minds does not detract from his glory. His was the directing spirit without which there would have been no Independence, no Union, no Constitution, and no Republic. His ways were the ways of truth. He built for eternity. His influence grows. His stature increases with the increasing years. In wisdom of action, in purity of character, he stands alone. We cannot yet estimate him. We can only indicate our reverence for him and thank the Divine Providence which sent him to serve and inspire his fellow men."

It was in this spirit that the celebration was conceived and in the seven succeeding years the following projects were planned and have now taken concrete form.

By a special act, Congress designated Washington's birthplace at Wakefield, Virginia, as a national monument under the administration of the National Park Service, and authorized a contribution of $50,000 toward the expense of restoring the ancient Wakefield estate, and of reproducing the home in which George Washington was born. This farm upon which the first Washington who emigrated from England settled occupies a beautiful site in Virginia upon the Potomac River, approximately 70 miles south of the city of Washington. For many years the property was almost entirely neglected and the original Washington mansion, built about 1718, was burned in 1780 and much of the land was sold.

An even more magnificent memorial is the Mount Vernon Boulevard, a highway from Washington's home at Mount Vernon on the Potomac River to the National Capital, 12 miles upstream. This boulevard, which is being dedicated today, will be a memorial with many features of interest to both Americans and foreigners. Not only will it possess the architectural and engineering requirements of the best highway construction, but it will pass through a country studded with beautiful and historic colonial mansions, and through the city of Alexandria, where almost every building, stone, and ancient tree seems to breathe a spirit of veneration for the name of Washington, who was intimately associated with that city during most of his adult life. Finally, it is proposed to line it with such trees brought from all the States of the Union as may be expected to thrive in this climate. But foremost of all, it will provide a beautiful and dignified approach to the home and tomb of the Father of our Country, and will make these two shrines more accessible to American and foreign pilgrims.

A third memorial which will also be completed this year is the George Washington Memorial Parkway. Congress provided for the preservation of the unique natural beauties of the Potomac River as a most important element of the park system of the National Capital region. Since this park will extend from Mount Vernon, where Washington lived most of his unofficial life, by the Capital City which he founded and which bears his name, to above the Great Falls of the Potomac, including the remains of the old Patowmack Canal, which he organized and the construction of which he supervised, it seems most appropriate that it should be designated by law as the Washington Memorial Parkway.

The ruins of the ancient Patowmack Canal, of which company Washington was the first stockholder and the first president, are the only remaining authenticated structures the building of which Washington is known to have personally supervised as an engineer. It is therefore most appropriate that the engineering profession of the United States has indicated its intention of restoring these old channels and locks to a condition suitable for preservation as a permanent memorial to the first engineer President from the engineers of today.

It has long been the ambition of the American people to build a national capital with a dignity, character and symbolism truly representative of America. The capital was founded by Washington on a site selected by him and bears his name so it is only natural that this commemorative year should have added impetus to the existing desire to beautify it. In the center of the city's central axis stands the Washington National Monument, a built-up obelisk symbolizing in its design and simplicity the elevation and purity of character and the lofty ideals of Washington. Into the inside walls have been set stones from every State and territory of the Nation which he founded together with memorial stones from various organizations and groups of citizens as well as from many foreign countries which have wished to honor Washington. Greece sent a portion of the Parthenon. There are stones from Brazil and Switzerland, Turkey and Japan, Siam, India and China. This year will see the formal dedication of the last two stones installed, those from the State of Idaho and the Territory of Hawaii. In addition the grounds surrounding the monument will be rearranged in more formal style to conform to the landscape treatment of the adjacent parks.

The great Arlington Memorial Bridge across the Potomac River is a project which, with its approaches, a monumental entrance into Arlington Cemetery, and the carrying through and widening of B Street from the Capitol to the bridge, is magnificent. As suggested by President Andrew Jackson nearly a hundred years ago, its majestic arches of sculptured granite will symbolize the perpetual union of North and South. It will connect the Mall with the beautiful Arlington National Cemetery, the historic Arlington Mansion, once the property of George Washington Parke Custis and subsequently the resident of General Robert E. Lee, the vast marble amphitheater, and the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier.

In addition to these Congress has approved a well planned and systematic public building program for the capital and many of these new buildings, which will add greatly to the beauty of the city, will be completed this year. The project includes a building for the Supreme Court, an additional office building for the House of Representatives, a building for the Department of Commerce, and remodeling of the Department of State building to conform to the classic style of its surroundings.

These are the physical expressions of our veneration for the Father of our Country. There are many others which, while less tangible, will nevertheless show the regard in which he is held. The keynote of the whole celebration, educational and spiritual, will be the publication of a definite edition of all the authentic writings of George Washington that have been preserved, the perpetuation of his entire intellectual life. The action of the Government of the United States in fostering this enterprise will thus produce a permanent record of the wisdom, ideals and character of Washington which will be available for the first time to the public through distribution to the libraries of the country. Supplementing this will be an Atlas of Washington's travels prepared under the supervision of the Division of Maps of the Library of Congress. Authentic plans showing all the travels and dwelling places of Washington will thus be designed to bring out the geographic background of his life.

There are naturally many other celebrations to be held during the year throughout the country which are too numerous to mention. All the schools, patriotic societies, organizations of every kind will hold memorial services. A series of twelve stamps each bearing an authentic portrait of Washington has been issued by the Government and will be in use during this year. Special commemorative medals also have been authorized by Congress. A campaign to create interest in forestry and the planting of trees which was a great hobby of Washington's has also been inaugurated. A tremendous movement to stamp out illiteracy throughout the United States has been sponsored by the women's organizations and it is hoped that by the end of this year there will be no one within the territorial limits of the United States who does not possess the rudiments of learning.

This is a brief outline of what is being done in the United States to honor one who was "First in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen. He was second to none in the humble and endearing scenes of private life; pious, just, humane, temperate, and sincere, uniform, dignified, and commanding; his example was as edifying to all around him, as were the effects of that example everlasting."

However, wherever there are Americans today in whatever part of the world, no matter how remote, they are also celebrating this anniversary and I am happy to say that everywhere they are receiving the affectionate assistance of the citizens of the country in which they reside, for Washington long ago ceased to be a purely national hero. All nations have been proud to do him homage for I think it safe to say that no character within memory of man has had such far-reaching effect on the moral and political destiny of the world. His friend and collaborator, Thomas Jefferson, has said: "On the whole, his character was, in its mass perfect, in nothing bad, in a few points indifferent; and it may be truly said that never did nature and fortune combine more perfectly to make a man great, and to place him in the same constellation with whatever worthies have merited from man an everlasting remembrance."

EMINENT HISTORIAN DELIVERS ADDRESS

The main speaker on this program was Dr. Karel Stloukal, eminent historian and educator of Charles University, whose address was entitled, "George Washington, the champion of liberty and democracy." The discourse, which was well received by the large and attentive audience, has been translated as follows:

We meet today to pay a tribute to the memory of a man who was the first national hero of the great American nation but who, as the pattern of a champion of human ideals, is the common property of the whole world. If America has Washington to thank for her liberty and her national consciousness, mankind generally has him to thank for an initiative which inspired all peoples to strive for national self-determination and civic equality.

At the time when Washington first entered the scene of public life the American nation was not yet in existence. The new world, brought through its discovery by Columbus into touch with European civilization, had developed for two hundred and fifty years as a series of colonies founded by adventurers and political and religious exiles drawn from all corners of the Old World. This varied people was still bound by traditions to the lands of its birth from which it took the ideas of its intellectual life and to which it rendered the tribute of its labors as dependent colonists, as subjects of secondary importance. The new ideals of liberty and equality, however, proclaimed by the pioneers of enlightenment in the eighteenth century began to penetrate overseas. Economic dependence and a domination exercised from abroad were, under the influence of the new ideas which permeated a people who had experienced the freedom of the seas and the prairies, felt to be unworthy subjection. There was needed, however, a man who should gather up into one current, as it were, these sporadic and frequently unconscious manifestations of a growing national and civic spirit, who should arouse a consciousness of unity and should organize the as yet undefined yearning for liberty, to convert it into a legal authority ready to take over the responsibility for the conduct of the people's own affairs and fate.

Thanks to a noble patriotism harmoniously combined with perfection of personal qualities, and thanks to the guiding hand of Providence, it was George Washington who became that man. It is universally accepted opinion that seldom in the history of the world have the needs of the situation and the day found so appropriate an instrument for the consummation of the desired aims as the condition of affairs in the English colonies in the latter half of the eighteenth century found in George Washington.

He was a man who, by virtue of his life's career, from his very youth seemed predestined for the great tasks which he was to fulfil. Like the majority of Americans he was the type of a self-made man—the fruit of a practical life. And it is this very fact which makes him the ideal of all truly American hearts. He was born in Virginia, the son of a farmer, and acquired no more than the mere rudiments of a school education. The wide open spaces and the world of adventure were more attractive to him than books. His mind, even as a child, was practical rather than contemplative. The primeval landscapes of Virginia and the profound moral influence of his noble mother inculcated in him a love of liberty and of respect for the opinions of others, together with a firm conviction of the fundamental equality of all individuals both in respect of rights and of duties. On the premature death of his father he quickly found himself thrown upon his own resources. As a youth he had his first adventures in fights with the Indians in the then West, and he worked as a farmer and as a practical surveyor.

From his 20th year he attracted the attention of his compatriots as a brave and skilful soldier in the fights with the French, and when he was 23, such was the confidence placed in him, he was entrusted with the supreme command of all the Virginian forces. Warfare and the organization of an army were the involuntary school for the first portion of the great task to which he was to be called in the service of the whole country. For the second, the civilian portion of the task, he found the necessary preparation in his participation in the public life of Virginia when fighting was over. In his work in the Legislature of Virginia he won great respect through his character and the practical common sense with which he managed public affairs, besides earning the reputation of a progressive agriculturalist and capable trader. He noted the political and economic needs of his countrymen, and had clear views as to how those needs should be met.

At that period the esteem in which he was held already extended beyond the borders of his native colony, but so far there had been nothing in his life that could claim the touch of greatness. His life had till now consisted simply of fulfilling the duties which his environment had laid upon him. In doing so, however, he grew in character and experience, for he fulfilled them conscientiously and honestly.

It was not until the year 1774, when he was already past 40 years of age, that those activities began out of which issued the national and universally revered hero. At that time the conflict between the English colonies in America and the mother country had reached a critical point, leading to open rebellion. In the early stages of the movement for the independence of the American colonies Washington played no outstanding rôle. He was merely one of the Virginian delegates to the general congress of the colonies, and his influence probably lay rather in his wealth and social standing than in anything he had done. The decisive influence at the congress was wielded by men who were better known and more prominent in political life, but Washington had a clear conception of what was coming, and as a soldier at once made preparations for the struggle which he regarded as a righteous one, although he still allowed for the possibility of a peaceful solution of the conflict.

The outbreak of open hostilities in 1775 immediately raised Washington to the position of a leader. The reputation which he enjoyed as an experienced soldier and organizer of the Virginia militia coupled with political reasons which called for the appointment of a man from the Southern colonies as commander of the united army, resulted in his unanimous election as head of the defensive forces of the rebellious States. Washington accepted, it is true, with some hesitation, conscious as he was of the grave responsibility; but to a man of his character it was characteristic never to shirk duties laid upon him.

The duties facing him were truly such as called for a great man. The colonies had, it is true, excellent human material—trained riflemen and fearless fighters, but not an army accustomed to organization and discipline. They lacked equipment, munitions, supplies and the financial means for a long struggle. In meeting these conditions Washington proved himself an organizer of real genius. The formation of an army capable of giving battle to the regular troops of the English was his first great accomplishment.

His second, no less outstanding, accomplishment was his conduct of the war itself. He struggled for eight years against forces superior in number, better equipped and led by schooled officers, undeterred by failure or intrigue, displaying the utmost self-denial, perseverance and devotion. His success was not secured by splendid victories or deeds of military brilliance but by never-yielding perseverance and determination of character even in the worst situations.

The Americans were of course favored in their struggle by a number of fortunate circumstances and the effective moral and material support of European countries at that time hostile to England—including in particular the powerful financial and military aid given by France—but the triumph was, after all, the work of the American people themselves and, among them, of George Washington in particular. Without his perseverance and devotion, without his moral authority which held together both the troops and the civic population in a united effort for the attainment of the real goal, complete triumph would hardly have been achieved.

Having liberated his country after this long and stern struggle Washington laid down his post as commander in December, 1783, and retired to his home at Mount Vernon as a simple citizen who had merely fulfilled his duty. His troops offered him a royal throne, but Washington as a convinced democrat rejected the offer with indignation—he wished to serve not to rule his native country. It was at this moment of temptation that the pure, unselfish character of Washington found its most typical expression. The moment showed, however, his foresight—he spared his country much chaos and gave the whole world an example of how to secure a healthy development of human society along the path of genuine democracy.

The liberated country, however, needed further service from Washington. The deliberations concerning a constitution for the now independent colonies raised him in 1787 once again to a post of leadership. He presided over the discussions of the convention, and to his authority alone is to be attributed that the individual delegates and States adopted the first really democratic constitution that the world has to show, a constitution which no longer recognized class distinctions or privileges of property, and became a model for all democracies throughout the world.

His election as president of the newly organized United States followed as a matter of course. As President, the task which awaited him was a more difficult one than any he had hitherto undertaken—to build up a nation out of the people and secure their existence as a national state. To evoke in a people following the most varied interests, a consciousness of unity; to give them a common ideal and to educate them to the discipline of law and mutual esteem was the endeavor which Washington undertook with success in the two terms of his presidency. He gave to America and to the whole world for all time the model of a democratic president, impartial and unselfish, but he did more—he marked out a path of democracy for all nations to follow. He succeeded in gathering around him the representatives of all parties and making devoted collaborators of them, and he was never so firm and decided as in the hours of greatest trial. The peaceful course of the early years of the new federated State was without doubt due to him.

He experienced, of course, disappointment and ingratitude on the part of a section of the people, especially in regard to his attitude of neutrality in the war between England and France, but he persevered calmly, conscious of his responsibility for the fortunes of the State and the nation. When he refused to be a candidate for a third term of office, he emphasized in his farewell address the principles of a healthy development for America as he saw them and which are still the leading ideas of the American nation.

Even after his retirement to his beloved Mount Vernon he continued to be the supreme authority in the nation. Once again his services were called for, this time in the conflict with France. Washington, always ready to serve, did not reject the call and volunteered his services. A year later, on December 14, 1799, Washington died, and closed an eventful career of service to his country.

Wilson has called Washington "the finest character of his day," and in truth it is above all the shining and unique character of Washington which was the source of his successes and of all the gifts for which America and the world owe him their gratitude. There were possibly more splendid talents to be found among his contemporaries in the great century of enlightenment, but for purity of character Washington is unquestionably the first man of his time. He also ranks first in the results of his work. America would ultimately have been discovered even without Columbus, but the United States would never have come into being without Washington, at any rate not in the form in which it actually did. Washington imprinted on his country for all time the seal of his own noble personality. America in her ideals is to this day the America of George Washington. His work did not come to an end with his life; his moral influence is imperishable, no true American fails to reflect it, and it still fills with admiration the whole of mankind irrespective of nationality.

Character was Washington's genius. Nature herself bestowed on him the gifts essential for the great tasks to which Providence and his nation called him. He was an imposing figure—unusually tall, a nobly modelled head with intellectual face, a kindly but serious countenance impelling respect and distance. His personality was a harmonic synthesis of all the qualities essential in a leader—mental equilibrium in all circumstances, calm deliberation, breadth of view and knowledge of people, and unselfishness that knows no empty ambition or jealousy of the success of others.

The Czechoslovak nation had special reasons for celebrating the Bicentenary of the birth of George Washington. The example of the American people's determination to achieve independence by their own effort was an impulse to the endeavors of the Czechoslovaks to recover their liberty. America, the fruit of activities conducted in the traditions of Washington, gave the Czechoslovaks moral and direct support in this struggle. At the decisive moment, Woodrow Wilson, nobly maintaining the tradition and ideals of Washington, laid the weight of his authority—which was that of all America—in the scales to enable the just demands of the Czechoslovaks to be fulfilled. The American Czechoslovaks, devoted to Washington's ideals of liberty and equality, contributed substantially to the liberation of their old native land. The first Declaration of Czechoslovak Independence took place on American soil in the historic Independence Hall at Philadelphia. Finally, the constitution which Washington gave America was one of the direct bases of the Czechoslovak Constitution, while the path of democracy marked out for the United States by Washington is the path along which Czechoslovakia too has decided to proceed in the realization of her national ideals and in bringing those ideals into close conformity with the ideals of all mankind.

Washington's spirit of liberty and civic equality, the spirit of democracy and international solidarity in the universal ideals of all mankind are a heritage of direct apostolic significance. This is the spirit which marks the safest path towards the peaceful evolution of civilization.

At the conclusion of Dr. Stloukal's address the program was brought to a close by the singing of the Czechoslovak and the American national anthems by the Teachers' Chorus of Prague. The chorus, well-known throughout central Europe, toured the United States in 1930, and its rendition of the Star Spangled Banner apparently deeply impressed the gathering.

MASARYK BROADCASTS ADDRESS

Later in the evening, President Masaryk delivered an address over the radio which was transmitted to the United States and broadcast over a nation-wide hook-up. Mr. Hibbard introduced President Masaryk to the American people with the following tribute:

I am sure it will be a pleasure to the radio listeners of the United States to hear this address by the President of Czechoslovakia, His Excellency Dr. Thomas G. Masaryk, who will speak to you from his study in the Hradcany Palace of Prague which has been the scene of so many historic incidents in the life of this country. Dr. Masaryk needs no introduction to Americans as he has spent much time in the United States where he has become thoroughly familiar with our institutions and our people for whom he has always expressed the greatest sympathy and affection. In 1878 in Boston he married Miss Alice Garrigue, one of our countrywomen, who was his constant and loyal helpmate through many years. At present Dr. Masaryk occupies a unique position in the world as he is the only president of a republic elected by and with the consent of the people for life; and I think it singularly fitting that he has graciously consented to broadcast a message today when we are celebrating the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. For, in his own successful struggle for the independence and welfare of our sister Republic, Czechoslovakia, he has paralleled the ideas and ideals of George Washington. He remains the wise counsellor who through the splendor of his character, the worth of his talents, and the wisdom of his judgment has won the love and veneration of his countrymen, the respect and admiration of the world.

I now present to you Dr. Masaryk.

President Masaryk then said:

I thank the broadcasting corporation for giving me this worthy opportunity of speaking to the American public on this great American day.

When I approached America the first time I tried to remember all I had learned about the American Revolution. Since this first visit to America I have followed her development with eager interest, studying the country several times on the spot. At the end of the war I worked in Washington with President Wilson for the liberation of our nation. I could not help thinking about America and her relation to Europe.

Washington's military and political career is the anticipation of new America and her development.

Two years before the Declaration of Independence he stated "that no such thing as independence is desired to any thinking man in all North America," but soon after this he was elected as the first President of the Independent Republic.

Washington as an English officer, fought the French; but some years later he fought with the French against the English, until their final surrender. And in the World War the Americans fought again with the French and their Allies on French, on European soil. What vicissitudes of history!

Washington, having fought England, advocated peace with England, realizing, that America had to add something new to the old order of things. So I understand his declaration, "I want an American character," and his policy of neutrality during the French Revolution. He was right at that time, for the new American Republic had her own difficulties to overcome; he was right in his admonition against entangling alliances.

Washington teaches us that any revolution can be only a means to a clearly conceived aim, and that the fortunate outcome of a revolution depends on the moral and political preparation of the revolutionists.

Washington understood that a new regime replaces the old one slowly, step by step. I think, this is a fair explanation of his conservatism.

I admire Washington's silent energy and perseverance; his qualities enabled him to stand the attacks of his numerous adversaries and not to lose his faith in the independence of his country after many defeats caused by the weakness of his Army. "Defeat is only a reason for exertion" was the wise maxim of the man of Valley Forge. It is inspiring to see how Washington in fighting, reformed his unprepared army.

Washington's cautious and precise common sense judgment anticipated the political dictum of Havlicek, our Czechoslovak Hamilton, demanding simply an honest and sensible policy. Washington also avoided subjection to narrow partisanship.

His reluctance to enter political service is proof of his lively conscience and deep sense of responsibility. He loathed politics inspired by ambition, thirst for power, commercialism; democracy also imposes the duty of leading.

Washington valued above all, as he has expressed it, "the inestimable blessing of liberty"; liberty, that is the fundamental principle of the American Republic. It is seen in the Federal system of the central government of America, in the "indissoluble union," as Washington has formulated it. Since the War the Federation of the states and nations is the general desire of Europe, finding its practical expression in the League of Nations. Democracy means federation in interior and foreign policy of the states. From the economic point of view democratic federation means striving for a national division of all national labor. And of course, individuals and nations must produce not only bread, but also thought, ideas, ideals.

Speaking of Washington, I cannot omit mention of Lady Washington, as she often has been called, "the first American woman assisting the first American President, first in war, and first in peace."

In November, 1918, I sailed from New York to Europe having been nominated President of the new Czechoslovak Republic—and there again the French gift to the American people stirred my thoughts of America and Washington very vividly, for I went to visit England and France, the two countries George Washington had to deal with. And it was the last time, I watched from the boat the Statue of Liberty, the silhouette of New York and the shores of America. My whole lifetime's thought about the relation of America to Europe led me to the conviction, that the Union of America and Europe in the revolution, just as in the World War, proves that America is the natural continuation and prolongation of Europe, that Europe and America are bound together; I see the mutual penetration of both continents in all departments of life: Europeanization of America—Americanization of Europe—are two expressions of the same historical process. It is not a question of political alliances, it is a question of loyal collaboration.

Washington seems to me the impersonation of this development, and from my own life's experience I know, how a European can be Americanized. I learned from America, because I like the country.

In conclusion, I gratefully mention the aid of the American Republic given us in the War. When we severed the bonds binding us to the old Hapsburg monarchy, I was aware that our decision must not be less motivated than the resolution taken by the founder of American liberty.

And having recovered our liberty we again follow the example of Washington in that we must no longer feel the old antagonism and anger which originated in the suppression of our liberty.

It is one of the great experiences of my life that I was allowed to proclaim the principles of our revolutionary liberation in Independence Hall, the place where Washington and his friends used to meet.

My hearty wishes to the American people!

The Bicentennial was not allowed to pass without its social function which took place on February 23 as an afternoon reception given by Mr. Hibbard at the Spolecensky Club. The reception, termed by the newspapers of Prague as the "most brilliant event of the Washington calendar," was attended by about 500 guests, including the President of Czechoslovakia, the Archbishop of Prague, various Cabinet officers, and members of the Czechoslovak government, the diplomatic corps, and many representative citizens of Prague.

All the leading Czechoslovak newspapers printed from time to time articles on George Washington and the great celebration in his honor, using for this purpose material supplied by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. In addition to these articles, many others appeared, prepared by eminent Czechoslovak writers, all of which aided materially in arousing and maintaining interest in the Bicentennial Celebration throughout the republic.

As a mark of its own appreciation for George Washington, the Municipal Council of Prague named a prominent street of that city in honor of the great American hero—a lasting memorial to the man who in all lands typifies the highest ideal of human liberty and justice.

IRISH FREE STATE

UED by foremost officials and citizens and assisted by American diplomats and residents, the Irish Free State during 1932 celebrated, in an unprecedented manner, the Bicentennial of the birth of George Washington. The Celebration was in keeping with Free State tradition, for that part of Ireland, now officially known as the Irish Free State, has always held George Washington in high regard.

Thomas Moore, a Dubliner of Washington's own time and a great Irish wit and literary genius, said of him:

"How shall we rank thee upon Glory's page?

Thou more than a soldier and just less than a sage?"

And William P. Carey, also a contemporary of Washington, wrote:

"In whatever light we view the character of this truly great man we are struck with the fresh cause for esteem and admiration we every moment discover. New and shining traits of humility—of wisdom and disinterested heroism."

From the Government of the Irish Free State, through its Legation in Washington, came the following message to the Secretary of State, pledging Ireland's cooperation in the Bicentennial Celebration at the outset:

Irish Free State Legation
Washington, D. C.

22nd February, 1932.

The Hon. Henry L. Stimson
The Secretary of State of the United States
Washington, D. C.
Sir:

I have been instructed by my government to transmit to you the following message on the occasion of the Bicentenary of the Birth of George Washington:

"The Irish Government associate themselves most heartily with the Government of the United States in celebrating the Bicentenary of George Washington.

"Men of Irish race have played such an important part in the building up of the great nation founded by George Washington that Ireland has inscribed him on the role of her own national heroes. That is the highest honour which Ireland can bestow."

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your most obedient humble servant,
M. MACWHITE.

During 1932, there was an American Day at the great Cork Agricultural and Industrial Fair, at which a tree was planted in the Quadrangle of the fair grounds honoring "the greatest American." A Washington birthday dinner at the home of the American Minister at Dublin, Honorable F. A. Sterling, brought together the Irish officials from the President down and a long list of notables from other countries. Celebrations were held at the American Consulates in Cobh and Dublin.

One of the leading papers in Ireland, THE IRISH PRESS, as if mindful of the feeling in the hearts of the Irish people for George Washington, stated on January 14, 1932: "No country more so than Ireland can unite in the fervour of national gratitude in the celebration of the day (Washington's birthday). For, as Cardinal Gibbons once said, if the old World owes much to Columbus for discovering a new one, the Irish owe much to Washington for creating a new home for their exiles."

MR. LESLIE WOODS, AMERICAN CONSUL AT COVE, PLANTING A TREE IN HONOR OF GEORGE WASHINGTON AT THE FAIR GROUNDS, CORK, IRELAND.

BICENTENNIAL BANQUET IN DUBLIN

The Governor General of the Irish Free State, James McNeill, President William T. Cosgrave, the Minister for External Affairs, the Chief Justice, the Lord Mayor of Dublin, the Earl of Meath, the Earl of Fingall, Lord Glenavy, Father Finlay, the French and German Ministers, the Chargé d'Affaires of the Apostolic Nunciature, the British and American Trade Commissioners, the American Consular officers from Dublin, Belfast, Cobh, and Queenstown, and many other prominent Irish and Americans convened at the American Legation in Dublin on the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington to honor his name. The American Minister, Hon. F. A. Sterling, was the host. Red, white, and blue floral decorations and the tri-colored flags of the two nations gave a patriotic air to the events, and the menu of the dinner further recalled the meaning of the day in the serving of such courses as Virginia ham and ice cream à la Valley Forge.

The American Minister reported that the dinner was followed by "four ideal after-dinner speeches of about one minute each given by Mr. Sterling, the Governor General, President Cosgrave, and W. B. Yeats, the dramatist."

The speakers all paid high tribute to Washington and testified to the sincerity of the amicable relations existing between the Irish Free State and the United States of America.

On the same evening Mrs. H. H. Balch, wife of the American Consul General, entertained the American ladies in Dublin at a George Washington bridge party.

On February 27, 1932, further emphasis was placed on the George Washington year at a "George Washington leap year dance" in the Consul General's home.

A supper, prepared by members of the Consulate staff, was served late in the evening, and the event terminated on a Bicentennial note with the dancing of the Virginia Reel.

GEORGE WASHINGTON PRAISED

Mr. Sterling attached to his report of the above mentioned events to the State Department one of the most eulogistic articles concerning Washington and the Bicentennial printed in any foreign newspaper. The article which is reprinted in full appeared in THE IRISH PRESS, Dublin, of January 14, 1932, entitled WASHINGTON'S IRISH COMRADES, written by W. B. Doyle:

This year, which brings around many notable commemorations of men whose life work will always be remembered with undying gratitude, will hear the name of George Washington acclaimed in many lands besides the one which honours him as its first President and foremost citizen. In a few days hence not only the great cities and universities of the Republic which he helped to found, but every little town and village in it, will pay its meed of praise to him.

Preparations are far advanced by all the organizations, historical, academic, political, educational and municipal, to make February 22 a day of national rejoicing. The date will mark the bicentenary of his birth, and the lover of liberty, whether he lives under democratic or despotic rule, will feel his heart beat faster as he recalls the name of Washington and all that it stands for in the history of human freedom.

No country more so than Ireland can unite in all the fervour of national gratitude in the celebration of the day. For, as the late Cardinal Gibbons once said, if the Old World owes much to Columbus for discovering a new one, the Irish owe much to Washington for creating a new home for their exiles.

Ireland always has gladly acknowledged her indebtedness; her children in a spirit of filial fealty to the land of their adoption have given brain and muscle to the service of the Republic no less earnestly than the Irish soldiers who distinguished themselves in the struggle for independence, and won the special thanks of their Commander-in-Chief for the bravery they exhibited.

In the history of the last century and a half no name has attained a greater lustre. As the years pass by, one sees the character and personality of the man stand out in greater splendour. The difficulties which faced him in the great adventure of his life were colossal—relatively even more formidable than those which confronted any of the generals on either side in the European War. With Washington there was an element of uncertainty in the loyalty and competence of his officers, which never vexed the souls of those responsible for the conduct of the Great War. Reading today in the clear light of history with what strategic foresight and resourcefulness he planned the distribution and operations of his troops, one finds it hard to determine whether to admire most the generalship he displayed, or his serene contempt for the unworthy insinuations and rumours which some of his officers spread among the rank and file of the army.

The magnanimity of the man stands out inviolate against all the attempts to besmirch it; his motives and designs throughout the changing fortunes of the campaign defy the most captious criticism, and in all phases of the struggle he proves himself a leader, self-reliant, chivalrous, and stern, but generously considerate in the handling of his men. A commander less gifted with those qualities would have hardly retained the confidence of his soldiers during the awful winter of 1777-78 in Valley Forge.

As patriot, soldier and statesman, his life has lessons which politicians of today might profitably study. They will find underlying all his actions, principles of morality and fair dealing, uncontaminated by the sordid considerations of expediency and aggrandisement which enter so much into international affairs today. Simple, but sublime, his aim was to weld together under one constitutional government, which recognised no social difference in the mixed population, the thirteen disaffected States, to make them severally independent of each other, and free from all foreign domination.

In Byron's burning words, lovers of liberty the wide world over know that Washington's a watchword, such as ne'er

They will feel, not as Southey said of him: "His awful memory, a light for after time," but that his name and achievements shall be an inspiration and a hallowed memory which will imbue the people of every race and urge them on to the goal of national independence. Ireland must always rejoice in the part that her exiled sons took in Washington's glorious enterprise.

No other country, either in numbers or enthusiasm, furnished such support to the Republican cause. No mercenary spirit drew the Irish exiles to the standard of their Chief. In him they saw an emancipator who would make the land of their adoption a nursery of freemen, and which ere long would set a limit to British absolutism. Since that day in May of 1775 when the Congress assembled in Philadelphia sounded the call to arms; and since Patrick Henry declared: "We must fight! An appeal to arms and to the God of Hosts is all that is left to us," and Washington, no less determined, wrote in a letter, "A brother's sword has been sheathed in a brother's breast," and then, in slow, impassioned words, asked—"Can a virtuous man hesitate in his choice?"

When one thinks of the invincible spirit that bore up the Commander-in-Chief during those years which saw privation, mutiny, and treachery in his army, one must always associate with him those staunch, heroic Irishmen whose loyalty could not be subverted by suffering. Cornwallis's surrender at Yorktown would never have been a fait accompli but for the valour with which they hurled themselves against his outposts. Only a few weeks before that decisive day in October, 1781, cabal and intrigue were busy trying to weaken the authority of Washington. With his Irish soldiers they found no countenance. Between the general and his faithful Irish followers the ties of trust and confidence became only stronger; and when the time came for acknowledging the support accorded him, with what warm and generous words he singles out the Irish regiments.

With his military spirit, he could not fail to know their worth as fearless fighters, and their devotedness as men of honour. Not only Washington himself, but all his contemporaries who have written of the war, bear testimony to the courage and courtesy of the Irish troops, and Irish sailors. The most reliable testimony as to the number of Irish soldiers was furnished by Joseph Galloway, who had been Speaker in the Pennsylvania Assembly before the war, and after the publication of the Declaration of Independence turned loyalist and came to live in England. When called to give evidence before a committee of the House of Commons in 1779 about the origin and conduct of the war, he said, in answer to a question as to the composition of the rebel army: "I can assert with precision there were scarcely one-fourth native Americans, about one-half were Irish, the other fourth were English and Scotch."

Thomas Addis Emmet, grandnephew of Robert Emmet, in an address before the American-Irish Historical Society in January, 1899, referring to Galloway's testimony, said: "He might have stated more in detail that one-fourth were composed of sons of England, very few Scotch, and more Germans and Dutch, as they were called, from Pennsylvania and the Valley of Virginia"; and, speaking as one who had made exhaustive investigations into the personnel of the different regiments, he added, "I have computed that about one-fourth of all the American officers, and even a larger proportion of those men more trusted by Washington, were Irish, by birth or descent." According to William James MacNevin, a careful compiler of facts, there were 16,000 Irish Catholics.

There is overwhelming evidence that Irishmen at home and abroad espoused the cause of the rebel colonists. Burke approved of the action of his fellow countrymen in New England; as a member of the British House of Commons he delivered one of the most historic indictments of British rule on record; while Luke Gardiner, in a debate on national commerce in the Irish Parliament, asserted that America was lost to England by the Irish, a declaration which was soon after repeated in the British House of Commons by William Pitt. "Those emigrants," affirmed Gardiner, "are fresh in your recollection. I am assured by the best authority that the major part of the American army was composed of Irish, and that the Irish language was more commonly spoken in the American army than English. I am also informed that it was their valour determined the contest, so that England had America detached from her by force of Irish regiments." And it is for that reason that Ireland venerates the name of Washington, and in a double sense treasures the memory of her soldier-exiles, for as Bancroft, the American historian, states, "the success of America brought emancipation to Ireland, which had suffered more than the States from Colonial policy." During his first term of office Washington gladly acknowledged the services of his Irish soldiers, but it was not until years after his death, when his war diary was published by an Irish-American writer, that his appreciation of their unswerving loyalty was revealed.

INDEPENDENCE DAY CELEBRATED

July 4, 1932, was "American Day" at the Great Irish Agricultural and Industrial Fair in Cork, Irish Free State. Setting the seal of timeliness and international good will on the occasion, Irish authorities synchronized the celebration, which recalled the 156th anniversary of the Declaration of American Independence, with the Bicentenary of the First President of the United States. To inaugurate the festivities the American Consul at Cobh, Hon. Leslie Woods, was made honor guest at a George Washington-Independence Day luncheon at the fair. The Lord Mayor of Cork and other Free State dignitaries were patrons. The luncheon was followed by a tree planting ceremony in honor of George Washington which was held on the quadrangle of the fair grounds.

The chairman of the fair publicity committee, Mr. J. J. Bruen, who presided at the luncheon, declared that it afforded him great pleasure to welcome the American Consul who had endeared himself to the Irish people, and continuing said:

We celebrate today the 156th anniversary of the Declaration of American Independence, but there is also to be linked with this occasion the Bicentenary of George Washington. It is therefore fitting that those connected with the great national exhibition in Ireland should welcome representatives of the United States at such festivals as these.

Furthermore, there is scarcely a home in this country that has not sent forth some member of its household to take his or her place among the people of the great republic of the West and so our national bonds are strengthened by our home ties.

The Chairman asked all present to arise and drink a toast to George Washington and the United States of America.

Hon. B. M. Egan, T. C., in supporting the toast, declared that the bonds of friendship between America and Ireland were unbreakable, adding:

What Irishmen look forward to is the development of relations between the two countries, so that the change which is certainly coming in the economic affairs of America might be reflected in the Free State.

He pointed out that by celebrating a day such as the American Day at the Irish fair, visiting Americans would be brought to realize what Ireland was capable of in the way of native production. The speaker recalled his visit to America in 1930 and said that the greatest compliment paid to him was an invitation to luncheon where the chief item on the menu was Irish bacon.

Replying to the toast and supporting address, the American Consul classified the occasion as a truly memorable one, continuing:

This day throughout the length and breadth of the United States of America and in every spot throughout the world where Americans are congregated, honor is being done to the memory of that extraordinary and exalted character, George Washington. Nothing that I can say can possibly add to the luster that surrounds his name, which, on his death, was accorded permanent position among the great names of the world. . . .

The day's manifestation of good will by the Executive Committee of the Irish Agricultural and Industrial Fair is nothing short of inspirational. The fair is truly a national exhibition, inasmuch as it knows no barriers to the whole of Ireland. It is an outstanding tribute of the good feeling existing between two countries—Irish Free State and the United States of America—and American citizens are deeply appreciative of the special day doing honor to their country and the memory of their First President. It is to be hoped that visitors from the United States coming to the fair in the future will profit by the unusual facilities afforded them of understanding the Emerald Isle and its capabilities as well as making their stay in Cork the more pleasant.

Immediately after the luncheon the guests repaired to the Quadrangle of the Fair Grounds where a large crowd of spectators had collected to witness the tree planting ceremony. The American Consul filled in the earth about the cherry tree planted in honor of George Washington, while the Army Band of the Irish Free State played the "Star Spangled Banner" and the crowd stood at attention. The tree-planting operation was finished with a silver trowel suitably engraved and presented later to Consul Woods by the Fair Committee.

The Lord Mayor, addressing those present, extended a hearty welcome to the American Consul and his colleague on behalf of the citizens of the country.

It is to be hoped that the tree you have planted on this Independence Day-Bicentennial celebration on Irish soil will grow even as the friendship of Ireland with America during the past one hundred years. I hope that every branch will spread out as an arm of friendship across the large stretch of ocean that divides the two countries. I can assure the American Consul that there has been planted this day in the hearts of all Irishmen a very sincere regard for the American nation.

Consul Woods responding, declared that the Executive Committee of the Fair, by spontaneously appointing this American Day has paid a very gracious compliment of outstanding importance to his country, continuing:

The day commemorates America's greatest national hero, and there is very good reason for the great friendship existing between Ireland and the United States to which the Lord Mayor has just referred, inasmuch as Irishmen have contributed in large measure to the success of the American nation not only in recent history but when America was laying its foundation. The army of George Washington was made a more determined and loyal organization by the presence therein of many sturdy men from this Isle. At all times in its history Ireland has proved its friendship for America, and Americans trust that there will never be a breach of that friendship but that it will grow and increase as the years go by.

The Cork, Dublin, and Cobh newspapers gave the event a place of importance in their columns, and it is largely from THE CORK EXAMINER that the facts of the above record were taken.

The fourth of July celebration, recorded above, was the climax of a series of George Washington events held under the sponsorship of Consul Woods. In a letter of June 9, 1932, to the Bicentennial Commission, Mr. Woods outlines the previous celebrations as follows:

I take pleasure in informing you that although there is, properly speaking, no American Colony at Cobh, which is a town of 7,000 people, nor for that matter at Cork, sixteen miles away, which is the chief city of Province of Munster, I have had so far three celebrations and I am planning the fourth. The celebrations that I have already held were three dinners to which were invited the principal Americans who could be reached and a number of the leading personages of Cork City and vicinity. These included presidents of chambers of commerce, military, police, judicial and other civil authorities.

In the same letter Consul Woods says:

As you well know, there is a very strong tie of kinship between the people of Ireland and a considerable portion of those in the United States, and the War of Independence was followed with notable interest by the Irish of that time. An interesting note in this connection is that Cornwallis, after his defeat at Yorktown, at the close of the War of American Independence, was at some time later appointed Viceroy of Ireland at Dublin.

NICARAGUA

NICARAGUA participated in the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration with a spirit and zest that was both surprising and pleasing. Messages of congratulation and felicitation were sent to our President, Secretary of State and Congress; February 22 and 23 were declared national holidays in Nicaragua; there were Bicentennial parades, balls, receptions and meetings.

The following messages were sent—from President Moncada to President Hoover; from the Minister of Foreign Affairs, A. Somoza, to Secretary of State Stimson; from the Congress of Nicaragua to the Congress of the United States:

MILITARY BICENTENNIAL PARADE

The highlight of the Bicentennial Celebration observances in Managua, the Capital City of Nicaragua, was a military parade which took place on February 22. Before nine o'clock in the morning, the newspaper DIARIO MODERNO reports, crowds began to gather on the parade grounds. In a few minutes some two thousand people had collected in the great square opposite the Presidential Palace. At nine-fifteen, the President of Nicaragua, General Jose M. Moncada, arrived and was escorted to the place of honor at the reviewing stand. The President was accompanied by the Under Secretary of Foreign Affairs, General Anastasio Somoza, the Secretary of the Government, Dr. Antonio Flores Vega, and Brigadier General R. C. Berkeley, commander of the United States Marines stationed in Managua. Already present at the reviewing stand were the Vice President of the Republic, Dr. Enoc Aguado, the Minister of Public Instruction and Agriculture, Dr. Antonio Barquero, the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States Legation, Willard Beaulac, the British Chargé d'Affaires, Mr. L. L. Leach, and a group of United States army officers.

When the President and General Berkeley had taken their places at the reviewing stand the Fifth Regiment of the Second Division of the United States Marines marched on the field while a squadron of twelve tri-motor planes maneuvered overhead. The United States flag and the regimental colors flew in the breeze. With the troops standing at attention, President Moncada and General Berkeley rose from their seats and proceeded to the field accompanied by their staffs.

Dr. W. T. Brown, of the United States Medical Corps, was ordered to step forward and receive a decoration. The national anthems of Nicaragua and the United States were played and after a short address by General Somoza in which he said that the reward was being made in recognition of services during the earthquake of March 31, 1931, President Moncada pinned the Presidential Medal of Merit on Major Brown.

Later in the day a reception by the United States colony was held at the Service Club. Nicaraguan and United States officials as well as prominent residents attended this function.

NEWSPAPERS ENTHUSIASTIC

The newspapers of Nicaragua on February 22 and 23 were devoted largely to news items and editorials on George Washington and the Bicentennial Celebration. Appearing in LA NOTICIA and other papers on February 23 was the following statement by President Moncada:

The memory of Washington stirs the North American people to the depths of their being in appreciation of the tribute of admiration of the inhabited world, because the Liberator of the United States of America gave a national soul to his country and an example to all the other nations of the Earth. His fame rests not on his military triumphs, not on his government which merited the blessings of his people, but on his deep love for the Liberty of America.

The same newspaper reports among other Bicentennial items that all persons arrested for minor offenses on February 22 and 23 were pardoned by the Chief of Police in memory of George Washington.

In the DIARIO MODERNO on February 23 appeared an article in praise of George Washington which was written by the Vice President of Nicaragua, E. Aguado. The article, in translation, is here reprinted:

Washington is not merely an American but a World figure. The time and circumstances in which he was called into action show that he belongs among those who are predestined to fame. He was not a scholar or a philosopher. Contrary to what might be expected, since he belonged to the aristocracy of the period, he was not educated in the mother country as was the custom. His school was the school of life, the world of affairs, and hard work.

Of an impetuous nature, though at the same time thoughtful and persevering, from his earliest years he showed enterprise and a genius for organization; and since business affairs and war were intimately allied he naturally adopted a military career. His activities in the French and Indian War revealed his remarkable talents. Strange was it, indeed, as Thackeray pointed out, that a young Virginian officer firing a shot in some savage wilderness should start a war that lasted for sixty years, affect the whole country and, passing to Europe, cost France her American colonies, create a great Republic to be the admiration of the Old World, and an example to the New, and that among the thousands of human beings engaged in this great struggle, he who gave the signal for the first shot should receive the supreme reward.

Washington's early military, commercial and agricultural activities brought him into intimate contact with the men and problems of his time. He knew the people, their needs, their aspirations, their psychology, and was himself known, appreciated and respected by them. That is why he was such an outstanding man and why at the first Continental Congress in 1774 Patrick Henry could say of him "if you speak of solid information and sound judgment, Colonel Washington is unquestionably the greatest man on that floor."

These were the characteristics and these the circumstances that made him the creator of a nation. His ideals and his temperament made possible the work of organization. One would have thought him an old crusader experienced in political and social battles. His love and devotion to democracy were unswerving. Few have had such confidence in the success of democracy or worked for it so unremittingly as Washington. Devotion to his ideals and unshaken faith in their ultimate attainment are evident in his every action. His personality, so transcendent and conclusive for the destiny of his country and all America, brings up the question of whether men create their social and political environment or are themselves the product of their environment.

What would have become of democracy in America without Washington? Would the United States have become such a successful Republic? Would democracy have triumphed without him? What we admire in him is not only that he created and organized the nation but the remarkable foresight he displayed. In reading some of his masterly writings, one is conscious not only of the greatness of his achievements, but of his wisdom in providing for the future. It was as if he expected to live on in the country he had founded, continuing to be its defender and ruler, like a father provident and unselfish, giving counsel for the future, looking out for his children and providing for their needs.

His character, his devotion to democracy, and his spirit have influenced an entire continent. The Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, wherein his spirit lives and moves, have had an important influence on the organization and destiny of the Hispanic-American nations. If all nations have not benefitted by his influence as much as could be desired, it is not because of any flaw in the doctrine but because of faulty adaptation to varying circumstances. Democratic ideals throughout America are illumined with the light kindled by the Father of his Country, a beacon guiding the organization of a continent.

BLUEFIELDS CELEBRATES WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY

On Saturday night, February 20, 1932, the Tropical Club of Bluefields gave a dance in honor of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington. The club was appropriately decorated for the commemorative event. A large portrait of George Washington, draped with American flags, hung over the central doorway. On one side of the painting in large letters was printed "1732", on the other side "1932". Small flags representing practically every nation were suspended from the ceiling of the clubroom. In an adjoining room a large American flag covered one of the walls. The setting for this Bicentennial dance was beautiful and the event was most successful. It was attended by Government officials, members of the diplomatic corps, officers of the United States Marine Corps and distinguished residents of the city.

PAN AMERICAN DAY MESSAGE

The delegates assembled in Washington on April 14, 1932, to commemorate Pan American Day received the following message from President Moncada, which, together with similar messages from the other Latin-American members of the Union was read at the tomb of George Washington:

Upon each occasion of homage to the memory of Washington, the people of the United States are most profoundly moved by the tribute of admiration offered by the whole civilized world. The Liberator of the United States gave not only liberty to his country but a national spirit that has been an example and an inspiration to the other nations of the earth. This is his greatest achievement. Greater even than his military triumphs, greater than his wise and noble statesmanship, is the desire he carried in his heart for the liberty of all America.

ARTICLE BY PRESIDENT MONCADA IN WASHINGTON PUBLICATION

In the Bicentennial issue, May 30, 1932, of the WASHINGTON TIMES, appeared the following article by President Moncada in praise of George Washington:

Some publishers say that evolution is what determines the great events of history; that nations develop subject to prevailing ideas, and that men are but factors entrusted with reaching the invariable destiny of humanity. But the life of Washington and also of Lincoln, of Cromwell in England, and that of many other heroes of history allow us to know that the will of one, firmly directed in the path of good or the path of evil, can at times change the course of things.

Neither Washington nor the other fathers of American independence thought of any other thing than Right, on rebelling against the imports decreed by England on her colonies; not of the right of absolute independence for English America, but rather of the constitutional guarantees prescribed by the crown itself. The origin of American independence was a case of will and energy, headed by George Washington with a determination rarely seen in human history. And one of the singular characters, worthy of the greatest study and salutary emulation, is the influence that the soul of George Washington exercised in the national soul of the American Union. This has grown in parallel lines with that of the great man.

If at some time the statesmen of the present American generation forget the political decalogue given as a heritage by Washington, the entire nation soon reacts and points out the path, the old path of the most august of men, the founder of American liberty, august for his heroism, his love of morality, liberty and order. The example of Washington is the human model which the United States of American consecrates and which is disseminated throughout the rest of the world; all those who know and study his life and his works, born or educated in any part of the planet, admire and imitate as much as possible the grand ideals of the hero of Mount Vernon; they persist in enlightening their conscience as did the great man, in following his footsteps, in thinking as he thought, feeling as he felt, loving the fatherland with profound fervor, doing good above all other things, sweeping away the thorns from the rugged path of liberty; raising an altar to right and to equality, maintaining alive in the soul the flame that the Creator blew over man.

Everyone reading the life and works of George Washington would like to be capable of realizing in the world the destinies that the United States of America have attained, inspired by him—wrought by an iron will, not known or equalled in the march of the centuries. Washington inspires foreigners with love of country, the ardent desire for defending the fatherland as the most sacred thing in this world. We feel attracted by another sun, which we would like to possess in our confines, illuminating the horizon, giving color and life of hopeless consciences, and reviving those who fall in the continuous struggle for existence.

Washington, with his example, goes beyond the frontiers of the American union, shines in the heart of his fellow citizens, and fills with hope those of his race, as well as those of other races—of hope that maintains our confidence in human kindness, in the future of other nations, in the future of our own. In my opinion, the evolution spoken of by the great philosophers is the work of a few, cultivated in the atmosphere of the collectivity by the life and work of the heroes and not of the multitudes. The soul of the inhabited world is forged by these whom God inspires for the betterment and progress of humanity.

We transcribe in this short writing one of the maxims which all nations should bear in mind:

"Harmony, liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest . . . neither seeking nor granting exclusive favours or preferences; . . . constantly keeping in view that 'tis folly in one nation to look for disinterested favours from another,—that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character."

This generous maxim is at times forgotten by the American nation. In this the soul of George Washington, better say his heritage, has suffered, due perhaps to the present state of the world, and to the growing necessity of the Federal Government.

But we ought not to despair of human kindness. Occasionally remorse of conscience carries us back to the right path, restoring to others that which God gave us in his infinite goodness.

On the anniversary day of the Declaration of Independence, July Fourth, the United States Minister to Nicaragua, Hon. Matthew E. Hanna, held a reception in the United States legation in Nicaragua, followed by a dinner. The reception was attended by four hundred people: Government and municipal officials, members of the diplomatic corps, and the citizens of the United States resident in Nicaragua. The dinner was attended by fifty invited guests.

THE CLOSE OF THE BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION

The Bicentennial Celebration was brought to a successful close in Nicaragua on Thanksgiving Day, November 24. The events of that day were arranged by Minister Hanna and Brigadier General Berkeley, Commander of the United States Marines stationed in Managua. Everywhere the flag of the United States was displayed and the city took on the appearance of a national holiday. A public Thanksgiving service was held in the evening in the Campo de Marte which was attended by prominent officials and distinguished residents. The services were conducted by Commander M. M. Witherpoon, United States Navy, Chaplain of the Marine Brigade. His topic was "Thank God for Today."

The Presidential Thanksgiving Day proclamation in which was contained Washington's first Thanksgiving Day proclamation, was read to the gathering.

YUGOSLAVIA

THROUGH the leaders of their legislative bodies, His Excellency Kosta Kumanudi, President of the Chamber of Deputies, and His Excellency Ante Pavelitch, President of the Senate, the people of Yugoslavia expressed their great admiration for George Washington and concurrently set in motion a series of Bicentennial observances in Yugoslavia that aroused and sustained interest in Washington ideals and their relation to international problems throughout the bicentenary year. The formal message sent to the Congress of the United States follows:

BELGRADE, YUGOSLAVIA
FEBRUARY 22, 1932

THE AMERICAN CONGRESS
WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE SENATE AND NATIONAL PARLIAMENT OF YUGOSLAVIA SEND WARM FELICITATIONS TO CONGRESS ON THE OCCASION OF THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, LIBERATOR, FOUNDER AND ORGANIZER OF THE UNITED STATES, WHO LEFT TO HUMANITY AN ETERNAL EXAMPLE OF THE VIRTUES OF A GREAT CITIZEN AND PATRIOT.

(SIGNED) PRESIDENT CHAMBER KUMANUDI,
PRESIDENT SENATE PAVELITCH.

The leading cities of Yugoslavia joined in the celebration, Washington observances being held in Belgrade, the capital of the nation, Zagreb, Ljubljana, Novisad, Sarajevo, Split, Nish, Cetinje, Subotica, and elsewhere.

Three of these cities, Belgrade, Zagreb and Ljubljana, named streets or squares for Washington.

From the office of the Foreign Minister in Belgrade a record of the Bicentennial in Yugoslavia was forwarded to the Yugoslav Legation in Washington, D. C., and by the Yugoslav Minister, His Excellency, Dr. Leonide Pitamic, it was forwarded to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. This report, one of the most sincere received from the many participating countries, begins by stating:

Yugoslavia cannot unfortunately claim for herself any historical participation by her sons in the work of liberation effected by George Washington, as can other nations such as France and Poland. During the time of America's fight for freedom, the Yugoslav people, under the yoke of foreign domination and in the grip of two empires, were themselves waging a continuous battle to maintain their national individuality, to keep faith with their national vows and keep alive that spirit of freedom which had sustained them through centuries and given them strength to begin an uneven war with two of the great powers of Europe, until 150 years of this strife was crowned with the hard won laurel of liberation.

This struggle of David with Goliath, this victory of faith in right against faith in might, could not but dispose the Yugoslav nation to participate in the fervent celebration of George Washington's memory and simultaneously to celebrate the victory of those powers of justice and truth which George Washington postulated as the foundations of the United States and in which the Yugoslav people trusted in their centuries of struggle.

The celebrations carried out in Yugoslavia in connection with the George Washington Bicentenary can be compared with those for the Centenary of Goethe. No international manifestation in Yugoslavia of recent years has produced so much attention, popular interest and spontaneous expression as this. It was obvious that on this occasion, when the United States was commemorating its greatest man and its most loved and respected son, Yugoslavia and the Yugoslav people wished to seize the opportunity to manifest their sympathies at such an appropriate occasion towards the United States. Yugoslavia had waited such an occasion to render homage as much to the sentiments which actuated the American people in their fight for freedom, as to the memory of the great statesman and army leader himself.

Although there was no lack of official support and participation by Yugoslav authorities in all parts of the country, the Washington's celebration was organized and carried out quite spontaneously and freely. It was not a suggestion that emanated from above, but the work of public bodies and cultural organizations themselves. The whole affair was a genuine national Yugoslav manifestation of friendship for the United States of America.

Never was America so much on the lips and in the heart of a nation as it was in Yugoslavia last February. The Provinces were not behind in their enthusiasm. Besides this the entire Yugoslav press in lengthy articles—which if collected would comprise a full volume—devoted themselves to the historical significance of the occasion and the place occupied by Washington's personality in the life of the American nation.

But there was one special reason which besides so many others influenced the Yugoslavs to participate so wholeheartedly in the celebration of the Bicentenary. There are living in the United States today hundreds of thousands of Yugoslavs who, while remaining loyal citizens of their new and adopted country, keep close contacts with the land of their fathers and live in thought and sentiment with those whom they have left behind. These American-Yugoslavs are a living link binding together the two countries, and making the sentiment between them deeper and closer than any ordinary links of respect and friendship.

To evidence the extent to which Yugoslavia participated in the Washington celebration, some of the manifestations in the main cities may be outlined.

In Belgrade, the Yugoslav Parliament and Senate sent telegrams to the American Congress in tribute to the memory of the man who left to humanity an eternal example of the virtues of a great citizen and loyal patriot. Then in both Houses the daily order was stopped so that members could participate in the solemn commemoration organized with the participation of all public bodies and organizations in Belgrade under the presidency of the Mayor. In the presence of the delegate of H. M. the King of Yugoslavia, the Patriarch of the Serbian Orthodox church and a great concourse of prominent citizens, the Mayor opened the proceedings with a speech in which the life and career of George Washington, his part in the national revolution and his work in the organization of the Republic, were outlined. The chairman emphasized moreover that George Washington did not merely personify the American struggle for freedom and independence, his name does not belong only to material history, but it signified something more. His name is a moral equation of the whole human spirit. He is one of those sacred examples by which generations of all continents learn the civilian virtues. The ethical value of George Washington's life is not less important than its place in history.

"A country such as ours"—declared the chairman—"which sacrificed so much and so unselfishly for her liberty, understands the greatness of this American patriot and fearless warrior."

Following this, the American Minister to Yugoslavia in Belgrade, Dr. John Dyneley Prince, who received a great and hearty ovation, spoke in Serbo-Croat, which he knows very well. He depicted, to his many listeners in the great hall of the National University, the real George Washington whose image is borne in the heart of the American nation, and was expressed in the remembered radio address of President Hoover.

After the Minister's speech, the president of the Belgrade municipality formally announced that the Municipality has decided to give the name of George Washington to one of its leading streets in the heart of the city, an announcement which was received with great applause.

The meeting closed with a dispatch by the Mayor of a telegram of greeting to the United States Congress. In the afternoon the American Legation in Belgrade was literally blocked by persons wishing to express personally their good will to the representatives of the United States. And the expressions of sympathy which were then heard demonstrated very clearly the feeling towards America that exists in the Yugoslav capital.

The American Minister in a dispatch to the Department of State in Washington, D. C., describes the street named in honor of Washington in Belgrade, formerly Vidinska Street, as "the center of three sections of a prominent boulevard extending from Kalemegdan Park at the extreme north limit of the city, through the heart of Belgrade for a distance of approximately two miles."

At the ceremony in Belgrade announcement was also made of the naming of a square in Zagreb and a street in Ljubljana for George Washington.

In reporting this same event the NEW YORK HERALD, European Edition, of February 24, 1932, states:

The ceremony of proclaiming the names of the streets was held under the auspices of the lord mayor of Belgrade at a solemn ceremonial at which more than 1,000 persons, including the entire diplomatic corps, were present.

After the national anthems of Yugoslavia and America, the lord mayor, Dr. Neshitch, delivered an address, emphasizing the fact that, although the name and fame of Washington had hitherto been little known in Yugoslavia, the feeling of close friendship which the United States and Yugoslavia now enjoy made it his pleasant duty to speak on the subject of one of the greatest Anglo-Saxons in history. After the royal band had played an old march dating from the period of Washington, the American minister, Dr. Prince, replied in Serbian, giving a brief study of the character and significance of our great first president.

Then followed the official proclamation of the change of street names in the three cities mentioned above, for which the American minister expressed his deep appreciation.

The ceremony closed with the playing by the royal band of the "Yugoslav March," recently composed by Dr. Prince.

ADDRESS OF DR. PRINCE

Dr. Prince's address was as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:

It is difficult for me to express to you today the deep appreciation which I feel of the honor done by the Yugoslav Government and authorities to my own country and people: first, in naming a street for the founder of our Republic, George Washington, in Belgrade, Zagreb and Ljubljana, on this Two Hundredth Anniversary of his birth, and secondly, for holding this reception this morning, and giving me the opportunity of expressing my thanks, however imperfectly I may do so.

I have published in the press today a brief sketch of the history of Washington, together with an outline of his career, and some estimate of his personal character.

But now, I should like to add certain material which may throw additional light upon and awaken more interest in the family, life and activities of George Washington. The name first appears in ancient English documents in the year 1257, although we hear of the family as Saxon landholders as early as the eleventh century. So far as we can trace the records, they all displayed self sacrifice for King and country, patient endurance during times of oppression, and courage that led to protest—all of which tendencies culminated in America in the War for Independence, beginning in 1775.

Each generation has brought added glory to the name of Washington, and this glory is manifested in resplendent form in the person of George Washington. The great orator Webster said of him:

"America has furnished to the world the character of Washington . . . born upon American soil of parents also born upon it, never for a moment having had a sight of the old world; instructed according to the methods of his time, receiving only the plain but wholesome elementary knowledge which our institutions provided for the children of the people; growing up in and penetrated by the influence of American society, in an even then expanding civilization . . . in our great victory of peace, in the formation of the Union and in the establishment of the Constitution."

In the newspaper article published this morning, I pointed out some of the difficulties with which Washington had to cope during the campaign for Independence. These must be firmly grasped if we are to entertain a true regard for Washington's fame. If we overlook these difficulties, or strive to gloss them over as some of his biographers have done, we may arrive at a very flattering estimate of the virtues of the American colonists, but then, we shall be forced to undervalue the greatness of Washington who, both during and after the war, had, according to the common history of mankind, his hardest difficulties to overcome from within rather than from without.

We must remember that when the United States became independent, it was merely a disjointed collection of colonial governments, some of which had but little sympathy with the others. Jealousy and dissension were rife; no federal power existed, only a Congress of the states assembled in a great emergency to take counsel together and to speak, if possible, with one voice. This first Congress, although it was a body of remarkable distinction, was not a government and lacked all authority and precedent for creating one. In spite, however, of this hindrance, many of the duties and functions of sovereignty were necessarily performed by the first Congress; thus, it took upon itself to create an army, built a fleet, issue paper money, raise loans, make alliances, and assert the independence of the United States. But even then it was acting only upon sufferance and therefore lacked confidence. As a natural result its procedure was feeble and ineffectual. In July, 1776, they issued the Articles of Confederation and perpetual Union. But these remained until March, 1781, without ratification. The very title of this sonorous document merely showed the impotence of the Government. In other words the evil lay in the lack of power. This assembly was merely the council of an alliance; and I must emphasize the remarkable fact that in this situation, Washington alone was able to endure, wearing down the folly and conceit of detractors by his dogged resolution.

So strong did the opposition against Washington become at one dark period that efforts were made to get him to resign; and had he been merely the good man and gentleman which he was and not something much greater, the plan would have had a good chance of success. He was, however, extraordinarily detached. He regarded intrigue and calumny as natural incidents; as things to be reckoned with as floods, frosts, and tempests, that is, without malice. As he had never sought power and honor, but merely followed his duty, he had no motive for resignation, because he was above ingratitude and abuse. He said himself that he would have felt more disgraced in laying down his commission before the clamors of Congress than in laying down his arms to a summons of the British General. It may not be generally known that at about this time a section of the American army and officers, disgusted and disheartened by the treatment they were receiving, offered, by a coup d'etat, to elevate Washington to the kingship; but this he rejected unconditionally. Perhaps the best indication of his character as an organizer who was able not merely by his words and deeds, but by the very force of his personality, to live down opposition, is his circular letter to the Governors of the States at the close of the war, in which, for example, he says:

"There are four things, which, I humbly conceive, are essential to the well-being, I may even venture to say, to the existence of the United States, as an individual power. First. An indissoluble union of the States under one federal head. Secondly. A sacred regard to public justice. Thirdly. The adoption of a proper peace establishment; and Fourthly. The prevalence of that pacific and friendly disposition among the people of the United States, which will induce them to forget their local prejudices and policies; to make those mutual concessions which are requisite to the general prosperity, and in some instances, to sacrifice their individual advantages to the interest of the community."

In his farewell address to his soldiers, George Washington begged them to live as missionaries, preaching the gospel of union and strong government.

Greatly aided by the second greatest American of the day, Alexander Hamilton, Washington was the interpreter of the federal idea in which Hamilton upheld him in the crisis of the struggle. Without diminishing his dignity or his respect, without any abdication or surrender of his personal convictions, Washington placed the whole force of his great influence at the disposal of Alexander Hamilton, who was the first financial expert of the United States, recognizing in Hamilton a genius for statecraft, and without a grudge or afterthought for his own glory,—such alliances are rare—but out of the conjunction great events are apt to be begotten. Washington in his wise optimism held unmoved to the belief that everything would come right at last, and compared the riot and extravagance of the States after the peace to that of a young heir coming prematurely into a large inheritance but who will eventually return to his natural good sense and rebuild his dilapidated fortune.

It is extremely significant to note that when Washington became a candidate for President the second time, he was unanimously elected, no one of his small-minded detractors daring to appear in opposition to this great spirit.

So far from wishing for continuous power, his great ambition was to live among the green forests of his wide plantations on the majestic Potomac, and this was granted to him after his second term as President only for a period of two years, for, worn out by the physical and mental hardships of his great life, he succumbed in 1799 and has for his reward the eternal gratitude and reverence, not only of his fellow countrymen, but also of the descendants of those whom circumstances compelled him to oppose. He is universally looked upon not only as the greatest American, owing to his extreme unselfishness and singleness of purpose, but also throughout the civilized world, as one of history's greatest defenders of that spirit of freedom which may be summed up in a single phrase, the principle of liberty without license and equality without encroachment.

The Mayor of Belgrade, His Excellency, Milan Vashich, sent the following message to the Congress of the United States regarding the Belgrade Washington observance of February 22:

BELGRADE, YUGOSLAVIA
FEBRUARY 23, 1932

THE AMERICAN CONGRESS
WASHINGTON, D. C.

FOLLOWING THE SOLEMN COMMEMORATIVE MEETING HELD IN HONOR OF THE IMMORTAL WASHINGTON ON THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF HIS BIRTH I WISH TO ASSURE THE CONGRESS OF THE DEEP REVERENCE AND SPIRIT OF FRATERNITY BASED ON LOVE OF COUNTRY WHICH WAS UNANIMOUSLY VOICED TODAY.

(SIGNED) MILAN VASHICH,
MAYOR OF BELGRADE.

RECEPTION AT LEGATION

During the afternoon of February 22, 1932, the American Minister was host at a Washington reception held at the American Legation for the American and English colonies in Belgrade. According to Dr. Prince this reception was attended by a delegation from the Yugoslav government, diplomatic representatives of Great Britain, France, Germany, Poland, Hungary, Argentina, and Brazil.

GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION IN BELGRADE. REPRESENTATIVES OF EIGHT NATIONS PARTICIPATED IN THE CEREMONY IN THE GREAT HALL OF THE PEOPLES' UNIVERSITY.

As the guests arrived, the "Washington March," a march of the time of Washington, was played by an orchestra, and on the arrival of the official delegate of the Yugoslav government, Assistant Foreign Minister Bakotich, the two national anthems of Yugoslavia were played. Dr. Prince then addressed the assembled diplomats, linking each country either directly or indirectly with George Washington and pointing out his far flung influence upon the destinies of many of the nations of the world. The Minister's remarks were as follows:

YOUR EXCELLENCY:

I welcome you here with great pleasure on the Two Hundredth anniversary of the birth of the founder of our Republic. I wish to take this opportunity, standing under the American flag, to thank you heartily and to express the appreciation which our Government and this Legation feel for all that has been done by your Government today to show honor to the memory of our greatest historical figure, without whom the United States of America might never have become a world factor and perhaps indeed might never have existed.

Washington, who came of a long line of liberty-loving and hard-fighting English ancestors, is to us, as you know, the symbol of our national rights and freedom, and I am proud that my Government helped during and after the World War to develop the independence and liberties of this great Slavic state. I have always said, long before my coming to Belgrade as Minister, that the formation of this great southern Slav entity would be the only solution of the chaotic problems which seemed to threaten this region at the close of the Great War.

Yugoslavia greets the United States of America today by remembering with reverence and appreciation the Bicentenary festival of our Founder, and we in turn greet Yugoslavia through you, Mr. Minister, with high hopes for the future and permanent welfare of this state and for your cooperation in fostering international peace and prosperity.

(To the British Minister:)

MY DEAR SIR NEVILLE:

We feel that George Washington's idea of liberty for which he fought so long and strenuously was essentially in accordance with the Anglo-Saxon spirit of freedom, and therefore we all have great joy in welcoming you here today as the representative of the nation which stands nearest to us in speech, tradition and fundamental law.

(To the French Minister:)

MR. DARD:

On an occasion like this, when we remember George Washington, it is impossible for any American to forget the services rendered to the founder of our Republic by the noble Lafayette and the valiant Rochambeau and other sons of France, concerning whose activities so much has been written, and whose names are so highly appreciated in America. I bid you welcome as the representative of France, which, since the beginning of our history, has been one of our nearest friends.

(To the German Minister:)

MR. VON HASSEL:

Everyone who knows American history is aware that Frederick William Augustus Henry Ferdinand Baron von Steuben, a well known German soldier reared in the rigorous military school of Frederick the Great, went to the assistance of the American colonists under the auspices of the French Minister of War in 1777. To him the American Congress passed a vote of thanks, giving him a gold-hilted sword in 1784 and later granted him a well deserved pension. We owe much of our military training, especially in the institution of West Point, to the influence and energy of this great German soldier. As representing your country we are delighted to have you with us today.

(To the Polish Minister:)

MR. MALHOMME:

Whoever is familiar with American history must always remember the services to the early United States of Thaddeus Andrew Kosciuszko, Polish soldier and statesman who in 1776 entered the army of the United States as a volunteer, and brilliantly distinguished himself at New York and Yorktown. His devotion to the cause of American independence won him the rank of Brigadier General, a pension, and the privilege of honorary American citizenship.

Furthermore, no American can forget that we owe our cavalry service to Count Casimir Pulaski, who joined the army of Washington with his distinguished compatriot Kosciuszko in 1777 and became Brigadier General and Chief of Cavalry. He was mortally wounded in Savannah and died for America on October 11, 1779.

The United States owes a debt of gratitude to the Polish nation for these two heroes, to whose memory many monuments have been erected in the eastern part of the United States, and I welcome you here today as the representative of Poland.

(To the Hungarian Minister:)

MR. VON ALTH:

While it is quite true that Kossuth came later than Washington, he was none the less inspired with the same spirit as that which moved our great first leader. So dear to him was liberty and so popular was his name in the United States that many towns and villages still have monuments to Kossuth. Therefore, I feel that in connection with the earlier heroes who helped our Republic, Kossuth must not be forgotten. Thank you very much for coming today as the representative of the race from which this great man arose.

(To the Argentine Minister:)

MR. CANDIOTI:

You and I are the only Ministers Plenipotentiary in Belgrade of American states, and we appreciate your presence with us because we cannot forget that your great liberator, San Martin, was a man of very similar character to our Washington, possessing the same energy, the same impartiality, and the same power of organization. You are very welcome, my dear Minister.

(To the Brazilian Consul:)

MR. POLZIN:

I have invited you here today as Consul of Brazil to express to you our appreciation of the lasting friendship which has existed from the beginning between your liberty loving land and great people and the United States of America. We feel complimented that Brazil calls herself the United States of Brazil and that she has seen fit to adopt a system so similar to our own. Between the United States of America and all the free Republics of South America we trust and pray that the best understanding and cooperation may forever exist.

FOREIGN MINISTER REPLIES

Mr. Bakotich replied briefly to the remarks of the American Minister in his own language and recalled among other things having been taught at his mother's knee as a boy, the story of George Washington, who was held out to him as an example of filial virtue. The foreign minister conveyed to the assembled diplomats the felicitations of his government and directed his remarks particularly to the American Minister, with the injunction that Dr. Prince convey to the Government of the United States the feeling of high esteem on the part of the Yugoslavian Government and its people with respect to George Washington and his ideals. According to the article in the NEW YORK HERALD, above mentioned, a most interesting and unusual feature of this ceremonial was the presence of the British Minister, who praised George Washington as "the greatest Anglo-Saxon of his day."

The French Minister spoke briefly on Lafayette; the German Minister delivered a short address on Baron von Steuben; the Polish representative spoke of Kosciuszko and Pulaski—the "father of American cavalry"—and finally the Hungarian Minister said he hoped those present would not forget the friendship felt by his own great Kossuth, who, although he came at a later day, was a devoted admirer and imitator of George Washington.

OTHER BELGRADE EVENTS

In addition to the general assembly and the legation reception there were in Belgrade during the Bicentennial year other Washington observances. The American Minister reports "that upon the request of the government of Yugoslavia an article was released by the American Legation to the National-Press describing the life of George Washington and the chief facts of his career." This article, written by Dr. Prince, reviewed the life of George Washington from his birth in 1732 until his death in 1799, outlining the high points of his famous career and emphasizing the ideals, ethics and dominating spirituality that motivated the life of the great American. The article was published widely in Yugoslav newspapers and elicited much favorable comment.

Two Washington observances were held by the Anglo-American-Yugoslav Club during March, 1932, at one of which the guest speaker was Mr. J. Barnard Gibbs, Assistant Agricultural Commissioner from the United States. The speaker devoted his theme to the home life and character of George Washington and laid special emphasis on Washington as a man of peace, agriculturist and proprietor of Mount Vernon. Washington was acclaimed as great in conflict and in peace, a man of infinite capacity to do what was right under all of the trying circumstances of his day.

The Commercial Attaché of the American Legation, Hon. Emil A. Kekich, was the speaker at the second Washington meeting of this organization. Mr. Kekich dwelt on the commercial and financial "depression" that existed at the time of President Washington and described how the President exercised his utmost patience and resourcefulness in working with his compatriots, particularly with Alexander Hamilton, the financial genius of the day, to establish a firm foundation for the United States despite the financial woes of the times.

MASONS HOLD MEETING

The Grand Lodge of Yugoslav Masons met to do honor to Washington during the month of April, 1932, and were addressed on the subject of "Washington as a Free Mason," by Prof. Peyich of the Belgrade University, to whom material for the address was sent by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission in Washington, D. C., through the American Legation in Belgrade.

Stimulated by the Bicentennial the women of the American colony and several from the British colony in Belgrade conjoined to hold fortnightly meetings, at which, according to the American Minister, various aspects of Washington's character and career were discussed. This same group formed a "George Washington Book Club," the purpose of which was to establish social contacts enhanced by Washington ideals and to facilitate an exchange of American and English literature among the women and their Yugoslav friends, particularly, during the Bicentennial year, literature concerning the life of George Washington.

ZAGREB HONORS WASHINGTON

Zagreb, the second largest city of Yugoslavia, was not behind Belgrade in its recognition of

LORD MAYOR NESHICH, OF BELGRADE, DELIVERING A BICENTENNIAL ADDRESS IN THE PEOPLES' UNIVERSITY HALL AND PROCLAIMING THE NAME "GEORGE WASHINGTON" FOR ONE OF THE PROMINENT STREETS OF THE CITY. In the front row is Col. Leko, representative of His Majesty the King of Yugoslavia. Others present on the platform are the American and British Ministers, prominent government official of Yugoslavia and diplomatic and consular representatives of France, Germany, Poland, Hungary, Argentina and Brazil.

George Washington. The City Council held an extraordinary session which was attended by large numbers of citizens. All day throughout the city the display of American flags from houses and in shop-windows demonstrated the sincerity of the popular feeling. The municipal session was opened by Dr. Srkulj, who in his address on Washington stressed the influence of America on the spread of the idea of liberation.

More especially was it interesting to note that a call was made for a better interpretation of American history amongst Yugoslavs. In this connection, the daily newspaper JUTARNJI LIST pleaded in a leading article for a revision of ideas about the relative influence of America and England on the struggle for freedom in Europe, an influence which hitherto had been neglected in favour of that of the French Revolution.

To perpetuate the memory of George Washington, one of the principal and most modern squares in the city of Zagreb, that of the stock-exchange, was given the name of George Washington Square.

The Bicentennial was brought to a close in Zagreb on Thanksgiving Day, 1932, at a George Washington reception and tea given for Americans and their friends at the home of Consul Egmont C. von Tresckow and Mrs. Tresckow. In reporting this event Consul Tresckow says that "as the last national holiday on which the Washington Bicentennial could be celebrated, decorations suitable to the day were used and a portrait of the Father of His Country was displayed and games of colonial times enjoyed."

GRATITUDE OF YUGOSLAVIA

The report submitted by the Foreign Ministry of Yugoslavia concludes as follows:

Such manifestations carried out on such a scale could not but give to the onlooker the impression that this new land of Yugoslavia, which had in past centuries lived apart from the trend of American history, has now in fact very close and living links with the American people, forged during their own last war for liberation in which America took part and which ended only 14 years ago. In Yugoslavia's tribute to George Washington is her expression of gratitude and recognition of the importance of America in history and the American ideal of humanity as expressed in the person of her first President.

The celebrations showed that Yugoslavia in estimating the national importance to the United States of George Washington did not miss the world-wide nature of his historical role. That role gave a new direction not merely to America but to the whole international world, lending to the nation of the United States a moral and political prestige in appreciation of which Yugoslavia hastened to manifest on this Bicentenary occasion her warmest sentiments.

RUMANIA

WITH the Royal Family of Rumania participating in the activities, the Bicentennial of George Washington's birth was celebrated in Bucharest, the capital, on February 22, 1932. The entire day was given over to celebrations honoring the First President of the United States.

The active leadership in the Bicentennial Celebration in Rumania was taken by the Society of Friends of the United States. The society is a Rumanian organization which, as its name implies, devotes its efforts to the development of knowledge of American institutions and the promotion of friendly relations between the two countries.

The society conducted a George Washington essay contest for the students of Bucharest University which evoked enthusiastic interest among the students and attracted wide attention in the press. Competition was keen and many essays were submitted to the society. Marin Cernea, a student in the College of Philosophy and Letters at the University of Bucharest, was announced the winner. Mr. Cernea's essay, entitled "George Washington, Builder of the American Nation," was published in Rumania's leading newspapers and was broadcast over the radio.

The Rumanian Government established a university scholarship named in honor of George Washington to be awarded each year to students of Rumania's universities who distinguish themselves "by their exceptional moral qualities and by acts of courage and devotion to the benefit of their families or their colleagues."

In harmony with these educational activities, the Friends of America conducted a study course on the life of George Washington for which the Handbook, published by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, was used as a guide. Credit for this work belongs to Mihail Oromolu, President, and Mme. Wally Dr. Gh. Alexandrescu, Secretary of the Society of Friends of America, both of whom spared no effort to make the Bicentennial Celebration in Rumania a success in every detail. In letters from both these officials the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission was advised that the study course proved of great interest to the Rumanian people and that many students attended the classes on George Washington.

A series of lectures was also arranged by the society in connection with the celebration in which different aspects of American culture and education and their relation to European institutions were discussed by leading educators and thinkers in Rumania. These lecturers and their subjects are here listed:

Mrs. Alexandrina Gr. Cantacuzino—Different Aspects of American Life and Culture; Prof. Nicolae Petrescu—The Organization of Society in the United States; Mr. George I. G. Duca—The Debut of the Young Man in America and in Europe; Prof. Grig. T. Popa—The Scientific Spirit in America and in Europe; Mr. Petre Comarnescu—Americanism and Europeanism; Mr. Richard Hildard—American and European Pacifism.

QUEEN MARIE SENDS MESSAGE TO AMERICA

On George Washington's birthday the celebrations in Bucharest began in the afternoon with a reception at the American Legation which was attended by Queen Marie, a large number of Rumanian officials, members of the Society of the Friends of the United States, and the American colony. In the late afternoon Queen Marie's message to the American people in memory of George Washington was read, at her Majesty's request, in a radio broadcast by Julius C. Holmes, Secretary of the United States Legation. The message, written in English, follows:

Today the entire universe joins in with America to commemorate the birth of that simple citizen who became great and forever unforgettable because he held holy those two great ideals: Country and liberty.

All those who go to America make a pilgrimage to Mount Vernon, that peaceful spot overlooking the Potomac River.

My children and I, of course, followed this tradition and were charmed by the unpretentious white house, sober of line, pleasing of proportions and well in keeping with the unsophisticated taste of the day, simple in every detail, not a millionaire mansion, but a home, the home of a man who after great exertion and many honors craved for solitude and rest.

Framed by fine trees, the placid house looks out upon green lawns sloping gently down towards the river. The principal sensation received is one of peace. When sauntering through the quiet grounds I was much reminded of England, and old English in taste is also the flower garden, boxed and full of simple cottage plants. This charm-filled garden harbors a certain rosebush, this also of the fragrant old-fashioned kind, and my daughter was told to pick a sprig of this bush as it had the virtue of bringing luck to young girls on the brink of life.

Mount Vernon is both a museum and a shrine; millions come to visit it. It is a hallowed spot, a place of remembrance, but there is nothing dead about it. The spirit of the man who laid the basis of America's freedom, still seems to breathe through Mount Vernon. This spirit goes with you when you enter his study; it mounts the stairs with you towards his bed-chamber, looks with you from the upper terrace down upon the charming restful view, saunters with you through the fragrant, box-edged garden.

And finally when you stand before the hero's tomb, you have not the sensation of looking down upon a grave, but upon a stone which is America's corner stone, for Washington is not dead, never can die because he lives forever in each American heart.

KING CAROL ATTENDS BICENTENNIAL EXERCISES

The main celebration in Bucharest was held in the evening of February 22, 1932, in the National Auditorium under the auspices of the Society of the Friends of the United States and under the patronage of Queen Marie. King Carol and Queen Marie were both present. Also attending the affair were a large number of Rumanian officials, nearly the full membership of the diplomatic corps of Bucharest, and many other prominent men and women of Rumania, the United States and other countries.

The program began with the playing of the national anthems of Rumania and the United States by the Bucharest Philharmonic Orchestra under the direction of George Georgescu. Beethoven's overture, "Eleanore," was also played by the orchestra.

The opening address was delivered by Mihail Oromolu, President of the Society of the Friends of the United States whose speech is translated as follows:

Seven years ago a society called "Friends of Rumania" was founded at New York, United States of America, to which the Rumanian intellectuals responded with a society called "Friends of the United States," thus creating a bond of sympathy across the ocean which was to develop gradually as a result of a better understanding between the two nations.

Two hundred years ago today George Washington was born and, of course, the society, "Friends of the United States," and Rumania, could not let pass such an occasion without paying homage to the founder of the American nation and taking advantage of this Bicentennial,—celebrated throughout the world,—to pay their respect to the great nation across the ocean.

Fifteen years ago America gave humanity a new lease on life, reestablishing peace in Europe on a new basis, and gave consistency to the guiding principle, the self-determination of peoples, which permitted Rumania to realize her national unity.

It is not my intention in these few minutes to present the biography of George Washington, for it would be necessary to relate nearly all of the history of North America for 150 years, as Washington's life is bound up with this history.

The war against the French, the war for freedom and independence, the framing of the Constitution at Philadelphia in 1787, and the two elections to the presidency would have to be described in detail: in each event he performed either military deeds which compare with the world's greatest generals, or political acts which compare to the greatest statesmen.

Called away from his planting as a second Cincinnatus, he fought for the Virginia colony where he was born. He left Mount Vernon. He fought for the freedom of the thirteen American colonies. He returned to Mount Vernon. He participated in the framing of the American Constitution, and he was twice President of the Republic.

It is therefore difficult to say whether Washington was greater as a statesman or a military leader. As a statesman he distinguished himself by a broad and clear vision of the facts and an unusual love of true democracy. As a military leader he figuratively inscribed upon his sword the same device which the young Spaniards inscribed upon the blades, of Toledo, "ne sors sans raison, ne rentre sans honneur."

Proclaimed "Father of his Country" for the manner in which he defended and freed the colonies, his historians say that no one merited this title more than he, for no one called to the colors foresaw things so clearly, was so intelligent, so patient.

The man who, legend says, never lied, possessed above all his qualities the important element which is necessary in every undertaking: confidence of success.

But above all, he inspired in the American people the generosity and love toward one's neighbor which gives that nation its power.

This spirit of generosity and love is shown in America's participation in the World War. This generosity is expressed in the Kellogg-Briand Pact, and the same generosity is evident in the moratorium on interallied debts, which may pave the way for a normal and definitive solution of this problem, vexing to all statesmen.

The endless sufferings which the wars have foisted upon humanity have led the entire world to seek a way to rid itself of war as a part of human action. The thinkers of all nations have exerted their efforts to inspire in the races this love of neighbor, condemning the struggles between individuals and between peoples. Perhaps the time is not far off when humanity will understand that life is a process for making man better and not worse, and peace, which everyone desires, will come sooner than is believed.

I could not better close my brief remarks on Washington and the American nation than by quoting a few lines from the Farewell Address of George Washington to the people of the United States: "that Heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue—that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these States, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete, by so careful a preservation and so prudent a use of this blessing as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and adoption of every nation, which is yet a stranger to it."

It is the wish of a man who is aware of the greatness of the epoch in which he has lived. It is the clear vision of a task completed, which paved the way for a splendid future of the nation he so brilliantly represented. And it is the clear and simple example of the man, satisfied and modest, who, having done his duty, left everything behind to return to his estate at Mount Vernon.

He left everything behind, for after a life, every minute of which was consecrated for his country, in 1799 he passed into immortality, and in the chain of immortals he is a wonderful and brilliant link.

PRIME MINISTER SPEAKS ON GEORGE WASHINGTON

Following this address, the Prime Minister of Rumania, Nicolae Iorga, delivered a brief eulogy on George Washington of which the following is a translation:

There are very few historic figures who receive, without any sort of reserve, the homage of the entire human family. Among those, a leading place is occupied by George Washington.

He lived at a time when, for everybody, the hero was the citizen of antiquity, of old Greece and ancient Rome. The figure to be imitated was taken from "The Lives of Plutarch." There the proud fighters set out to conquer men and circumstances, always with a dignified air and an indomitable will, in the rhetorical manner as described by the schoolmaster of Keroneia: orators ready with noble phrases, living marble statues, creators of illusion and seekers for effect.

Many tried and succeeded.

George Washington did not desire to fit this pattern. Every effort made to make a show of him failed. All prayers to convince him to manifest an ambition were in vain. He remained simple in the face of those who glorified him and calm in the face of all who dared to attack him.

He was a nobleman without prejudice, a planter without greed, a fighter without cruelty, and a man of the people without demagoguery. Under all conditions he presented the same spirit, unchanged in its absolute purity.

His life was the perfection of unity. His house, into which today pilgrims from the entire world enter with a sentiment of reverent respect, was like his life, of an apostolic moderation, although without the pretension of the showy ascetic. So was his ambition, and a single ambition: to be good and a complete man among the people whom he loved and whom he appreciated only according to their deeds.

He did not create a tradition, but an ideal. Traditions can be destroyed by the interests which follow and by passions. Ideals, however, remain constant and unchanging.

Today when democracy tends to become standardized and anonymous, the recalling to memory of a man like George Washington directs the thoughts of the nation to the heights to which these heroes have been raised who remain unchanged by the current of the times.

All that exists in America of idealism and virtue originated from him. To the youth of Rumania he can be presented as the most perfect icon of the man and the citizen.

These addresses were then replied to by Louis Sussdorff, United States Chargé d'Affaires ad interim in Bucharest. Mr. Sussdorff said:

On behalf of my Government and of the people of the United States, I desire to express to you on this memorable occasion the deep appreciation of my fellow-countrymen for the magnificent demonstration of friendship and solidarity which you have given in honoring the name and the memory of George Washington. The cordiality and the warmth of feeling exhibited by the Royal Family, the Rumanian Government, the Municipality of Bucharest, the Society of the Friends of the United States, and the Rumanian public will never be forgotten in the United States. The presence of His Majesty King Carol and Her Majesty Queen Marie tonight furnishes proof of a sympathy which will not fail to touch my fellow-countrymen. The message in memory of Washington which Her Majesty Queen Marie so graciously transmitted to the American people by radio this afternoon will evoke the deepest sense of gratitude in the hearts of all Americans. It is a noble and a generous expression of sentiment and will strengthen the feeling of friendship and high esteem for Her Majesty, which has been entertained by the American people since Her Majesty honored them with a visit five years ago.

The expressions of praise and veneration for George Washington, couched in such beautiful words by Rumania's learned and eloquent Prime Minister, Professor Iorga, will be most gratifying to my Government. The fine tribute paid to America's first President by Mr. Oromolu will be doubly appreciated by the American people, coming, as it does, from one who for many years has worked for mutual understanding between the Rumanian people and the people of the United States. Through Mr. Oromolu, I desire to express to the distinguished society over which he presides the thanks of all Americans not only for the great interest which the society has taken in the celebration of the Washington Bicentennial but also for the energetic and efficient manner in which the Friends of the United States have worked to make America and American institutions understood in Rumania.

My Government will be very appreciative of the recent action of the Municipality of Bucharest in giving a square the name of George Washington. For this gracious act, perpetuating the memory of the founder of American liberty, I wish to convey the sincere thanks of the American nation.

Today, in every city, every village, and every hamlet in America, celebrations are being held in honor of the memory of George Washington. The great interest in this occasion, which is being exhibited by the Rumanian people will, therefore, be regarded as a token of sincere friendship and of a genuine understanding of American traditions, aspirations and ideals.

Piano solos, consisting of American music of George Washington's time, were played by Madeleine Cocorascu, and a selection by the orchestra concluded the program.

The celebration was given wide attention in the Rumanian press, and Mr. Sussdorff, communicating with the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, advised that:

"The organization of the festivities in Bucharest is entirely spontaneous and displays a spirit of sincere cordiality for the United States on the part of the Rumanian people as well as a deep appreciation of the high qualities of George Washington."

The program given in the National Auditorium was printed in a beautiful souvenir booklet which also contained many eulogistic utterances on George Washington by men and women prominent in Rumanian national and educational affairs. The cover of the booklet featured an excellent reproduction of Gilbert Stuart's "Athenaeum" portrait of George Washington and a facsimile of Washington's signature. Its pages were adorned with cuts of famous places in America associated with Washington and his times which added interest to an already attractive program booklet.

The municipal authorities of Bucharest also participated in the celebration by naming the square in front of the United States Legation in honor of George Washington.

Many news items showing the nature and scope of the Bicentennial frequently appeared in the Rumanian press which, without exception, co-operated with the organizations in charge of the celebrations in that country. In addition to such items, the newspapers also printed many laudatory and instructive biographical and historical articles written by prominent Rumanians on the life of George Washington and the value of his services to his country.

A good example of such an article is that written by Professor I. Lupas, eminent Rumanian historian and educator, which appeared in UNIVERSUL, leading newspaper of Bucharest. Professor Lupas reviewed Washington's career as leader of the American forces in the Revolutionary War and pointed out forcefully the value to his own and all other countries of his example of public and private integrity. In his concluding paragraph Professor Lupas summed up his estimate of Washington's character in these words:

His personality proves that he had the correct synthesis of practical sensibility and constructive idealism. Modern Democracy sees in the personality of George Washington a model to imitate because he proved by all the actions of his life that value lies in the rights of the people. He persistently taught that the best system of government is always established on the capacity of the people for labor, worship and perseverance.

WALNUT TREE SENT TO CROWN PRINCE

On November 5, 1932, a group of uniformed Boy Scouts of Washington, D. C., led by Curtis Cooper, Scout Commissioner, presented to Crown Prince Michael of Rumania, through the Honorable F. C. Nano, Chargé d'Affaires ad interim of the Rumanian Legation, a seedling walnut tree from Mount Vernon.

The Crown Prince, himself a Boy Scout, decided to plant a tree from George Washington's home in recognition of the Bicentennial Celebration and as an expression of his interest in the activities of the Boy Scouts of America. The tree was dispatched to him through legation channels.

The gift was grown from seeds gathered at Mount Vernon by Boy Scouts in conjunction with the nation-wide nut tree planting program which was sponsored by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, American Forestry Association, Department of Agriculture, American Walnut Manufacturers' Association, and Boy Scouts of America. The Boy Scouts of America adopted this means of sending a greeting to their fellow scout, Crown Prince Michael.

Prince Michael has never visited the United States but his grandmother, Queen Marie, on her visit to America made a special pilgrimage to Mount Vernon.

THE UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA

THE UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA found in the George Washington Bicentennial an opportunity to give expression to its respect for the Great American and to promulgate its high regard for the United States of America.

Pretoria, the capital of the Union, named its first boulevard for George Washington. Johannesburg planted a tree in his honor with the injunction from the Mayor to future generations to replace the tree, "for it could hardly be expected to outlive the fame of Washington." United States diplomats in Cape-town entertained the whole American colony and "the majority of national, provincial and local officers of the Union of South Africa" at a Washington birthday reception. Newspapers declared that the Union should be "very nearly concerned in the Bicentennial," for, as remarked in the RAND DAILY MAIL for January 23, 1932:

The Union is represented in the United States by a Minister Plenipotentiary, while in South Africa a United States Legation has been established. Other bonds between the two countries have been forged in recent years. Many Americans have made the Union a definite holiday objective, while trade between the United States and South Africa is steadily increasing. Educational facilities offered by the United States have made a great appeal to South Africans, large numbers of whom have already qualified there, while many proceed annually to American universities. . . .

The same paper commenting on the Bicentennial, said editorially on February 24, 1932:

Such ceremonies as those which have just taken place in commemoration of the birth of George Washington two hundred years ago, cannot fail to intensify the cordial feelings between the two countries. They also help to make the world a better place.

It was in this spirit that the Union of South Africa celebrated the Bicentennial.

With the remark, "for George Washington and the thirteen original states," the American Consul General of the Union of South Africa, Mr. M. K. Moorhead, shovelled thirteen spadefuls of soil around a young deodar tree in Joubert Park, Johannesburg, on Washington's birthday, 1932, at the city's official Bicentennial celebration.

The Mayor of Johannesburg, Hon. D. F. Corlett, who presented the tree on behalf of the municipality, affirmed that it was a "great day in the history of the Americans in Johannesburg, for they were celebrating the birth of the greatest American. They could rest assured," he said, "that the memory of Washington would last conceivably longer than the life of the tree and that it would be necessary for future generations to replace the tree for it could not be expected to outlast the fame of perhaps the greatest American who ever lived."

The American Consul General accepted the tree on behalf of his government and Americans in Johannesburg. "It was a wonderfully kind thought," he declared, "that any country so far distant from America should honor the memory of George Washington." The Consul pointed out that South Africa and America have a great deal in common; they were discovered within a few years of each other and colonized in both instances by English and Dutch stock. "The two peoples, therefore, have a very intimate historical connection, and it is fitting that Johannesburg, which has been assisted by American engineers in the extraction of millions of dollars of gold and other minerals from its mines, should honor the memory of George Washington."

"As nations we have so much friendship with each other that I am sure this tree will be a symbol as the years go by of ever increasing comradeship between our two peoples," Mr. Moorhead concluded.

After the American Consul General finished his speech, the Ingenues, an American girls' band, coincidentally filling an engagement at a Johannesburg theater, gathered around the tree and while the crowd cheered sang with equal lustiness "God Save the King" and the "Star Spangled Banner."

BICENTENNIAL RECEPTION

During the evening a George Washington reception was held at the home of the American Consul General and Mrs. Moorhead in Parktown, which, as the Consul reported, was attended by about three hundred guests, among whom may be mentioned the Mayor of Johannesburg, foreign consular officers, the Secretary and the Commercial Attaché to the American Legation at Pretoria, and also representatives of American businesses in Johannesburg, leaders of British business firms, mining directors and others. The reception was in the nature of a lawn party. The garden was illuminated by red, white, and blue lights, and a loud speaker was installed to carry the patriotic and dance music to the hearing of all the guests. The RAND DAILY MAIL referred to the affair as a "happy climax" to the Bicentennial celebration in Johannesburg.

It was the pleasure of the American Consul General to address the Rotary Club of Johannesburg at the Carlton Hotel on February 23, 1932, on the subject of George Washington and the Bicentennial. In summarizing his address the RAND DAILY MAIL of February 24 stated:

Mr. Moorhead reminded the club that there were memorials to Washington in Westminster Abbey and in all parts of the British Empire, for not only was he the first great American but also a great Englishman and a great internationalist. The American Revolution had been different from others, for it was a revolt of free-born Englishmen against what they considered injustice. All Englishmen born today have the same spirit—the spirit that had made the Magna Charta and the spirit that made democracy.

Rotarians were loud in their praise for the manner in which the American Consul General explained the significance of the Bicentennial and extolled the fraternity that exists between the Union of South Africa and the United States.

The following editorial from the RAND DAILY MAIL of February 24, 1932, indicates the feeling engendered toward America in the hearts of South Africans by the Bicentennial celebration:

THE U. S. A. AND THE UNION

Johannesburg and Pretoria have done honour to themselves by participating in the celebration of the Bicentenary of the birth of George Washington, the chief founder and first President of the United States. In each of the two cities a tree has been planted to honour and perpetuate his memory, while the Administrative Capital has changed the name of one of its streets to George Washington Boulevard.

Such acts are, of course, purely sentimental, but, happily, sentiment is still a powerful force among the nations, and underlying it in this case is a deep appreciation both of a great man and a great land. The placing of a tree in a public park may be a small thing in itself, but to future generations it will stand as a symbol of the friendship which exists between the United States and South Africa, a friendship which will, no doubt, increase as the years pass.

It is particularly appropriate that the Union should associate itself with the celebrations. As Mr. M. K. Moorhead, the American Consul-General, reminded the gathering in Joubert Park, the United States and South Africa have much in common, not the least interesting of the links which connect them being the fact that both were largely colonized by English and Dutch. Then, again, the Rand, and because of the Rand the whole of the Union, owes a debt of gratitude to American capitalists and American engineers for the part they have played in the development of the gold mining industry, upon which this country mainly relies for its prosperity.

Today the United States and the Union are bound together by diplomatic and commercial ties, reinforced by a warm and enduring friendship. Even their problems are much the same in many respects. Such ceremonies as those which have just taken place in commemoration of the birth of George Washington two hundred years ago, cannot fail, therefore, to intensify the cordial feelings between the two countries. They also help to make the world a better place.

INDEPENDENCE DAY PROGRAM

During the early days of the gold rush in South Africa, it is estimated that about 5,000 Americans resided in or near Johannesburg, according to Consul General Moorhead. On the Fourth of July, during that eventful period, the custom was started of having all American citizens, local officials, and business men call at the American Consulate during the morning and register their names. This tradition was observed on Independence Day, 1932, the Consul General reported, and special emphasis was placed on the fact that not only was the freedom of the United States being commemorated on that day but also the Bicentennial of George Washington.

More than 120 persons called at the Consulate on the morning of July 4, and upwards of 200 attended the private reception held by Consul General and Mrs. Moorhead. The Mayor of Johannesburg was present at both functions as were many of the leading merchants, consular officers of other countries, and members of the American colony. The wife of the acting British trade commissioner and a "South African Dutch lady" assisted Mrs. Moorhead.

In accordance with another custom, the Americans selected a baseball team and opposed an African aggregation on the day prior to the reception. The Bicentennial game was played before 4,000 people, and the American team won the game.

On September 13, 1932, the Martha Washington Club in Johannesburg, a group of American women organized in 1902, celebrated its thirtieth anniversary, which event also assumed the aspect of a Bicentennial celebration. As set forth in the AMERICAN FOREIGN SERVICE JOURNAL, for October, 1932:

There were days of readjustment, of excitement, and some anxiety after the Anglo-Boer War, and new conditions were being established in the Transvaal Province. Before then there had existed a Dutch Republic. On June 22, 1902, peace was proclaimed and the Transvaal was included in the British Dominions. People of many nationalities were entering the country, but the American mining engineers who had come over and developed the largest gold-producing area in the world, were realizing their enormous possibilities, and their wives saw that a new epoch was in view and resolved to form a club which would prove useful under the changing conditions and of mutual benefit to themselves. The club was organized and named for Martha Washington. Great activities were carried on. The Children's Undenominational Home was one of the first charities undertaken, and other benevolent schemes were helped. Especially during the Great War did the Martha Washington Club show energy, and handed over about $6,000 to the Governor General's Fund. In all $30,758 has been devoted to numerous charities. Many exiled, needy Americans had been aided.

The reception was held at the home of Consul General and Mrs. Moorhead. Dr. A. Phelps Stokes, canon of Washington Cathedral, Mrs. Stokes, and their daughter, Olivia, were the honored guests.

Capetown and Port Elizabeth had the Bicentennial directed to their attention by the American diplomatic corps. In Capetown a large reception was given at the temporary legation on February 22, 1932, in honor of the two-hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth. The American Minister, Hon. Ralph J. Totten, reported "that there were some 380 persons present, including all of the local Americans and the majority of the national, provincial, and local officials of the Union of South Africa."

From Port Elizabeth, the American Consul, Hon. H. H. Dick, wrote "there was no formal celebration of the Bicentennial occasion here but informally Mrs. Dick entertained at bridge at our home while I received congratulations at the Port Elizabeth Club."

The EASTERN PROVINCE HERALD, Port Elizabeth, of February 20, 1932, carried a lengthy feature article titled "Great American," in which the plans for the Bicentennial year were set forth and a biographical sketch of Washington's life was given.

PRETORIA CELEBRATES

Pretoria, seat of the government in the Union of South Africa, celebrated the two-hundredth anniversary of the birth of America's greatest hero by naming the city's first boulevard "George Washington Boulevard" and by planting a camdeboo tree (Celtis Kraussiana), dedicated to his memory in Burgers Park, a beautiful civic pleasure ground named for the Third President of the Transvaal Republic, Thomas Francois Burgers.

This celebration had its inception in the hearts of the South African people. It is on record that the lady mayor of Pretoria, Mrs. M. C. Malherbe, went before the city fathers on January 24, 1932, and, to quote Hon. Ralph J. Totten, American Minister to South Africa, "suggested to the city council that as a mark of friendship toward the United States, a thoroughfare be named after our First President in commemoration of his two-hundredth birthday. The council approved of the Mayor's suggestion and obtained the assent of the Minister of Lands and the Administrator of the Transvaal to rename what was known as 'Ulster Road'—'George Washington Boulevard.'"

TREE PLANTING

On the afternoon of Washington's birthday, 1932, a large assemblage of American and South African citizens, diplomats, and government officials from Pretoria and Johannesburg gathered at Burgers Park for the tree planting and boulevard announcement ceremony.

In her speech of welcome, Mayor Malherbe declared that all South Africans wished to show their good will toward their American friends, but principally did they wish to share in honoring the memory of a great man—Washington. It was the hope of the Mayor that the tree to be planted would grow in stature and beauty year by year and eventually become a landmark in the city. She called to mind that many years ago Pretorians had planted a tree to Queen Wilhelmina of Holland, wishing to honor that very gracious lady for whom all Afrikaner people had a feeling of gratitude and respect.

"The tree planting custom," she remarked, "is one that we can cultivate with advantageous results. Thereby we cement the ties of international friendship and at the same time beautify our city."

The Mayor drew attention to the fact that George Washington was known as a great lover of trees and that in America and elsewhere millions of different kinds of trees had been planted in memory of his great name.

"What a wonderful, living, vital memorial—a tree! A tribute to the dead, a source of joy to the living! Here in our country where trees are few and the sun so scorching, such memorials planted in honor of the great sons of South Africa like, for instance, President Kruger, would be wonderful projects! I place this idea in the minds of all in the hope that it will grow into definite purpose." (Applause.)

The Mayor then announced officially and formally that that portion of the avenue known as "Ulster Road" had been renamed by city authorities "George Washington Boulevard," and henceforward would be known by that name and thus recall the ideals of George Washington so dear to the hearts of Afrikaner people and Americans alike.

The honor of planting the tree, which is one of the most beautiful of South African trees, a white camdeboo, was extended to Mrs. Ernest L. Ives, wife of the secretary to the American Legation.

A bronze tablet, the legend of which was inscribed by the Mint of the Union of South Africa, was erected near the tree as the official marker for the occasion. The inscription on the plate, which is engraved both in Dutch and English, reads:

In commemoration of the 200th Anniversary of the Birth of
George Washington
First President of the United States of America.

In acknowledging the honor thus bestowed on America's great patriot, the secretary of the legation, Hon. Ernest L. Ives, briefly replied to the mayor in these words:

It is an honor, Your Worship, that you have deemed it fitting that a tree should be planted in this beautiful Park, named after the third President of the Transvaal, Thomas Francois Burgers; and that you, Members of the City Council, have authorized the naming of a thoroughfare of Pretoria "George Washington Boulevard," and further, that you have joined us in commemorating the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Washington, the first President of the United States of America.

Such manifestations of cordiality, expressed in so tangible a manner, are more far reaching than is generally realized and help to bind even more closely our ties of friendship.

We Americans, who are residing in the Union, will always remember these tributes rendered by you in honor of the father of our country and will, with pride, point out these landmarks to others and in doing so, it will be with a feeling of camaraderie towards you.

I am desired by my Minister, Mr. Totten, to express to you in his name and in the name of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, appointed by the Congress to the United States of America, their grateful appreciation of the honors rendered by you in memory of our First President.

The PRETORIA NEWS, Pretoria, and THE STAR and RAND DAILY MAIL, of Johannesburg, devoted lengthy news articles to the event.

The "George Washington Boulevard" is thus described by the American Minister in a dispatch to the Department of State, Washington:

The future George Washington Boulevard is a continuation of Government Avenue which runs from the Union Building to the corner of Dumbarton Road and Ulster Avenue. On the Boulevard are situated the residences of General Hertzog, the Prime Minister; General J. C. G. Kemp, the Minister of Agriculture; Dr. D. F. Malan, the Minister of the Interior, and other high officials of the Union Government. The Office of His Britannic Majesty's High Commissioner for the Union of South Africa is also located on this Boulevard, which passes one of the entrances to the residence of Lord Clarendon, the Governor General.

The district through which the Boulevard runs is owned by the Union Government and is called "Bryntirion."

The Boulevard is about three-quarters of a mile long.

The ceremony in Burgers Park was followed by a gala reception at the attractive residence on the Boulevard of Secretary and Mrs. Ives. The social climax to the day brought together a long list of notables from both Pretoria and Johannesburg, among whom were prominently mentioned:

(From Pretoria): Mayor Mrs. M. C. Malherbe and Mr. K. Malherbe; Dr. H. A. Lorentz, Minister Plenipotentiary for the Netherlands, and Madame Lorentz; the Administrator, Mr. J. S. Smit, and Mrs. Smit; Colonel I. P. de Villiers, Commissioner of Police, and Mrs. de Villiers; Dr. Gregor, Vice-Consul for Germany; Colonel Sir Theodore and Lady Truter, Dr. and Mrs. Gordon D. Laing, Dr. and Mrs. R. V. Bird, Dr. and Mrs. J. J. Theron, Dr. and Mrs. M. L. Fick; Dr. and Mrs. Anderson, and Dr. and Mrs. G. Preller.

(From Johannesburg): The American Consul General, Mr. M. K. Moorhead, and Mrs. Moorhead; the Vice-Consul, Mr. Reams, and Mrs. Reams; the Commercial Attache to the American Legation, Mr. H. S. Day, and Mrs. Day; the Assistant Trade Commissioner, Mr. Clark, and Mrs. Clark; the Rev. and Mrs. J. Gray, and Rev. William S. Hyatt.

VENEZUELA

N THE occasion of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, the Government of Venezuela, the Americans resident there, and the citizens and press of the Republic, all gave expression to the high regard in which Washington is held throughout Latin America.

Justly proud of her national hero, Simón Bolívar, "the Liberator," Venezuela is also proud that he is called "the Washington of South America." The first country to erect a statue of Washington beyond the boundaries of the United States, Venezuela also boasts as her citizen the only Latin American known to have visited George Washington—Francisco de Miranda—one of the early patriots of Venezuela.

These early ties of history and mutual struggle for independence are voiced in the following cablegram of felicitation received by President Hoover on February 22, 1932, from His Excellency, General Juan Vicente Gómez, President of Venezuela:

CARACAS, VENEZUELA, FEBRUARY 22, 1932.

PRESIDENT HOOVER,
WASHINGTON, D. C.

ON THE OCCASION OF THE CELEBRATION OF THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE BIRTH OF THE FOUNDER OF THE REPUBLIC LIBERTIES OF THE GREAT NATION HEADED BY YOUR EXCELLENCY, I TAKE THE GREATEST PLEASURE IN TRANSMITTING TO YOU THE CONGRATULATIONS OF THE GOVERNMENT AND THE PEOPLE OF VENEZUELA. THE WORK OF WASHINGTON, WHICH PRESAGED THE INDEPENDENCE OF THE OTHER AMERICAN COUNTRIES, BOTH OF THE NORTH AND OF THE SOUTH, WILL LIVE FOREVER AS WILL ALSO HIS NAME AND THOSE OF BOLIVAR AND SAN MARTIN, SHARING IN THE MEMORY OF ALL THE NATIONS ON THE CONTINENT THE SAME SENTIMENT OF ADMIRATION AND GRATITUDE. BE GOOD ENOUGH, EXCELLENCY, TO ACCEPT THESE CONGRATULATIONS AS TESTIMONY OF THE CORDIAL RELATIONS EXISTING BETWEEN OUR TWO COUNTRIES.

J. V. GOMEZ,
PRESIDENT OF VENEZUELA.

Observance in Venezuela of the Bicentennial centered in the beautiful capital of the Republic, Caracas.

There the celebration extended throughout the year, from Washington's Birthday until Thanksgiving Day, and was marked by the active participation of the Government and citizens of Venezuela and the large colony of resident Americans.

WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY IN CARACAS

The celebration in Caracas opened on February 22, with an impressive ceremony at the Washington Statue, continuing throughout the day with pilgrimages to the tomb of Bolívar and to his birthplace, a reception at the American Embassy, a public band concert, and an international radio broadcast.

The commemorative events of the day began at ten o'clock in the morning at the Statue of George Washington on the avenida that bears his name, when a commemorative wreath was laid at the foot of the statue in the presence of the American Minister, representatives of the Venezuelan Government, all American officials in Caracas, the Diplomatic Corps, the entire American colony and several hundred Venezuelan citizens.

This beautiful statue of the North American patriot was the first to be erected outside of the United States, and was unveiled on the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of the great South American liberator, Simón Bolívar, July 31, 1883.

His Excellency, President Gómez, had intended to be present at the ceremony at the Washington Statue, but was prevented by business of the Government. Before the ceremony began, however, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, accompanied by officials of his Department, had placed a wreath at the Statue in the name of the National Government.

Dr. José Gil Fortoul, former president of the Republic, and Mr. Rudolf Dolge, dean of the North American colony in Caracas and chairman of the Caracas Bicentennial Committee, were the principal speakers.

The program opened with the playing of the "George Washington Bicentennial March," by Sousa. This was rendered by the Presidential Band, kindly placed at the disposal of the American Colony by His Excellency, President Gómez. Mr. Dolge then delivered the following address on "Washington and Venezuela":

A little less than half a century ago—to be exact, on July 31st, 1883—there was unveiled in the city of Caracas a statue of George Washington. It was the first monument in honor of the great American to be erected in any country outside of the United States; and the significance and importance of this interesting event, taking place here in Caracas—at once the cradle of South American Liberty and its foremost champion—is enhanced by the fact, that the occasion therefor was the celebrating by the people of Venezuela of the first centennial of the anniversary of the birth of that great military genius and statesman, Simón Bolívar, the Liberator of five South American Republics.

From the very inception, during the early days of the last century, by that other great Venezuelan patriot, the intrepid Miranda, of the movement for South American independence, the American people, including many of the noted contemporaries of Washington, among whom there come to mind such names as Alexander Hamilton, General Knox, Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, James Monroe, John Quincy Adams, and later on that great champion of South American Independence, Henry Clay, in many ways showed their sympathy with, and effectively aided the Venezuelan patriots in their heroic struggle. Thus there arose between the two peoples that sincere and unbroken friendship of which that monument to the Father of our Country is a lasting symbol. Formerly located in the Square then called Plaza Washington—now the beautiful Plaza Henry Clay—coincident with the inauguration of the beautiful statue of the Liberator, presented by the Government of General Gómez to the city of New York on April 19th, 1921 (the 111th anniversary of the initiation of Venezuelan Independence, and likewise the 146th of the battle of Lexington, the first bloodshed of our own struggle for independence), President Juan Vicente Gómez decreed the erection of the statue on its present site, at the same time naming the beautiful avenue at the head of which it stands in honor of Washington, and causing the planting of many thousand American pines and evergreens along the hillside which flanks the monument, and naming it "Parque Washington"; thus anticipating by more than ten years the movement which has made the planting of ten million trees throughout the United States one of the most interesting features of the Washington Bicentennial Celebration, and creating another lasting memorial in honor of the Father of our Country, for all of which we, as citizens of the United States, are truly grateful to his Government and to the noble people of Venezuela.

We have assembled here to-day, within the shadow of that statue to commemorate the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. You are all familiar with the principal events of his remarkable career, and it would be supererogation for me to repeat to you the tales of his early childhood and youth, his record as an engineer, as a farmer and business man, as a great soldier and statesman, and again as a retired plain citizen, a devoted husband and a cultured, Christian gentleman. Nor shall I dwell upon the great and extraordinary virtues which characterized his life and have secured for him that place in the minds of all mankind that is summed up in that immortal phrase: First in War, First in Peace, First in the hearts of his countrymen. It is worth while to stop for a moment, however, and listen to the testimony of two of his contemporaries and the estimate in which he was held by them, and thus we find that Mr. Henry Clay referred as follows to Washington in a speech on March 26th, 1825: "There was in that extraordinary person, united, a serenity of mind, a cool and collected wisdom, a cautious and deliberate judgment, a perfect command of the passions, and through his whole life, a familiarity and acquaintance with business civil transactions, which rarely characterize any human being." But of the many tributes to his character which came alike from friends and enemies, the words of Thomas Jefferson seem most fitting: "His integrity was most pure, his justice the most inflexible I have ever known, no motives of interest or consanguinity or friendship or hatred, being able to bias his decision. He was indeed in every sense of the words, a wise, a good, a great man."

Because of these great qualities, Washington successfully led his fellow countrymen through their great struggle for freedom and laid the solid foundations for the permanence of our institutions. There are those, and they are not a few, who believe that had our statesmen always adhered to the true spirit of his great farewell address, we might have been saved from much of the distress which so many of our people are suffering at this time. But whether such would have been the case or not, at this time, more than ever we should exemplify his spirit—and seek unto a kind Providence to help us to practice his virtues in all our dealings as a nation and as individuals, and that there may be bestowed upon our leaders the wisdom of George Washington, and they thus helped to lead us successfully to a newer, a higher and better goal.

Mr. Dolge's speech was vigorously applauded, and after a musical number by the band, Dr. Gil Fortoul delivered the following splendid tribute to George Washington:

1732-1799: Within these years was passed the life of Washington. This is not the time to follow it step by step. Nor is this the occasion to add other eulogy to those accumulated by historians and statesmen during two centuries. His supreme eulogy was made by his own countrymen in true and luminous synthesis, thereafter consecrated by the universal conscience: "First in War, First in Peace, and First in the Hearts of his Countrymen."

Nor do I come here to deliver a speech. I come to express in brief language the homage—in itself eloquent—which the country of Bolívar renders at this time to the country of Washington.

In order that this tribute should be truly national and unanimous its organizers have thought that it would be preferable to entrust it to a private citizen, without official representation, thus truthfully interpreting the sentiments and ideals of the community.

The epoch in which Washington lived was, in truth, one of the most fruitful in the history of civilized humanity. The intellectual and political movement, begun in England and continued in France, had its echo in the American continent, awakening it and at length placing it, with the declaration of the rights of man and the Constitution of Philadelphia, in the vanguard of the universal transformation. No longer the predominance of an European mother-country, no longer a colonial status, no longer a monarchical regimen: but in exchange the definitive establishment of the democratic Republic!

With the close of the XVIII century Washington, with his coterie of statesmen—Hamilton, Jay, Jefferson, Adams—had already founded the great, new Power which should insure, before the traditional Powers of Europe, the future of North America. And here in the South two men had been born who went on spreading the realization of the same ideals—the one throughout his journeyings in foreign lands, the other in his lowly colony—Francisco Miranda and José María España, both of them precursors and martyrs. And there had just been born in Caracas another man who was to place himself, like Washington, at the head of the revolution of emancipation, and who, again like Washington, should be consecrated by history with the title of Father of his Country.

The life and work of great men are inexhaustible founts of suggestion, of tendencies, of teachings. In their tombs reigns neither silence, forgetfulness or even death. In their tombs the heart of all their predecessors continues to beat, of all their contemporaries; and succeeding generations come to their sepulchres not alone to awaken remembrance; they come to be revived by the sun of their old ideals and in search of wings for their new aspiration and their new hope.

Yonder in the North, the spirit of the entire people continues to live in the tomb of Washington. Here in the South, upon solemn anniversaries, all Venezuelans move in procession to the tomb of Bolívar. Both Fathers of their Countries embrace one another across time and space, and bring into communion the souls of their two peoples.

Gentlemen:

The President of the Republic has generously permitted me, a simple citizen, to utter, upon this occasion, the voice of the nation. I believe that I understand the reason. He, who has been successively husbandman, soldier and statesman, was called to appreciate the true significance of the life of Washington. Washington began with the cultivation of the earth; and the free air and the broad horizon of his fields made him sane and strong. When his country had need of him, he became a soldier, and he triumphed. With the attainment of peace, he dedicated himself to direct its people along new paths which should convert it into a powerful and a happy nation.

Thanks to the administration of President Gómez, Venezuela of today, modest in its prosperity, but proud that its future depends, above all, upon its own efforts, may now, in peace and with the memory of its own Liberator, send to the country of Washington its sincere greetings.

Dr. Gil Fortoul's address was received with special expressions of appreciation on the part of the huge throng of Americans in the assembly, and then the children of the American colony, dressed in red, white and blue costumes and led by a diminutive, three-year-old "George Washington" in buff and blue, advanced to the statue and placed a beautiful wreath of natural flowers at its base. The children then sang the American national anthem to the accompaniment of the Presidential Band.

The tribute of these small Americans was followed by one equally colorful and impressive on the part of Venezuelan school children. Dressed all in white, they grouped themselves in front of the statue, laid a large wreath beside that placed by the American children, and then sang the national hymn of Venezuela, "Gloria al Bravo Pueblo."

Another floral offering was then placed by the Venezuelan Committee of the Pan American Society, and the ceremonies closed with the singing of the "Star Spangled Banner" by the American Colony, led by the children. As the assemblage dispersed, the Band played the Sousa march, "Hands Across the Sea."

Immediately after the exercises at the Washington Statue, the members of the American Colony, led by the American Minister and the children, and accompanied by representatives of the Venezuelan Government, went to the National Pantheon, where the minister placed a wreath at the tomb of Venezuela's hero, Simón Bolívar, "the Liberator." From there, the delegation moved on to the birthplace of Bolívar to pay further tribute to "the Washington of South America."

CARACAS BICENTENNIAL COMMITTEE

The committees for these observances of the Bicentennial by the American colony in Caracas, were divided into a General Committee, with the American Minister as Honorary Chairman and Mr. Dolge as Chairman; a Committee on Ways and Means; a Ladies' Committee; a Junior Committee and a Children's Committee. The members of the three adult committees were:

General Committee.—Hon. George T. Summerlin, American Minister, Honorary Chairman; Rudolf Dolge, Chairman; Warden McK. Wilson, Vice Chairman; Henry C. Von Struve, C. Norman Clark, William H. Phelps, W. T. S. Doyle, Warren Smith, and William J. Lenahan.

Committee on Ways and Means.—John Phelps, Chairman; Albert H. Cousins, Vice Chairman; W. Butte, George B. Feltz, David R. Groome, Harold D. Miller, Wm. H. Phelps, Jr., Claude Pierce, Edward Steiniger, Geo. T. Summerlin, Jr., Edward Tatum, and Richard B. Taylor.

Ladies' Committee.—Mrs. Carter Pannill, Chairman; Mrs. Warren Smith, Vice Chairman; Mrs. John Elmendorf, Mrs. Reginald Hawley, Mrs. Preston McGoodwin, Mrs. Harold Miller, Mrs. John Phelps, Mrs. Arthur Portas, Mrs. T. R. Riddick, and Mrs. Herbert Stabler.

The attractive program "For the Commemoration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington by the Members of the American Colony and Citizens of Venezuela" was a booklet printed in soft tones of buff and brown. The cover bore a fine engraving of the head of Washington and included in the body of the program were two splendid photographs of the Washington Statue in Caracas and of the equestrian statue of Bolívar which stands in Central Park, New York. The order of procedure for the ceremony at the Washington Statue was printed both in Spanish and in English, and on the last pages of the program were the words of the Venezuelan and American national anthems.

In the words of the American Minister, Mr. Summerlin, the opening ceremony of the Bicentennial Celebration in Caracas was "not only impressive, but demonstrated such excellent management and good taste that much credit has redounded to the colony."

RECEPTION AT EMBASSY

In the afternoon a reception was held at the American Embassy in honor of the day. The Venezuelan Government again loaned a band to supply the music for the occasion, and the reception was attended by more than five hundred representatives of the Government, Diplomatic Corps, American and British colonies, and Venezuelan society.

By order of the Ministry of War and Marine, the Bolívar Band, another government musical organization, rendered a special "Washington Bicentennial Concert" the same afternoon at the foot of the Washington Statue.

Also, on the afternoon of Washington's birthday, the Caracas Broadcasting Company, in collaboration with the Ministry of Fomento (Promotion), broadcast a program especially arranged to honor the North American holiday. This program was rebroadcast to all the stations of the National Broadcasting chain in the United States.

The Venezuelan Government left nothing undone which could contribute to the success of the Bicentennial Celebration, not only in Caracas, but throughout the Republic.

To this end, the President issued an official decree on February 19 in anticipation of the opening of the Bicentennial. The decree, expressing "the deepest feelings of cordial friendship," outlined the method by which the Venezuelan Government, schools, etc., would observe Washington's birthday, and follows in full as translated from the OFFICIAL GAZETTE of February 19, 1932, by the American Legation at Caracas:

GENERAL JUAN VICENTE GOMEZ

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF VENEZUELA

Whereas the 22nd of this month is the Bicentenary of Washington's Birthday, and whereas there have always existed between Venezuela and the United States the deepest feelings of cordial friendship, it is fitting, on this glorious date, that the Government and People of Venezuela should demonstrate the sympathy which joins them to the Great Northern Republic,

IT IS DECREED:

ARTICLE 1.—The First Magistrate of the Republic shall send on that day a congratulatory message to the President of the United States; another such message shall be sent to the President of the Pan American Union.

ARTICLE 2.—The informal visits demanded by usage during the great days of friendly nations shall be made to the Legation of the United States in this city, as a demonstration of the existing cordial relations.

ARTICLE 3.—The Minister of Foreign Relations, attended by other high officials, shall place a wreath at the Statue of Washington in the name of the National Government.

ARTICLE 4.—A delegation from the Federal Schools, which shall be appointed by the Ministry of Public Instruction, shall honor the Statue of the Great Man of the North.

ARTICLE 5.—One of the military bands, appointed by the Ministry of War and Marine, shall accompany the delegation from the schools. It shall also render a special concert before Washington's monument.

ARTICLE 6.—The Ministries of Foreign Relations, of War and Marine, and of Public Instruction, are in charge of carrying out the present decree.

J. V. GOMEZ.

P. ITRIAGO CHACIN.

Countersigned:

The Minister of War and Marine,
E. LOPEZ CONTRERAS.

Countersigned:

The Minister of Public Instruction,
R. GONZALEZ RINCONES.

In pursuance of this decree, the President's aide-de-camp, representing President Gómez, called at the American Legation on February 22 to present the felicitations of the head of the Venezuelan Government on this memorable anniversary. The President also sent floral tributes both to the Legation and the Washington Statue.

Representatives of the Minister for Foreign Affairs and other high officials of the Government also called at the Legation. The Minister of Public Instruction, Dr. González Rincones, gave his personal assistance in connection with the ceremonies at the Washington Statue, and also ordered observance of the day in all the schools of Venezuela, and in particular that Washington's Farewell Address be read in Spanish to public school children throughout the Republic.

On February 22 there was a special issue of the REVISTA DEL EJERCITO, MARINA Y AERONAUTICA (ARMY, NAVY AND AERONAUTICAL REVIEW), by order of the Minister of War and Marine, "as a tribute and reminder of the military virtues of that exalted patriot—Washington."

The entire volume was given over to historical matter concerning George Washington and the United States Army, and the dedicatory page was as follows:

BICENTENNIAL OF GENERAL GEORGE WASHINGTON

By order of the Worthy General Juan Vicente Gómez, President of the Republic, the present number is dedicated to the memory of the illustrious General George Washington, Liberator of the United States of North America, on the second centenary of his birth.

The Venezuelan legislators in 1811 were inspired principally by the Constitution and Laws of the great Republic of the North. We have ever maintained relations of mutual cordiality, and owing to the consolidation of the internal peace of Venezuela, our commercial ties grow stronger every day.

On the occasion of the Bicentennial of the birth of the famed patriot, the ARMY, NAVY, AND AERONAUTICAL REVIEW, in the name of the War Establishment of the Republic, presents to the great North American nation a cordial tribute of sympathy.

One of the most interesting of the articles in the REVIEW is one entitled "Washington and Bolívar." This was written by the Chaplain of the National Army, Father Carlos Borges, and links the names and achievements of these two great national heroes. A portion of this article, in translation, follows:

In these anxious days when ominous clouds darken the horizons of both hemispheres, the American people, courageously putting themselves above the universal despair, are commemorating with legitimate pride the second centenary of George Washington. And in the contagious enthusiasm that such a glorious event awakens, the flags of all nations float gaily in the breeze as a sign of brotherly sympathy toward the great nation of the North.

But no other nation can raise the cup in toast of this day with so gallant a gesture or with so genuine a right as the fatherland of Bolívar. By the law of nature and the law of history the bonds which unite Venezuela with the United States should be and are unbreakable, notwithstanding the difference in temperament between the two nations and the different courses followed in their evolution. The same sun and the same ideal illumine the two nations. Mysterious coincidences in our national life indicate a relationship between our destinies guided by the twin stars of liberty and glory. On the 19th of April the struggle for the independence of the United States began with the battle of Lexington: on the 19th of April the struggle for the independence of Venezuela began with the heroic gesture of the patriots of Caracas. And on July 4th and 5th, almost the same date but in different years, our glorious countries were freed forever.

The victorious echoes of the cannon of Yorktown were still resounding from mountain to mountain up and down the valleys of the Andes when, in that happy summer of 1783 at the very moment that Washington's labor was crowned with success, Simón Bolívar was born, and with him, the liberty of South America.

Washington and Bolívar represent all America. As America lies in the arms of the Pacific and the Atlantic, so will it live eternally in the arms of Bolívar and Washington. The New World with its two continents like gigantic lungs breathes glory and liberty, and the divine breath that animates it is the spirit of its two greatest liberators. The air is still sweet with the sacred perfumes offered by the veneration of the nations on the tomb of Bolívar to commemorate the first centenary of his death, when again the breath of glory, sweeping over the cradle of Washington, brings us again the aroma of immortality. The future of the world is in America.

... On the anniversary of that glorious day when the star of liberty stood still over that other Bethlehem, Bridges Creek, let a humble crown of laurel leaves from the Avila be sent to adorn the cradle of the great and good man, the simple and wonderful hero who was, as the American people say: "First in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen."

Chaplain of the National Army.

BOLIVAR MEDALLION OF WASHINGTON

That close tie which the two countries feel in their national heroes, Bolívar and Washington, found tangible expression more than a hundred years ago, in the presentation to Bolívar, through that illustrious companion-in-arms of George Washington—General Lafayette—of a medallion bearing the likeness of Washington.

This was a gift of the Washington family, and the occasion of its presentation to the South American Liberator was recounted in the Special Bicentennial Number of the BULLETIN OF THE PAN AMERICAN UNION in July of the Bicentennial Year. From this article, after speaking of the tour of the United States made by General Lafayette at the invitation of the United States Government in 1824, is taken the following account of the presentation of the Washington medallion to Bolívar. The medallion is now a treasured possession of the Venezuelan Government.

Before departing for Europe, Lafayette visited the tomb of Washington at Mount Vernon. He wished once again to return to the place where the American Cincinnatus spent the last years of his life, and where his mortal remains now rest. In the presence of the glorious ashes of Washington, Lafayette received from the great man's family, among other gifts, the ribbon of the Order of Cincinnati which the Liberator of the United States had used.

He further agreed with heartfelt pride to serve as an intermediary for presenting to Bolívar a gift which Washington's family wished to make to the Liberator of South America. This consisted of a gold medal which the American people had presented on one of the anniversaries of independence to the Father of their Country and a medallion containing a portrait of Washington and a lock of his hair.

The medallion now belongs to the Republic; it was donated by Gen. Guzmán Blanco, President of Venezuela, who had received it from Bolívar's nephew, Señor Pablo S. Clemente. It is elliptical in shape, 7 centimeters long and 5 wide. On the observe appears a miniature of Washington by Steward after the large picture painted by the celebrated Field; on the reverse is a blue enamel background in the center of which appears under a small crystal cover a lock of the modern Cincinnati. Around the crystal the following inscription is engraved on a gold border:

Auctoris Libertatis Americanae in Septentrione hanc Imaginem dat Filius ejus Adoptatus Illi qui gloriam similem in Austro adeptus est. (This portrait of the founder of liberty in North America is presented by his adoptive son to him who has won equal glory in South America.)

Thus it was that the family of Washington in the name of the United States, evoking the glorious shade of its illustrious leader, the Father of his Country, manifested its admiration for the Washington of South America. But what imparted special character to this gift is the fact that it was Lafayette, so celebrated in the annals of modern liberty, who was entrusted with the pleasing duty of transmitting the precious souvenir to Bolívar. The Liberator received from Lafayette the following letter . . . :

WASHINGTON CITY, September 1, 1825.

To the PRESIDENT-LIBERATOR:

SIR: The family of General Washington could not have shown in a better way their appreciation of my filial and religious affection for his memory. To-day a most honorable duty has been entrusted to me. It was with the utmost pleasure I recognized the exact resemblance of the portrait, for I would rather offer this record of my fatherly friend to General Bolívar than to any man living or to any of those who are famed in history. What more can I say to the great citizen whom America has saluted with the title of Liberator, a name confirmed by the Old and the New Worlds, and who, while endowed with a power equal to his disinterestedness, yet bears in his heart the unreserved love of liberty and a sincere affection for the Republic. However, the public testimonials of your kindness and esteem authorize me to send you the personal congratulations of a veteran in our common cause. I am soon to take my departure for another hemisphere, but I shall follow with sympathy the glorious termination of your labors and the course of that solemn Assembly of Panama, in which will be consolidated and completed all the principles and all the interests of the independence, liberty, and policy of America.

Accept, Mr. President-Liberator, the homage of my profound and respectful admiration.

LAFAYETTE.

. . . With the interesting letter of Lafayette, Bolívar received one from George Washington P. Custis, in which the latter forwarded to him the medal which the city of Williamsburg, the former capital of Virginia, had presented to Washington. . . . Bolívar wrote to Washington P. Custis from Lima, on May 25, the day on which he received the noble gift, a courteous letter in which he said: "The portrait of the principal benefactor of the continent of Columbus, presented by the noble descendant of his illustrious family through the citizen hero, General Lafayette, would be a sufficient reward for the merit of the greatest man in the universe."

The family of Washington, to express their admiration for the glory and virtues of Bolívar, presented him with yet another gift. Through General D'Evereux, Mrs. Eliza Parke Custis sent an autograph of Washington to Bolívar on November 8, 1828. It was the letter in which he bade good-by to his wife before leaving for war in 1775. . . .

Two years after receiving these presents, Bolívar went to his rest in the midst of the conflicts of political parties. . . .

To the noble José Ignacio París, survivor of the horrors of the "War unto Death" (Guerra a Muerte), belongs the honor of having erected in the Andes the first statue of the Liberator in 1846. This admirer and friend of Bolívar bore the entire expense of the work by Tenerani which, a tribute to the great citizen, adorns the square of Bogotá. It was presented to the Congress of his country, New Granada (now Colombia), and the offering of love and duty thus became national property.

It is noteworthy that when Ignacio París gave the models to the artist he ordered that on the breast of Bolívar only one medal was to appear—that which bears the likeness of Washington and which his family presented to the Liberator. (Since that date all statues, busts, and portraits of Bolívar bear the effigy of Washington.)

What was the motive of these instructions, of this exclusion of any other medal? It was because the effigy of Washington on the breast of Bolívar, perpetuated in bronze, is to be eternal like Washington—as the memory of the great benefactors of the human race is eternal. . . .

PAN AMERICAN TRIBUTE

On Pan American Day of the Bicentennial Year—April 14—the President of Venezuela again expressed his personal feeling of admiration and esteem and that of the Republic for George Washington, in a message read at the Tomb of the First President at Mount Vernon. His tribute to the "North American Liberator," read at that impressive event, follows:

I AM HAPPY TO TAKE PART IN THE HOMAGE WHICH THE PAN AMERICAN UNION IS TODAY RENDERING TO THE MEMORY OF WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON IT WAS WHO MADE THE PRINCIPLE OF THE SOVEREIGNTY OF THE PEOPLE PREVAIL FOR THE GOOD OF THE COUNTRY, AND WHO LOVED PEACE FOUNDED ON JUSTICE AND MUTUAL RESPECT.

INSPIRED WITH THE SAME IDEAS, BOLIVAR STROVE TO BRING ABOUT THE UNION OF THE NATIONS OF THIS CONTINENT, AND VENEZUELA, MODELING ITS POLICY ON THE COUNSELS OF THE LIBERATOR, RENEWS ONCE AGAIN ON THIS OCCASION ITS SINCERE GOOD WISHES FOR THE BROTHERHOOD OF THE REPUBLICS OF AMERICA AND FOR UNIVERSAL PEACE.

J. V. GOMEZ,
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC.

To add to this splendid tribute of the President of Venezuela, is that of the Republic's diplomatic representative in Washington, Sr. Dr. Don Pedro Manuel Arcaya, Minister of Venezuela. His tribute, given below, is taken from the Bicentennial Edition of the WASHINGTON TIMES of May 30, 1932:

The name of George Washington is the symbol and the epitome of all the virtues which go to form the grandeur of the illustrious nation whose liberator he was.

His respect for the law and the rights of his fellow citizens; his love of liberty, not expressed in loud words, as do they who do not love it in truth, but expressed in real deeds; the seriousness and circumspection of all his acts; the example of his life, honorable and full of activity; the tact and prudence with which he knew how to guide the destinies of the new republic, all go to distinguish him throughout history as one of those men of whom humanity is proud and to whose memory the people of the earth render their tribute of reverence and admiration.

My fatherland, Venezuela, has erected monuments to him and recalls his name with the same respect as our Liberator, Bolívar. The genius of these two great men was different, as were also the environment and circumstances under which they labored; but there is no doubt that the figure of Washington was one of those which most influenced the fiery soul of Bolívar, in his longing he realized finally after brilliant prowess and indescribable sufferings.

Venezuela is at peace with all the nations of the world. She has no external debt, since that which dated back to the war for independence, and was later augmented as a consequence of the internal conflict, was canceled two years ago.

Observance of the Bicentennial in Caracas did not come to an end until Thanksgiving Day. On that doubly American holiday there was a special George Washington Bicentennial-Thanksgiving Day service at the Church of St. Mary and St. Michael, conducted by the Chaplain of the British Legation in Caracas, Rev. C. H. Reynolds. The program included a "General Thanksgiving" by all the congregation and a "Prayer for the President of the United States and all in Civil Authority," concluding with the singing of "America."

A permanent souvenir of the bicentennial year in Caracas was a contribution to the Henry Clay Library there of the publications of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. These were sent in response to a request from Mr. Rudolf Dolge, Chairman of the Bicentennial Committee, who wrote:

"You are perhaps aware that we have here in Caracas the Henry Clay Library, which is dedicated especially to the fostering of closer Pan American relations, and I will greatly appreciate it if you could find it possible to send to me a full set of the publications that have been issued by your Committee, for incorporation in this Library as a permanent souvenir of the Washington Bicentennial."

OTHER CITIES PARTICIPATE

Besides the capital of Venezuela, the cities of La Guaira and Maracaibo also took cognizance of the celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the birth of George Washington.

In Maracaibo the daily press gave the North American anniversary considerable prominence. Typical of the eulogies given the memory of George Washington on February 22, 1932, is the following, taken from EXCELSIOR, of Maracaibo:

Today the great American Nation is celebrating the Bicentennial of its Liberator and founder, George Washington, the first citizen of the United States, "first in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen."

The North American hero stands in the front rank of the great Liberators of history. His entire life was dedicated to the independence of his country, which he raised to the summit of republican greatness, so that today it stands at the head of all the republican nations of the world.

The Great American Nation is today enthusiastically celebrating the Bicentennial of its Greatest Hero, in full enjoyment of its moral and material greatness.

Therefore EXCELSIOR believes it its duty to render the homage of its admiration to the memory of the greatest American, and to send its respectful salutation to the honorable Vice Consul of the United States in this city and to the important North American colony resident here.

From La Guaira, important Venezuelan port on the Caribbean Sea, came the following report of Vice Consul Ben C. Matthews:

Owing to its proximity to the capital, and almost absence of American residents, any celebrations contemplated for La Guaira were merged with those held at Caracas on February 22. The only celebrations at La Guaira were commemorative exercises by two of the leading schools, namely "Escuela Santa Michelena" and "Escuela Rocio." The exercises lasted about one hour, and consisted of patriotic Venezuelan songs sung by the children. Individual American residents displayed the American flag from their residences on that day. The program transmitted by radio from the United States was received by a small group of Americans and Venezuelan friends at the American Vice Consulate.

Throughout the Bicentennial Year in Venezuela the large number of newspaper clippings in the files of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission in Washington bear out the statement of the American Minister that "so far as the Press was concerned, nothing was left to be desired."

EL NUEVO DIARIO, the Government official organ, dedicated practically its entire edition of February 22, 1932, to the Bicentennial, publishing Webster's Address, Washington's Farewell Address, stories and pictures from the life of Washington, and many splendid editorials. From these and from EL UNIVERSAL of February 23, 1932, have been taken the following editorials, in part, as typical of the friendship and esteem expressed by the press of Venezuela for the First President of the United States:

(From EL NUEVO DIARIO)

George Washington is one of those great men whom history can hail without reservation or restriction of any kind. To achieve fame, he had no need of violence or disregard for the laws of his country. He upheld all the high and liberal ideas of his epoch without falling into excess. He was great as a revolutionary, great as a soldier and statesman. He presented the unusual duality of being at the same time a hero and an example of discretion.

(From EL UNIVERSAL)

It was a great day for the republicanism of the world. . . . Yesterday was George Washington's Bicentennial Birthday. He was a man who, because of his exalted virtues and exemplary life, is today a symbol of pride not only for America but for all Humanity. Fit honors were paid him in accordance with the official program and the program of the Commemorating Committee which had been formed in this city.

The honors paid by Venezuela to the great Liberator of the North could not but be all beauty and solemnity, as was fit from a country which erected the first of those monuments which have been erected to him outside of the United States. There, by the Statue, a vivid sympathetic feeling, permeated with exalted emotions, predominated throughout. It was a deep demonstration of admiration and gratitude for the great Republican who opened up a heaven of everlasting glories for the flag of the Stars and Stripes.

The cordial friendship which has always characterized the relations of Venezuela with the United States, which go back to the very beginning of our days as a nation and which as the years run by, intensifies itself, has encompassed a wider range through greater understanding, estimation and respect, always reciprocal; and the celebrations of yesterday before the statue of the Father of North American Liberty are but one more proof of that estimation and friendship.

DENMARK

URING the Bicentennial Celebration in Denmark George Washington was acclaimed by Danes of high and low degree. He was hailed by the king, eulogized in the Danish press, and his life was made the subject of study in social organizations. He was honored as no other man had been before by the Copenhagen Lodge of the Danish Brotherhood of America. He was made the theme of a widely received radio address by the Danish Foreign Minister. He was honored in joint meetings of Americans and Danes on various occasions throughout the Bicentenary year.

There is a belief current among some Danes that George Washington himself was a Dane by descent. This belief is based on a purported or legendary statement by Washington before a Scandinavian Society meeting in Philadelphia just after the Revolution. "Gentlemen," Washington is reported to have said, "I have a little surprise for you. The first ancestor of which my family has any trace came from Jutland about 900 A. D. He was a Dane by the name of Hvass."

This alleged incident and quotation have been investigated by qualified historians and have not been found to be based on fact, but the recalling of the event in the DANISH ALMANAC for 1932 at least serves to indicate that the regard for George Washington in the hearts of the people of Denmark is of such character that they would, if they could, claim him as their own.

From His Majesty, King Christian of Denmark, the following message was received by the President of the United States:

COPENHAGEN, DENMARK,
FEBRUARY 22, 1932.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

ON THE OCCASION OF THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF GEORGE WASHINGTON'S BIRTH I WANT TO ASSURE YOU THAT THE DANISH AND ICELANDIC NATIONS ASSOCIATE THEMSELVES WITH THE AMERICAN NATION IN CELEBRATING THE IMMORTAL MEMORY OF THE FIRST PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AND TO EXPRESS TO YOU MY HEARTY WISHES FOR THE PROSPERITY OF YOUR COUNTRY.

CHRISTIAN R.

The felicitations of the Government of Denmark were conveyed to the Government of the United States by the Minister of Denmark, His Excellency Otto Wadsted, in the following letter:

ROYAL DANISH LEGATION

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 20, 1932.

THE HONORABLE HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of State,
Department of State, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to convey to you the Danish Government's cordial congratulations on the occasion of the Bicentennial Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington. The memory of the first President of the United States and the great American statesman will always live in the minds of the Danish people.

May I be allowed to add that I associate myself wholeheartedly with the American people's celebration of this glorious anniversary.

I have the honor to be sir, with the highest consideration,
Your most obedient and humble servant,
OTTO WADSTED.

OPENING EVENT IN COPENHAGEN

The American Club of Copenhagen gave the Bicentennial Celebration an auspicious start in Denmark with the holding of a George Washington banquet on the evening of February 22, 1932. More than one hundred Americans resident in the capital city of the Danish nation, led by the American Minister, Hon. F. W. B. Coleman, and his official family, attended this function. Following a program of songs and instrumental music devoted to the Bicentenary theme and toasts to President Washington, President Hoover and the King of Denmark, the American Minister delivered the following address:

Your Highnesses, Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:

It is a happy coincidence that I come first to take my place as an active member of the American Club to celebrate with you an Anniversary that is being patriotically observed today in every State of our Union and elsewhere in the world where Americans are gathered together.

While extreme and uncompromising nationalism is not, as we know, conducive to international friendship, we may be forgiven today if we express our pride of citizenship and our veneration of the first President of the United States who is still enshrined first in the hearts of his countrymen.

We cannot boast of an ancient form of government, and our history includes no legendary or mythical figures as Chiefs of State. Allowing for change in manners and modes, George Washington was a modern American as contemporary letters and documents imply and agreeably prove, a very human man and a gentleman, a leader of men in peace as well as in war.

It is hoped that on this day those fellow citizens, who complain loudly o'er their lessened fortunes and hard lot, will pause in their lamentations and reflect on the sufferings and hardships of the men who laid the foundations on which we stand so securely today; that they will resolve to go forward with renewed confidence in their country and in each other country.

I could not, if I would, make our benign Eagle scream. Frankly, I don't like his voice in the upper register; rather leave him on his perch, observing and observed, symbol of might and protection.

This seems to me an appropriate occasion to express my high appreciation of the courtesy and kindness shown me upon my coming to Copenhagen on the part of the Danish Government, the press, and those who have personally made me welcome here. I know I shall have a happy tour of duty.

Det Danske Brodersamfund I Amerika (The Danish Brotherhood of America) Lodge No. 318, Copenhagen, convened on February 22nd to do honor to the great American. More than two hundred members and ladies were present. According to information submitted to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission by the Royal Danish Legation in Washington, D. C., the event was "a typical example of festivals in Denmark, held by corporations of Danes, who have been residing for a shorter or longer period in the United States."

GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION IN COPENHAGEN.

The Secretary of the Lodge sent the following report of the celebration:

Mr. Ingemand Petersen, President of the Lodge, gave a summary of the life of George Washington, and of his great achievements in bringing the war for freedom from England's suzerainty over the thirteen States, and the Declaration of Independence to a successful accomplishment.

Mr. Albert Petersen, ex-President of the Lodge, dressed in the uniform of a Revolutionary Army General, appeared then upon the stage, which was decorated with the Lodge's silk flag of "Dannebrog" and the Stars and Stripes, and recited the following prologue:

"On this day we call to our memory the great time about 150 years ago, the time for the birth of a nation, and the name of our famous chief, George Washington. Under his command and leadership we fought to make a nation worth living in for men of the free; to make homes for our women and children; and to carry out his aims and ideals. We have seen many heroes and have been told of many great men who fought for the sake of their country and for its prosperity. The spirit of those men is still living among us. A long time has passed since we fought for freedom and happiness, and we have still the flag of liberty with its stars and stripes waving over us; but it seems to me that human beings of today are entirely different from those of my time. I hope that you have not forgotten our ideals, so that our fight may not all have been in vain. Will you give me your consent to return to my comrades and tell them that we are not forgotten, and that we did not fight in vain, that if you folks are called upon, you will then do your duty as we did ours. And now before I go back to where I belong, I have just one wish, and that is, once more to listen to the tunes of the bell of liberty."

And to the tones of the bell, the old General withdrew from the stage.

Next on the program was a tableau, in which Miss G. Voel impersonated the Statue of Liberty, while the audience sang "America." This was followed by several symbolic ballet dances. The evening closed with dancing and patriotic music.

The Danish Foreign Minister, Dr. P. Munch, delivered an address on February 22, concerning the life and character of Washington, over a network of Danish radio stations. According to the Minister of Denmark at Washington:

This address lasted for about half an hour and was listened to all over the country. . . . The Foreign Minister delivered his speech principally on the basis of his thorough knowledge of American history and of the personality of George Washington.

CELEBRATION IN NORTH JUTLAND

On July 4, 1932, Americans from all over Denmark and a large number of their Danish friends gathered at Rebild Park in North Jutland and there held a George Washington celebration. Referring to this event the American Minister to Denmark said in a report to the State Department:

This park was purchased several years ago with money subscribed by Danes living in and around Chicago, and was dedicated as an American Park in Denmark as an expression of appreciation of the advantages and opportunities America had given to so many Danes. A celebration is held there yearly on the 4th of July and is largely attended by Americans and Danes with relatives or interests in America, and a great many Danes residing in the United States come home for this occasion.

The 1932 celebration was made memorable by an address on George Washington delivered by the American Minister upon invitation by the Danish authorities. In the presence of the leading officials of the community and many influential Americans and Danes, Mr. Coleman spoke as follows:

I need hardly say to you that this is the year of years in the United States, the two-hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, forever proclaimed the Father of his Country, whose first place in the hearts of his countrymen has never yet been challenged.

While our history as a people goes back still another hundred years, a country dates its birth from its day of independence and today we celebrate our one hundred fifty-sixth. A modest number, as you may well say, a mere stripling in the family of nations, and yet the United States is today the longest existing Republic in the World and proud of it.

Opportunity knocking at the door and the man coming quickly out is generally our conception or rather our explanation of great men. George Washington apparently never waited for Opportunity to come but arose before he heard the knock. That is genius.

Yet, it is well today to recall that all during his career of a victorious General and as first President of the United States, he was slandered and maligned. No President since has escaped this attempt, malicious and venomous, to tarnish his reputation, not even Lincoln. It is a sad commentary on the freedom of speech and press that a Republic grants to its citizens.

To err is human—we all insist upon that, especially when we err ourselves, whatever the consequences, but, I rather think that forgiveness is human as well, even through the exercise of the divine in us.

To those whom we have placed at the head of the State and to those whom law or heredity have made titular chiefs, there is due on the part of law-abiding citizens, not only loyalty and respect, but a belief in their integrity and impartiality in administration.

When a nation despairs of the existence of these virtues in the head of a government, it will place another in his stead.

The greatest tribute that a living man can pay to a comrade who has passed away was penned by John Marshall, Chief Justice of the United States, who, when concluding his "Life of George Washington," wrote of him:

No man has ever appeared on the theatre of public action whose integrity was more incorruptible or whose principles were more perfectly free from the contamination of those selfish and unworthy passions which find their nourishment in the conflicts of party.

Having no views which required concealment, his real and avowed motives were the same; and his whole correspondence does not furnish a single case from which even an enemy would infer that he was capable under any circumstances of stooping to the employment of duplicity.

He exhibits the rare example of a politician to whom wiles were absolutely unknown and whose professions to foreign governments and to his countrymen were always sincere.

Endowed by nature with a sound judgment and an accurate, discriminating mind, he feared not that laborious attention which made him master of these subjects, in all their relations, on which he was to decide; and this essential quality was guided by an unvarying sense of moral right, which would tolerate the employment only of those means that would bear the most rigid examination; by a fairness of intention which neither sought nor required disguise; and by a purity of virtue which was not only untainted but unsuspected.

My friends, may we not hope that those whom we place in the highest positions of government and responsibility will find inspiration and proper guidance in the example of George Washington.

Unselfishness, the giving freely without thought of return, the whole-hearted devotion to a cause,—these bring that satisfaction and recognition in life without which existence is barren indeed.

The soul of a people is seldom revealed to those who are not of them, and this is the barrier that separates the peoples of the earth, that is the cause of strife and dissension.

My Country is often assailed in the foreign press for individual and sporadic transgressions of moral and criminal laws from which no country in the world is immune. Little mention is made of our important and continuing contributions to the betterment of the world, distributed in almost every country, in Denmark not the least.

How can anyone with understanding and without bias criticize a people who believe and show by example that it is more blessed to give than to receive?

Let him who excels in charity cast the first stone. Debtor nations find solace today in this biblical injunction, albeit they would have us believe that it is more blessed to receive than to give back and, while thus far we have found no common ground for argument, the abuse heaped upon us merely because we are a creditor nation will not hasten agreement and compromise.

I have been a borrower, but I was always grateful to the lender, and I was never quite happy until I returned what I owed him. To hate and despise a man because he lends you money without security condemns the borrower outright.

Now, when a nation lends money to another, unless it has improperly and unjustly balanced its budget, it must go to its citizens and say, our friends need money, will you please contribute and your government will pay you interest and guarantee the return of the principal. Most people think that a government is possessed of wealth which is liquid and can be loaned out to any needy borrower.

Our foreign loans during and after the last war were the contributions of a large part of our citizens who were persuaded to draw their savings from the banks, to sell securities, and to bring into the open their hoarded funds in order to meet the demands and needs of certain European nations. Later on, when these debts came to be refunded, we scaled them down to a great extent, all at the cost of our citizen contributors who paid the difference in taxes. And still the cry goes on that we are the Shylocks of the world. The morale of every European debtor has sunk pretty low when either government or press lends itself to this propaganda.

There are some people, not many I hope, who bear with Christian fortitude the misfortunes of their friends. From the press one might suppose that nations were likewise disposed towards each other. In self-interest, there is no worse fallacy today. We swim or sink together. To him who doubts this, don't give ear. While we should be looking forward, it is not amiss to hark back to other times for reflection and comparison.

There was a time, and I remember it well, a happy time, too, when only a few officials in various countries were nationalistic while the peoples themselves were friendly disposed to one another. In those days we didn't know what passports were and hence never heard of a visa. People and goods moved freely, more or less, throughout the world and opportunity was not lacking the man who stayed at home or who settled abroad.

What madness has come over the nations today whose administrators and press counsel their people to shun their neighbors in commerce and to content themselves with home produce, whatever inconvenience, sacrifice, and unemployment may result. This is a monstrous doctrine and, in my opinion, the root of economic evil today.

It is not natural, not human nature, for one people to revile another. One can only account for it by the corruption of the mind, and some day those rightly charged with the responsibility will suffer the penalty for what we rightly call an international crime.

There is no punishment for this offense against nations except by the tribunal of public opinion, which is generally tolerant and slow to judge, but, when aroused, is quick to condemn.

The press bears a heavy obligation, greater perhaps than is realized. The means are at hand to poison or to educate, to corrupt or set free. The peoples themselves have demanded and won the liberty of their press in most countries. Those who wield the pen daily would do well to remember that their privileges are due to the people they serve and hence to recognize their obligations to them. Left to ourselves, we all seek the truth and desire nothing but the truth.

One hears much today about security, whatever that means in international politics. Anyone who desires security for his neighbors and his friends, by his disposition, ensures it for himself.

The history of Denmark during the past 200 years sets an example to the world. Sometimes unjustly attacked, not once in all these years has she desired or conceived an aggression against a neighbor, a record of which the Nation may well boast for all time. Therein lies the security of Denmark.

There is today sitting in Geneva an international conference to agree on the limitation of arms. They have reached no agreement so far. It seems to me that it is as idle to attempt to put all arms in two categories, defensive and offensive, as to spend the time in discussing how many angels can dance on the point of a needle. Even the peaceful man on the street can see that there is no weapon that isn't both offensive and defensive.

There is some danger today—some signals have gone up—that international conferences are useless and fruitless. There was never a time when more of them were so necessary. This is no time to be discouraged. If we despair of eventual agreement, we despair of ourselves.

Both Denmark and the United States are to be congratulated on the acquirement of this beautiful Park and common meeting ground consecrated to mutual friendship and understanding between two peoples.

It is a privilege to be invited and to be welcomed here at this gathering, and I assure you that while standing here I feel very close to the soil of my own country.

AMERICAN CLUB CELEBRATES

On Thanksgiving Day, 1932, the scene of the George Washington celebration in Denmark again shifted to the capital where the American Club of Copenhagen for the second time during the Bicentennial Year gathered to bear testimony to the greatness of Washington.

Of this event the American Consul General in Denmark, Hon. Louis G. Dreyfus, Jr., says:

There were in the neighborhood of one hundred persons present, mostly Americans, including the whole official family, except Minister F. W. B. Coleman, who was unable to attend because of illness. The Washington Thanksgiving proclamation was read by Mr. North Winship, the Counsellor of the Legation. The President of the Club, Mr. Jack Rague, called the attention of the gathering to the special importance of this Thanksgiving Day because of its being the official termination of the Bicentenary Celebration.

Consul General Dreyfus was the principal speaker on this occasion and that part of his address relating to the bicentennial has been outlined by him as follows:

Thanksgiving Day stands out especially this year, as it is the official close of the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration in which "the Father of his Country" has been honored in every corner of the world. Many of you will recall our popular Minister's eloquent address to the Club on Washington's Birthday. I am sorry that Mr. Coleman is unable to be with us this evening, and I know that those of you who know him feel the same as I do.

Most of you know the origin of our Thanksgiving. I will recall it briefly for those who may have forgotten some of their early American history. This occasion which is celebrated gastronomically by indulging in turkey, pumpkin pie, etc., was instituted in a period of uncertainty. The first Thanksgiving Day was held at Plymouth in 1621. One year after the arrival in America of the Pilgrim colony on the Mayflower, Governor Bradford proclaimed a day of prayer and feasting for the success of the venture and especially for the ample crops of the first harvest. The colonists were thankful that they had been able to hold out after a bitter struggle against the elements and occasional skirmishes with the Indians. The day was both religious and festive. Wild turkey graced the board, and for that reason turkey has continued to be associated with Thanksgiving dinner. After 1621, the day was observed irregularly until 1680 when the early historical records show that it has become an established custom in New England.

As a National institution, it was the Continental Congress that first called the whole thirteen States to a general observance of the day in a proclamation calling for prayer for the success of American arms. When George Washington became President, a few years later, he issued the proclamation which you heard a few minutes ago and which was the first official Thanksgiving Day for the United States. In 1815 there was a Thanksgiving under President Madison for the Peace of the War of 1812. Thereafter the day was observed only on occasion until the Civil War. It was mainly celebrated in New England, where regular annual proclamations were issued by the Governors of the States. It was President Lincoln who established it definitely as a National custom in 1862. He selected the last Thursday in November as a day of Thanksgiving notwithstanding that the scales of battles were wavering between the two causes, and from that day the observance has never been interrupted. The President and most of the State Governors issue annual Thanksgiving Day Proclamations.

It is paradoxical that the farming community in the United States has stuffed barns and farmhouse cellars, but notwithstanding, prosperity is absent. In a search for what you should be especially thankful for during the past year, the minds of many have perhaps registered some of the unpleasant events of the past year: family troubles, losses in the stock market, losses of election bets or similar depressing incidents. There have been some very dark days. The great war with its huge destruction of property and its strain on Government finances has undoubtedly been responsible for the depression. The road back to normalcy has not been smooth, but this should not be surprising as other wars have produced similar conditions. No one here tonight dates as far back as the Civil War, but we know how long drawn out was the reconstruction period. Finally there was a return to prosperity in the Seventies, and this will come again. Let us hope that prosperity will return with the same speed as the yo-yo craze captured Copenhagen. The turn in the road seems near at hand.

We should give thanks that conditions today are not any worse than they actually are. Let us look into the future with as much optimism as we can muster and with the same fortitude as they did in the days of the Pilgrims and of George Washington, as prosperity is bound to return again.

TRIBUTES IN DANISH PRESS

The participation of the Danish press in the Bicentennial Celebration was of high order. DAGENS NYHEDER, of Copenhagen, in a special Bicentennial section described the celebration in the United States and throughout the world during 1932 and in a long historical article set forth the salient facts of George Washington's career. He was described as the leader and inspiration of the American Revolutionary movement and the founding of the new nation.

POLITIKEN, of Copenhagen, in its issue of February 22, 1932, carried an article from the pen of Frantz Wilhelm Wendt, entitled "George Washington—The Myth and the Man," in which the author differentiated between the idealized and the real George Washington. This article, which also indicates the Danish viewpoint with respect to Washington and the problems with which he had to deal, was as follows:

During these first months of 1932, both Germany and the United States are celebrating the memory of one of the greatest historic figures of each of these respective countries. Today is the two-hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth in the then English Colony of Virginia. On March 22 it will be 100 years since Goethe died in the quiet city of Weimar—the seat of an Electoral Prince. Both were sons of the great 18th century, whose spirit had deeply penetrated the mind of each. Each, in his own way, was one of the outstanding personalities of his time and vied with his rival for first place in the mind of the nations. But how widely they differed in other respects—in destiny, genius, and in what they will mean to future generations!

Each stands, both for his own people and throughout the world, as the embodiment of the noblest and highest that his nation has produced. This is why each is the heritage of all Humanity, and not merely of his own people. It is quite characteristic, however, that Goethe's memorial day will be celebrated throughout America, while only here and there will Europeans think of Washington. This difference brings out vividly one of the causes of the lack of understanding between the old and new worlds. Europeans have never been inclined to adopt the spiritual and material bases of the development of the United States.

Washington's place in the mind of the American people is well-nigh unique. They have given him the honorable title "The Father of his Country," and really feel toward him as toward the man to whom they owe their country's greatness and prosperity. Lenin alone occupies a similar place in the mind of a large section of the Russian people, although he is not given the unmixed admiration enjoyed by Washington. Italy has only the madcap Garibaldi. To France, Joan of Arc is a heroine rather than a woman. Germany has no dominating national figure, and still less has England. In Denmark we have Tyre Danebod or Holger Danske, at most, but they are both more or less legendary figures. Washington, on the contrary, is both the national hero and a strong, full-blooded man.

Nevertheless, he has suffered the tragic fate that has so often overtaken the great men of history—to become a legendary figure, a national hero in modern garb with good and bad but no mediocre qualities; bright as an angel but as dead as a lithograph and as dry as a wooden statue. The authors of legends were following his trail at an early date, and one of them, in particular, whose description of him appeared in 1800, the year after Washington's death, almost enveloped him in legend. This author was a certain Pastor

Weems, a preacher who traveled around fuming against drunkenness and lax morals. In an era when the use of liquor was universal he was one of the first to advocate total abstinence and fought Evil by writing booklets with such expressive titles as "God's Vengeance on Gamblers" and "God's Vengeance on Adulterers." The little book about Washington was really one of the same series—a collection of instances of the deeds of good men and their reward. To make these inspiring and warning examples still more complete, Pastor Weems did not hesitate to jeopardize his own soul by making quite untruthful statements and telling fictitious stories with a view, naturally, to embellishing his hero's portrait.

Weems' little book was published in no less than 70 editions, and shaped the tradition about Washington to an amazing extent. Even many serious historians, who possibly did not credit the different stories, were nevertheless affected by Weems' spirit and saw the deeds of the great General and President in the light shed upon them by the myth. And ordinary men, who perhaps never read the moralists' little collection of examples, came across the various episodes in school books or saw them dramatized in the form of "historical" paintings. It is therefore no wonder that Weems' conception of Washington as a wholly great and good person, superhumanly virtuous and worthy of reverence, has penetrated and become deeply rooted in the historic consciousness of the American people.

Just to give an idea of the naive and credulous tone pervading these legends, I shall here repeat the most famous one—the story of little George and the cherry tree. The boy George had received a hatchet from his father as a birthday present, with the strict admonition to do no harm with it. Nevertheless, he was unable to refrain from cutting into one of the fruit-trees in the garden, which happened to be his father's favorite cherry tree. When the elder Washington discovered the damage, he called together, trembling with anger, all who dwelt on the plantation, and began to sharply question the negro slaves, whom he naturally suspected and who would surely have been punished despite all their denials had not little George stepped forth with big tears in his blue eyes and said: "Dear father, I cannot tell a lie. It was I who cut down the tree. I did it with my little hatchet." Touched by his son's honesty, his father forgave him, adds Weems, happy to show virtue's reward. And he achieved his purpose. The story about the cherry tree and the little hatchet is known to every child in America. Every year, on Washington's birthday, each American child receives a little hatchet of cardboard, wood or chocolate, in commemoration of the triumph of truthfulness and as a friendly hint.

The glowing portrayals of this great historic personality gradually brought about a reaction which has been increasing in violence, especially since the World War. There first appeared a group of investigators who gave us a critical, though sympathetic picture of Washington from a friendly viewpoint. They have been followed by more aggressive critics, who not only wish to remove his hero's raiment but want to strip him to the skin and exhibit him in all his nakedness. During these attempts, much new material was dug up, many little-known documents acquired great importance and old material assumed new significance when examined from a more critical viewpoint. One investigator ransacked his accounts to discover the amount of his gambling debts, another examined his financial transactions or rummaged about his office in order to establish the fact that he not only drank spirits but brewed both ale and stronger drinks on his estate.

It is therefore a new and far more accurate picture that the historians now give us of the "Father of his Country." He was, indeed, no Puritan or hypocrite, but he revered righteousness. Two of his last official acts were possibly of the most permanent and outstanding importance: one was his renunciation of the office of President, which he had already held for two terms, and the other was his "Farewell Speech" made on the occasion of his retirement.

It has never since been possible for any man to be elected President more than twice, even if more than one politician and his party have harbored such a wish. Washington's example has militated against all such ambitions, and against any idea of giving power for life or for a long period to any individual.

Most of the international importance of the Farewell Speech, from the political viewpoint, is due to the statement it contains that "it is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the world around us." Although Washington himself would hardly interpret this like Senator Borah, his words have constituted one of the weightiest arguments used by the isolationists in their fight against America's entry into the League of Nations or her close cooperation with foreign powers. As a rule, the argument is put forward on Washington's authority, which is regarded as indisputable, as is shown by the following extract from a Hearst newspaper: "How can it occur to any man to slight Washington's words by setting himself above him in wisdom?"

This brief statement shows the unique place occupied by the memory of Washington in the consciousness of his people. Though dead, he is still a living political force. This is why advocates of prohibition and preachers of morality fight tooth and nail against being deprived of the use of his example in their agitation, as a result of the unveiling of his true character. This makes it all the more praiseworthy that the official American Commission for the Celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of Washington's Birth has opposed every attempt to deify Washington. It merely wishes to have the American people see and appreciate him as he really was—with his defects as well as his great qualities—as a man who, owing to his deeds and human traits—both the good and the less good—has a claim to the admiration of future generations and may always be held up as a model in certain respects.

HAITI

THE Bicentennial in Haiti, a success and an inspiration from beginning to end, to be fully appreciated, must be considered in the light of two important factors: Haitian history and the present plight of Haiti.

Christopher Columbus discovered Haiti on December 6, 1492, on his first voyage of adventure. Almost from that day to this the history of the island has been made with one goal always in mind by its inhabitants—complete liberty. In struggles that have ensued, several preeminent heroes have come to the forefront. Who has not read of Toussaint L'Ouverture, the great Negro who arose from abject slavery to the governorship of his people, only to be deposed by the intrigue of Napoleon, whose formidable armies Toussaint for a time successfully defied? Later Dessalines, gave anew the name of Haiti to the island, broke the French domination, and became emperor himself. In 1806, Christophe, the slave who became Chief of State, established Haiti as a Kingdom and proved to be an administrator of exceptional ability. Pétion, who gave aid to Bolívar in the form of arms and money for fighting for the independence of the Spanish colonies and for the abolition of slavery, established Haiti as a republic. These brave men and many other native heroes have carved their niches in Haitian history.

But despite the fact that Haiti has the great heroes of its own mentioned above to memorialize; and despite the fact that there is a certain delicacy in the political relations between Haiti and the United States because of our intervention policies, Haiti, with sportsmanlike gesture, joined in the celebration of the George Washington Bicentennial and gave expression to its high regard for the Great American through the medium of official messages and decrees, published eulogies and thorough cooperation with the American colony in the capital city, Port au Prince, in Washington religious services, races, parades, a tree-planting ceremony and an official reception.

His Excellency Stenio Vincent, President of Haiti, epitomized the feelings of his people in a Washington day message to President Herbert Hoover, as follows:

FEBRUARY 22, 1932.

HIS EXCELLENCY
PRESIDENT HOOVER
WASHINGTON, D. C.

ON THIS OCCASION OF THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE BIRTH OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, I EXPRESS THE MOST CORDIAL GOOD WISHES FOR THE INCREASING PROSPERITY OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE AND FOR THE DEVELOPMENT IN AN ATMOSPHERE OF PEACE, JUSTICE, AND CONCORD, OF THE HISTORIC FRIENDSHIP WHICH LINKS OUR TWO NATIONS.

(SIGNED) STENIO VINCENT,
PRESIDENT OF HAITI.

To the Secretary of State in Washington, D. C., the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Haiti, Hon. Abel Leger, conveyed the following felicitative dispatch from the Haitian Government on February 22, 1932:

PORT AU PRINCE, HAITI,
FEBRUARY 22, 1932.

HIS EXCELLENCY
THE SECRETARY OF STATE
WASHINGTON, D. C.

I TAKE THE OPPORTUNITY OF THE COMMEMORATION OF THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE BIRTH OF WASHINGTON TO TRANSMIT TO YOUR EXCELLENCY THE GOOD WISHES OF THE HAITIAN GOVERNMENT FOR THE GREATNESS AND PROSPERITY OF THE AMERICAN NATION.

(SIGNED) ABEL LEGER,
MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

His Excellency Dantes Bellegarde, Minister from Haiti, summarized the attitude of his Haitian countrymen with respect to the foreign policies advocated by President Washington in a splendid article submitted to the special Bicentennial edition of the WASHINGTON TIMES, May 30, 1932. Under the caption "Farewell of Washington Urged as Political Bible for Americas" the article follows:

Washington is a great man, not only for the United States, but also for the whole of humanity. His glory goes far beyond the borders of his own country, because he was able to rise above purely nationalistic interests by conceiving an international order based on pacific cooperation of peoples.

His Farewell Address to his fellow countrymen is a monument of political wisdom in which all nations, whether small or big, weak or powerful, can find rules of practical and skillful conduct. Speaking to a nation, still young, whose position in the world had to be strengthened, he gave to the Americans the wise counsels he drew from his personal knowledge of life and government.

This address should be the political Bible of all the young nations—especially those of America—loving their independence and desirous to maintain it against all violent or subtle aggressions.

In this immortal message Washington can be said to have defined the true policy which should be the attitude of the United States toward Latin America in particular.

The first thing he recommended to his countrymen is that they must observe good faith and justice toward all nations, cultivating harmony with all, avoid the blind attachments and inveterate antipathies that tend to make a nation a slave to its partialities and its passions.

He recognized legal equality of independent States as the only foundation of friendly international relations—thus excluding all interventions of one nation in the internal affairs of another, all attempt at subjecting a sovereign state to a foreign will, all imposition under duress of treaties or conventions by a powerful people upon a weak one.

Let us quote these memorable words: "Observe good faith and justice toward all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it?"

"Attachment of a small or weak toward a great and powerful nation dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter. . . . Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, the jealousy, of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government.

". . . The great rule of conduct, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible.

"I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than private affairs that honesty is always the best policy.

"Harmony and a liberal intercourse with all nations are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand . . . diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce but forcing nothing. . . .

"It is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; by acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard."

These recommendations are more imperative and wiser now than at any other time. The economic and financial depression in which all of our countries find themselves submerged, shows clearly that Latin-America needs the United States as the United States needs Latin-America.

In these hours of common difficulties, they have to search for and take those common measures which are demanded by the situation. No single one of our nations can, alone and unaided, solve its economic and financial crisis.

The improvement and final restoration of affairs in America can result only through collective efforts, adopted through an intensive collaboration between our various countries, between the producers of raw materials and those who sell manufactured products, between creditors and debtors, between capital and labor, in order to reach a better distribution of wealth and a more exact equilibrium between production and consumption.

But international cooperation implies confidence. Lack of confidence and fear constitute a barrier to honest business and a menace to peace.

They can be dissipated only by measures capable of supplying to the economic policy of continental America, a moral and political foundation that will rest firmly on the organization of international justice, on the principle of the legal equality of States and on the absolute respect for the independence and the territorial and administrative integrity of our 21 American Republics.

In this capital enterprise the first role has been proposed to the United States by George Washington himself:

"It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue?"

DR. DANA G. MUNRO, AMERICAN MINISTER, DELIVERING A BICENTENNIAL ADDRESS AT A GEORGE WASHINGTON TREE PLANTING CEREMONY IN PORT AU PRINCE.

The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices? . . ."

In this policy of justice and benevolence the small States of America will find the true guarantee of peace necessary for their security.

There is much ado about the question of disarmament. Evidently, it should be a relief for all nations if the billions deducted from world resources and devoted to dangerous armaments were employed in productive enterprises which would add to human welfare. But that disarmament, however desirable it may be, would not alone suffice to settle the question of world peace.

Bring two nations, unarmed in the material sense of the word, face to face; they would make war on each other if the spirit of war existed between them, and it is the stronger, by reason of population, industrial organization and the discipline of the masses, that would emerge victorious from the fight. . . .

The President of Haiti, by executive decree, proclaimed February 22, 1932, a national holiday in Haiti in commemoration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the birth of George Washington. The decree reads:

In order fittingly to observe the Bicentennial in Haiti a preliminary meeting was arranged by the American Minister to Haiti, Hon. Dana G. Munro, early in February, 1932, at the American Legation in Port au Prince. From the group of prominent American citizens who responded, a committee was appointed to prepare Bicentennial programs for February 21 and 22, 1932.

The opening observance took place on Sunday morning, February 21, when the American colony and many Haitians convened at the Holy Trinity (Episcopal) Cathedral in Port au Prince and there sung a mass in memory of George Washington. Rev. Pastor Kroll officiated and chose as the theme for his sermon the life and Christian character of George Washington and its relation to modern day civilization.

On Sunday afternoon there was held under the auspices of the Polo and Jockey Club of Port au Prince a race meet in honor of George Washington. The American colony attended in a body.

The ceremonies on Washington's birthday opened with a nine o'clock morning review and parade in the barracks of the Second Regiment of the United States Marines. This was followed by a tactical demonstration by the VO9M Aerial Squadron of the Marine Brigade. A large gathering witnessed these military units salute, as only Marines can salute, in honor of George Washington, first Commander-in-Chief of the American army.

At four p. m. the President of the Republic of Haiti, members of his cabinet and other high government officials, together with local American officers and members of the diplomatic and consular corps and a large crowd of American and Haitian citizens met on property of the American Legation at Bourdon to attend a Washington tree-planting ceremony. A native Haitian oak was planted in commemoration of the occasion. Mr. Dana, in reporting the event to the Department of State, in Washington, D. C., says that "the Legation was fortunate in having Mr. Edmond de Lespinasse, a very prominent Haitian, address the gathering." Mr. de Lespinasse spoke in French and his discourse has been thus translated:

GENTLEMEN:

Throughout history there appear great personalities which, by their exceptional merit, by the work which they have undertaken and carried to a successful conclusion, by the austerity of their character and the virtues which distinguish them, demand and receive the respect of all nations and of all races.

The powerful Republic, which was the first in this hemisphere to be born free and independent, had the enviable fortune to have in its infancy one of those great figures which ennoble all humanity. It is therefore natural, Gentlemen, that on the occasion of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, because of the respect which we owe to his memory, we should gather together with all feeling people, all those of advanced civilization capable of realizing the grandeur of the stature of the man whom we honor here today.

It is, therefore, without reserve, without concerning myself with circumstances or discussions which might detract from our veneration, that I am here in response to an invitation which honored me by asking me to participate in a special manner in your pious manifestation. I am the more pleased at this opportunity since I have been asked to dwell on the fact that in the struggles of the founder of the first sovereign nation of the New World, we of this small people of Haiti, who have so often refused so many things, but to whom one has turned whenever questions of honor were in play, we also have played an humble part.

When Louis XVI, the King of France, decided to join the force of his arms in the military movements of your thirteen States, he so informed the Count d'Argout, who was then Governor of the land which we occupy today and which was then called St. Domingue. By a decree which had been asked for by Mr. de Sartines, Minister of the Marine of the Kingdom of France, Monsieur d'Argout issued an appeal to all loyal soldiers of the King in the colony to come to the aid of that new banner which you had raised so high in the world and which is the flag of the United States of North America. But, as there was need of courageous soldiers, and at that time the world was entering on certain new paths, it was decided to appeal to men who had been denied certain rights but who were recognized to be valorous and heroic. Thus it is that on the 12th of March, 1779, there was created a Legion of volunteer infantrymen of St. Domingue, composed exclusively of men of color and of free blacks who had been asked to take part in the great war which was going on between you, France, and the Kingdom of England. The Legion of Infantrymen of St. Domingue set sail with the fleet of the Count d'Estaing in August of the same year. The 8th of September, acting as reserves of the Royal French Army, it participated in the attack on the city of Savannah. It was decided to execute a demonstration of the French fleet off the American coast in order to harry the English who already were in possession of Georgia and were menacing the Carolinas. But the English forces concentrated on this point held up the efforts of the allies and it became necessary to undertake the siege of Savannah. The Legion of the Volunteer Infantrymen of St. Domingue were given the formidable task of starting operations against the town and on the night of the 23rd to the 24th of September were ordered to open the attack. At the first attempt the English army met the Legion, and at the first shock, which it resisted to the end, 88 of our people not counting the wounded fell for the defense of your cause on that land of Georgia which some time later was to be independent.

The siege conducted by the Count d'Estaing, having lasted some time, it was decided to attempt to take the town, and this time we find the Volunteer Infantrymen of St. Domingue in the front ranks, the first to bare their chests to the bullets of the English. Despite three consecutive attacks, the town was not taken, but the Count d'Estaing, wounded, refused to leave the field of battle.

It is not without emotion that I recall these heroic events.

And, Gentlemen, let it not be said that these were the soldiers of the Kingdom of France who were fighting. Although at this moment we had not yet forsaken the glorious flag of the fleur de lys, we ourselves were in danger and on the field of glory; and it was in this heroic legion that we find many of those who a few years later, in imitation of your actions and following the example of your heroes, created in their turn the second free country in America. Henry Christophe, who was later the King of Haiti and whose name is known to you, is said to have received his first wound in the last attack on the trenches before Savannah.

History sometimes furnishes singular lessons, and I may be permitted to find in this ceremony of today a happy coincidence—those dead who still lie on the soil of Georgia will doubtless not disavow their descendants who say that there still exist, outside of treaties and petty interests certain great principles to which the people of all races must submit themselves.

The second guest speaker of the tree-planting occasion was Honorable James Wadsworth, former United States Senator from New York, and orator par excellence, whose presence in Port au Prince, on the Washington day celebration was opportune. Mr. Wadsworth eulogized Washington as a builder of government, and emphasized particularly in the character of the man, his great steadfastness and courage. Washington was upheld as an example for all humanity in these respects, and particularly for men in public office.

The first shovel-full of earth was deposited around the Washington tree by President Vincent, the second by the Minister of Foreign Relations, and the third by the American Minister.

The Commemorative day terminated with the holding of a gala Washington reception at the Pétionville Club, under the auspices of the Port au Prince Bicentennial Committee. The American Minister claims that this affair was "attended by one of the largest gatherings of Haitians and Americans ever seen in Port au Prince. The President of the Republic as well as his Cabinet and other high Haitian dignitaries and the members of the Diplomatic and Consular corps remained until the reception was quite at an end. It is estimated that between five and six hundred persons were there."

LE TEMPS, HAITI JOURNAL, LE NOUVELLISTE, L'ACTION NATIONALE, L'OPINION, L'ELAN, LE MATIN and other Haitian newspapers gave liberally of their space in chronicling the above events.

During the latter part of the Bicentennial year, Mr. Norman Armour, who as American Chargé d'Affaires in France had taken a very active part in the Washington celebrations there, was made Minister to Haiti. Mr. Armour gave appropriate emphasis to the Bicentennial on the occasion of the presentation of his letter of credence and the letter of recall of his predecessor to his Excellency the President of the Republic of Haiti. The speech

Mr. Armour made on this occasion contained fitting reference to George Washington, wherein Mr. Armour said:

I shall make it my constant endeavor to contribute wherever possible toward the maintenance of the ties of true friendship that have united our two countries. In this year when all of my country is celebrating the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Washington, it has been a source of great pleasure to the people of the United States to recall the very material assistance rendered by the people of Haiti toward the cause of American liberty. Not only did several hundred sons of Haiti volunteer their services and join the French Admiral, Comte d'Estaing, later participating in the Battle of Savannah, but many of them who made the supreme sacrifice now rest in my country, a solemn pledge to the friendship that must ever prevail between the two oldest republics of the Western Hemisphere.

In answering these remarks, the President of Haiti said, among other things:

The unforgettable historical memories which you have so delicately evoked will touch the hearts of Haitians who are legitimately proud at times to recall the effective contribution which their ancestors made to the cause of the liberty and independence of your great country.

LE TEMPS [a Haitian newspaper] on February 19, 1932, said, concerning the invitation of the American colony to assist in the planting of a commemorative tree in honor of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, that all those invited should attend. Accordingly, we were at the appointed hour at the beautifully situated Petionville Club at Bourdon.

It is but the most elementary good manners for our government and the members of the official family at Port au Prince to respond to the kind and cordial invitation of the American Colony to honor George Washington as a fine example to humanity, who, by his triumph, inspired our leaders and lit the flame of the torch of Independence of Haiti.

Yes, this historical fact ought to be remembered. Contrary to the general opinion here, the French Revolution of 1789 was not the initial step, the first event in the emancipation of conglomerate groups from the domination of others. It was, rather, the great victory won by Washington aided by a phalanx of brave men among whom are found some of our own people, and the foundation by Washington of the first of a series of free and independent states of which our Republic of Haiti is one.

[Here the writer gives further historical facts and dates to substantiate his advocacy of Washington as the precursor to the freedom of Haiti, rather than the French Revolution.]

Washington is dead. He was a great man who fought against tyranny and his memory should always be as dear to the French as to all free peoples the world over. . . . The legends of other great men, it seems, are formed bit by bit around their memory, but the legend of Washington springs directly from his personality. . . . Chateaubriand has said: "Something of silence envelops the actions of Washington. He moves slowly—one might say that he feels himself charged with the freedom of the future and that he fears to compromise it."

We, as Haitians, actually under the domination of the United States, are especially charged to honor the memory of the Washington, that great and magnanimous man of State, who before his death freed his Negroes, revealing thus that the question of slavery was troubling his spirit. Sixty years later, the principal cause of the terrible American Civil War was slavery. Washington prepared the way for Lincoln.

After reading the entire report from Haiti, one can not help but feel that the genuine attitude of the majority of people there with respect to George Washington is summarized in such words as those already quoted from the Haitian Minister and Mr. Lespinasse. The following editorial from L'ACTION NATIONALE of February 29, 1932, adds another country's testimony to the world estimate of the Great American:

GEORGE WASHINGTON, GENTLEMAN

George Washington was of the age of nobility. He was born a gentleman; he lived and died a land-holding aristocrat. . . .

As a young man Washington did not evidence the brilliance that Benjamin Franklin showed at the same age, nor of Voltaire with his divine talents. But Washington was not a rustic nor untutored. The quality of his spirit was shown in his acts as a child. He did not have a quick perception; he did not have a fertile imagination. He was not gifted on tongue, but he did know how to see and understand realities. His whole life and his every action molded in him a precision and a sense of justice that gave him a sympathetic understanding. The young Franklin, the young Voltaire, the young Rousseau were of the world; on the other hand the young Washington was solidly rooted in the soil that he loved and which seemed to suit him.

The role of Washington in the War of Independence is well known. He threw himself into it heart and soul and was triumphant. The army wished to make him king. He refused with disdain and returned to Mt. Vernon. He exercised over the American federation a dictatorship of the spirit. Against his own personal inclination he consented to become President that he might establish order and conduct the young state into normal paths. He did not interest himself in foreign affairs. When Lafayette, enthusiastic and naive always, gave him a key to the Bastille, Washington placed it in his pocket and sent him an ordinary letter of thanks and a pair of shoe buckles.

He left public life with its politics and its party strife and returned to his home with a great deal of pleasure, worked on his accounts, wrote in his diary, thought of the past, and shortly after, on December 14, 1799, closed his eyes for the last time.

Few men have used their lives to better advantage. Few men have left a nobler legend. This aristocrat who founded the first modern democracy was, on the whole, great and noble.

On Pan American Day, April 14, 1932, His Excellency, Sténio Vincent, President of Haiti, sent the following message to be read at the tomb of George Washington:

I GLADLY ASSOCIATE THE REPUBLIC OF HAITI ON THIS PAN AMERICAN DAY WITH THE CEREMONY WHICH IS PART OF THE IMPRESSIVE CELEBRATION OF THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE BIRTH OF GEORGE WASHINGTON.

OUR CONTINENT OWES TO THIS LEADER, EMINENT AMONG ALL LEADERS, ITS FIRST LESSON OF PATRIOTISM, ITS FIRST GLORIOUS DEEDS, ITS FIRST BREATH OF EMANCIPATION, ITS FIRST DEMOCRATIC VIRTUES, THE FIRST BASIS OF ITS INTERNATIONAL COMMUNITY OF INTERESTS.

FURTHERMORE, OUR HEMISPHERE OWES HIM THAT GREAT PRINCIPLE—WHICH HE PROCLAIMED WITH PROFOUND FEELING IN HIS FAREWELL ADDRESS TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE—THAT THE INDEPENDENCE OF THE NATION SHOULD BE CONSIDERED MORE PRECIOUS THAN ALL THE BENEFITS WHICH MIGHT BE OBTAINED FROM ABROAD—A GRANDIOSE CONCEPTION OF NATIONAL DIGNITY WHICH SHOULD BE THE GOSPEL OF THE LATIN AMERICAN REPUBLICS.

IT IS TRUE THAT WE HAVE THE DOCTRINE OF PAN AMERICANISM, WHICH WE PLACE TODAY UNDER THE TUTELARY POWER OF THAT DEAD HERO. LET US INVOKE AT HIS TOMB THE ENLIGHTENMENT OF HIS AUTHORITY SO THAT CONTINENTAL UNION MAY BE BETTER UNDERSTOOD.

IT CAN NOT BE FOR NAUGHT THAT, FOLLOWING THE EXAMPLE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, THE AMERICAN PEOPLES SHOULD HAVE CAST OFF THE CHAINS OF SLAVERY, SOCIAL OR MORAL DEGRADATION, POLITICAL DOMINATION, OR THE TYRANNOUS PERSECUTION OF THEIR EUROPEAN MOTHER COUNTRIES; THAT THEY SHOULD HAVE SHAKEN OFF WITH NO DEFINITE RESULT THE UNHAPPY AND UNJUST LEGACIES OF THE COLONIAL REGIME; THAT THEY SHOULD HAVE APPROVED THE CELEBRATED MESSAGE OF 1823; WITHOUT ENJOYING IN THEIR OWN COUNTRIES THE IDEAS OF LIBERTY AND INDEPENDENCE PROCLAIMED WITH RESPECT TO EUROPE; THAT THEIR DREAMS OF A REGENERATING CIVILIZATION SHOULD BE BRUTALLY DISPELLED BY THE SELFISH REALITIES OF INTERNATIONAL LIFE.

AT THIS TOMB WE MUST DRAW THE LESSONS OF EXPERIENCE AND OF HISTORY. THE PEOPLES OF AMERICA MUST REASSERT THEMSELVES.

APEALS TO SOLIDARITY, STEPS TOWARD UNDERSTANDING AND COMPREHENSION, HYMNS OF COOPERATION AND CONCILIATION, MANIFESTATIONS OF FRIENDSHIP AND GOOD WILL, EFFORTS AT CLOSER RELATIONS, SHOULD BE COMPENSATED BY OUR DEMOCRATIC EQUALITY AND BY RESPECT FOR OUR NATIONAL INDEPENDENCE AND OUR LIBERTY.

WE MUST PUT BEHIND US DESTRUCTIVE DOCTRINES, LEGAL SUBTLETIES, NEW AND STRANGE DOGMAS, AS WELL AS THE ENTIRE SYSTEM "OF INTERPOSITIONS OF A TEMPORARY CHARACTER," PRAISED BY BLIND FORCES SEEKING THE PROTECTION OF THEIR COMMERCIAL AND BANKING STATUS ABROAD, BUT WHICH FOSTER DOUBTS, RANCORS, RESERVATIONS, FEARS, UTILITARIAN PRESSURE, AND FICTITIOUS INDEPENDENCE.

PERMIT ME TO PAY HERE A HEARTFELT TRIBUTE TO PRESIDENT HOOVER, WHOSE POWERFUL WILL IS STRUGGLING AGAINST OPPOSING CURRENTS AND IS GIVING PROOF OF HIS LIBERALISM, ESPECIALLY TO THE REPUBLIC OF HAITI. PRESIDENT HOOVER WITNESSED THE GREAT TRAGEDY OF THE WORLD WAR. WELL HE KNOWS AT THE PRICE OF WHAT MISERIES, WHAT DISTRESS, WHAT SUFFERINGS, WHAT SACRIFICES, NATIONS STRUGGLE FOR THEIR INDEPENDENCE AND THE MAINTENANCE OF THEIR RIGHTS.

HEIR TO THE GREAT TRADITION OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, LIKE HIS PREDECESSOR HE WILL TAKE UP HIS RESPONSIBILITIES AND CONFRONT THE OBSCURE FORCES WHICH DESIRE TO PREVENT HIS GOVERNMENT FROM PERMITTING THE IDEA OF SOVEREIGNTY TO PREVAIL OVER PRIVATE OR INDIVIDUAL INTERESTS OR OVER "BENEFITS TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES."

STÉNIO VINCENT,
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC.

A tribute written by the Minister of Haiti especially for the Bicentennial Number of the AMERICANIZATION BULLETIN and reprinted here by permission sets the seal of Haitian approbation on the life of George Washington:

Washington is a great man, not only for the United States, but for the whole world. His glory goes far beyond the borders of his own country, because he was able to rise above purely nationalistic interests by conceiving an international order based on the pacific and cordial cooperation of peoples. His farewell address to his fellow-countrymen is a monument of political wisdom in which all nations, big or small, can find practical rules of conduct. Speaking to a people still young, whose position in the world needed to be strengthened, he counseled that prudence which his experience had taught him. This message should be the political Bible for all young nations, those of America particularly, nations proud of their independence, and aspiring to attain the highest plane of moral and material civilization.

COLOMBIA

TO THE people of Colombia, South America, George Washington is no less of a hero than their own liberators Simon Bolívar and F. de P. Santander, who routed the Spanish royalist forces at Boyacá in 1819 and saw Colombia become a republic with Bolívar as its first President in 1821. This same Bolívar had called Washington, whose deeds he emulated, "benefactor of the continent of Columbus," "first man in the universe," and "father of America." In the United States of North America, Bolívar is hailed as one of the great liberators of the Western World and his equestrian statue now occupies a distinguished place in Central Park, New York City.

This mutual admiration and respect for the national heroes of the two American republics took on a deeper and more expressive significance during the Bicentennial of George Washington. Although there were no great public demonstrations honoring Washington in Colombia during 1932, there is ample evidence in print to prove the sincerity of the Latin nation's regard for the Great American. Newspapers, magazines and periodicals in Bogotá, Barranquilla, Buenaventura, and Medellín voiced the thoughts of the people.

The following two editorials were outstanding among the many Washington articles appearing in Bogotá, capital city journals, the first being from EL TIEMPO, issue of February 22, and the second from EL ESPECTADOR of the same date:

WASHINGTON'S CENTENARY

Two centuries ago George Washington first saw the light of day. The people of the United States and all the democracies in the world commemorate this date. Washington is really a model of the superior man, not by genius but by the exalted virtues which were his and which he succeeded in implanting in the establishment of a republic which was forged according to the principles and austere habits which regulated the life of its first governor.

The simple puritan democracy founded by Washington and Franklin could not be eternal. The implacable curse of time, the formidable enrichment of the American nation and the complications of progress and science modified the basis of society in the United States and in all countries, so that, if Washington were permitted to witness what is happening today he would return horrified to his grave in Mount Vernon. Nevertheless, the influence of the principles laid down by Washington in his memorable farewell address still exists. The policy of non-intervention in European affairs has prevailed despite everything because it was recommended by Washington. And, likewise, no President has dared to accept a third term, in spite of its having been offered on several occasions, because Washington refused it.

George Washington is one of the positive assets of which humanity can be proud. He did not have, it is true, the brilliance of a Napoleon or a Bolívar, but he did possess, on the other hand, the great and noble qualities which make life productive and pleasant. These qualities made it possible for him to perform one of the most portentous labors in history by creating the strongest nation of modern times, which was strengthened and made great by the fundamental stimulus which he gave it and by the realization of his dreams in the period of its formation, when they were most needed.

We join wholeheartedly with the American people in the commemoration of this important date.

WASHINGTON

The second centenary of the birth of George Washington is being celebrated today by the United States of America with a vast homage to the really great life of the father of the country. The figure of Washington who, because of his work, might be considered purely national, may not, however, be contained in and limited to the frame of the history of his people. The American revolution, giving the former word its appropriate continental meaning, must be considered as a movement which, if not uniform, was at bottom homogeneous, and the historic influence of its great leaders, transcending national boundaries, enters the panorama of the whole world. In this way, the noblest of the founders of the United States has a meaning for all the countries of the new world and all the republics of America should and do in fact participate in the commemoration of the birthday of this beautiful life.

The virtues of Washington could not be appraised by a method of comparison with the brilliant qualities of the Latin leaders of the revolution for independence on this continent, especially with the prolific genius of the American hero par excellence, Simon Bolívar. Washington was a sublime but not disproportionate incarnation of the productive qualities of his race, transplanted into a medium which enforced a new vigor upon them. This figure is not associated with the dramatic and brilliantly heroic deeds of the fiery leaders who wrote with bold, ambitious and impatient strokes the Spanish American epic of liberty. Washington represented not madness, but deep, orderly and steady fervor.

The great American was animated by the most generous ideals of Christian democracy, liberty and justice. It cannot be denied that the aspiration of progress nursed by the founders of the Anglo-American nation has been fully realized in proportions which they could not have imagined. Whether the beautiful moral ideals and the high principles of social life based on justice and love have likewise been fulfilled along with the formidable process of the accumulation of wealth, or whether the latter has impaired or deformed the reality of those principles and ideals in the creation of a system at the same time powerful and unstable, is a question which it is not our purpose to answer on this day dedicated to the enhancement of the memory of one of the worthiest and most excellent men of the continent.

The support of the Bicentennial Celebration in Bogotá accorded by the following periodicals is also worthy of mention and commendation: MUNDO AL DIA, EL NUEVO TIEMPO, and NEGOCIOS COLOMBIANOS.

Colombians living on the northern coast of the country read such Washington tributes as the following from DIARIO DEL COMERCIO, Barranquilla, February 22, 1932, and LA PRENSA, Barranquilla, for the same date, respectively:

BICENTENNIAL OF THE BIRTH OF GEORGE WASHINGTON

The United States of America is today celebrating the second centennial of the birth of George Washington, the creator of that great republic which today gives its democratic example to the world and with its marvelous prosperity guides the progress of all nations.

All the details of this celebration are directed by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, a body which the North American Congress created by special law; and in addition to the external sumptuousness which always marks great patriotic celebrations in the United States, the organizers have succeeded in giving it a profound spiritual meaning by their unrelenting efforts to bring about what we might call "The Understanding of Washington," that is, the presentation to the people of the Union of all the phases of the life of the great citizen in terms of sufficient clarity so that the beauty of his spirit may be understood and in this way they may be invited to a noble imitation of the virtues which flourished in him.

SIGNING THE DRAFTED CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES
This modern painting by Henry Hintermeister presents vividly the final moments of George Washington's services as President of the Federal Convention.

We are happy to have the opportunity which the bicentennial of the birth of Washington offers to us, to present our greetings to the Consul of the United States at Barranquilla, Mr. Erik W. Magnusson, and through him to all the members of the North American colony residing in this city.

GEORGE WASHINGTON

In George Washington, as in Francisco de Paula Santander and in Antonio José de Sucre, we must admire the man of civil life over and above the commander of armies. His was not the military genius able to lead his hosts from victory to victory. But his was the genius which stamps his personality on a nation and moulds it in unmistakable form. In his spirit he incarnates the future and his eyes look beyond the centuries. The characteristic tendencies of the race, in its transcendental evolution, have an interpreter in the sensitiveness of his spirit, and his actions reflect this revolutionary tendency. And like indices of progressive movement, all his acts, even without his intention, tend toward the same end, the supreme end which becomes his reason for being.

From Mount Vernon George Washington foresaw the great nation that he created. In his mind it developed in all its lineaments of grandeur and prosperity. He felt that this country would become the depository of civilization and the task he achieved made possible the historic determinism which rules the nations. Bolívar in his Jamaica letter conceived the greatness of the part of America that he liberated.

Washington developed in the midst of a strong race, of different ancestry from that of the Spanish conquistadors who came to our countries. They had more energy than the swarthy men of the tropics, more practical common sense, and they had succeeded in chaining the imagination and confining it within narrow limits. Bolívar, on the other hand, operated on inferior ground. He did not have the same ingredients for his enterprise.

Naturally any parallel is impossible. And if we sought to establish one we should consider the two first men: Sucre and Santander. Vicuña Mackena sees this similarity and calls the Marshal of Ayacucho the Washington of the South. He sees in them identical qualities of generosity, abnegation, respect, humanity. He places them on the same psychological plane, as man of civil life even within the turmoil of war. And this is indeed the characteristic of Washington. When he employed force his mind was fixed on the establishment of right and the abolishment in the future of the rule of force. To his spirit it seemed essential not to win battles, but to guarantee liberty. Later Lincoln appeared to complete his work; his were the same aspirations, and he too had to use force; but in the end he succeeded in completing the work that had had its inception in the mind of George Washington. Like the great Marshal, Washington treated his soldiers kindly but enforced severe discipline. He was dynamic in action and resposed in thought, and he conceived law as the instrument of the social transformation he had undertaken.

When Washington appeared the hour had come to effect this change. The thrones of Europe were beginning to totter, undermined by the anguish of a people condemned to servitude, but sustained by the people's fear of action. The destroyers of monarchy had not yet arisen, but the atmosphere was impregnated with regicide. General Lafayette, infected with the Washington spirit, carried to Paris the seed that he had received from the soil of Mount Vernon itself and from the seed that he himself sowed, democracy sprang forth, the democratic regime, to become universal and to return to America hidden in the leaves of the "Rights of Man."

But it was perhaps in the hands of Washington that the first torch blazed; and on practical grounds and without wild exaggerations of philosophical conceptions, but with a profoundly human sense, this torch illumines the democracy of the future.

Two hundred years ago today George Washington was born to stabilize a new conception of social organization. We salute the memory of the great man.

From the American vice consul in Buenaventura, Colombia, word was received that "lengthy illustrated articles on the life of George Washington appeared in all of the important papers in the district." In the same dispatch the vice consul says:

At the request of members of the municipal reading room of Buenaventura a large colored portrait of Washington was supplied by this office and placed on the walls of the reading room. . . . A number of prominent individuals called at this Consulate on February 22 and gave expression to remarks evidencing their admiration for Washington whose name Colombians invariably associate with that of Simon Bolívar, El Libertador. It may be added that since the fire of January 26, 1932, which destroyed almost the entire business section of Buenaventura and resulted in serious losses and distress to large numbers of the population of all classes many of whom have since left the Port, anniversaries and feasts commonly celebrated have been allowed to pass without observance.

The Minister of Colombia, Dr. Fabio Lozano, conveyed the official Bicentennial felicitations of his Government to the American people in three separate messages. The first of these was a tribute from the President of the Republic of Colombia, His Excellency Enrique Olaya Herrera, which was read by the Minister before the graves of George and Martha Washington at Mount Vernon on Pan American Day, April 14, 1932. This message follows:

FROM THE LIFE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON ONE LESSON STANDS FORTH THAT IS TO ME OF MORE INTEREST THAN THE GREAT WORK HE ACCOMPLISHED IN WINNING THE INDEPENDENCE AND LIBERTY OF HIS COUNTRY. IT IS THAT IN THIS GREAT AMERICAN IS INCARNATE THE TYPE OF STATESMAN THAT IS CAPABLE OF CONVERTING HIS IDEAL OF GOVERNMENT INTO A PRACTICAL AND STABLE REALITY THROUGH THE SHEER STRENGTH OF HIS UPRIGHTNESS AND DETERMINATION, WITHOUT HAVING RECOURSE TO SECRET MACHINATIONS, TO OPPORTUNISM, OR TO THAT DIVERGENCE BETWEEN PUBLIC AND PRIVATE MORALITY OF WHICH THE SCIENCE AND ART OF POLITICS HAVE BEEN BELIEVED FOR MANY CENTURIES TO CONSIST.

WASHINGTON INTRUSTED HIS SUCCESS TO THE RECTITUDE OF HIS PURPOSE, AND HE WAS INDIFFERENT TO, IF NOT DISDAINFUL OF, THE FORTUITOUS AND TRANSITORY UNPOPULARITY OF HIS DEEDS.

WASHINGTON IS THE NEW PRINCE, WHOSE RULES OF GOV-

ERNMENT ARE STUDIED WITH DEVOTION AND FOLLOWED WITH LOYALTY BY THE CONSCIENTIOUS MEN OF ALL NATIONS.

ENRIQUE OLAYA HERRERA,
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC.

The special Bicentennial edition of the WASHINGTON TIMES, Washington, D. C., May 30, 1932, carried the following greeting from the Republic of Colombia as a large display:

THE REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA IS PROUD TO DO HONOR TO SO ESTIMABLE A PATRIOT AS THE FIRST PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA—
GEORGE WASHINGTON

Dr. Lozano's personal estimate of Washington appeared in the same paper under the title "Washington Owned a Rare Understanding of All Ideals of Liberty." The article is reprinted herewith:

In 1924 the centenary of the Battle of Ayacucho was celebrated with unparalleled magnificence in the city of Lima. One of the most impressive ceremonies was the unveiling of the statue of Washington in the park which bears his name.

On that occasion, Antonio José Restrepo, a Colombian, famous for his learning and his eloquence, delivered a eulogy on Washington before General Pershing and a notable gathering of distinguished citizens of American nations.

The author of these lines had the privilege of representing Colombia as its plenipotentiary on that memorable occasion celebrating continental solidarity, a privilege repeated when, also as Minister of Colombia, he witnessed the solemn rites with which the powerful democracy of Jefferson, Lincoln, and Wilson commemorated the Bicentenary of the liberator's birth.

The Battle of Ayacucho was an event of continental importance; for by that victory Spanish rule in America was terminated and a new collective consciousness was brought forth, a consciousness whose fresh idealism was founded on the principles of liberty and republican government.

Ayacucho is the bond of harmony, of creative impulse, and of cooperative action for the future, which unites the illustrious name of George Washington with the glorious name of Simon Bolívar, liberator and Father of Five Republics, and with those of that galaxy of heroes and leaders who, throughout the American Continent, also were liberators and fathers of free nations.

The straight paths of law, the principles of democratic equality and of respect for human personality, the concepts of the autonomy of nations and of international justice which Washington proclaimed, defended, and made victorious through his military genius and his consistent private and public life, were patterns zealously followed in Hispanic America; but, besides being the highest embodiment of a critical hour of history, Washington endowed these ideals in the young world of Christopher Columbus with a luminous power and dynamic force which not only permeated the spirit of Continental America, but also had a decisive reaction on the impetuous soul of the French people, with the result that the regime symbolized by the Bastille was broken forever.

Washington knew that liberty is a rational idea, a concept which penetrates the depths of human personality in despite of empirical or historical obstacles, but he also knew that if this is the philosophic and ideal aim of liberty, its pragmatic content, its practical strength really consists of a vast combination of guaranties, immunities, and privileges which should be achieved and sustained by a common desire for independence, as part of a great historical movement.

Washington knew that liberty is an immunity from or defense against all arbitrary subjection, a permanent protest against any limitation of intellectual activity, a rebellion against all irksome or oppressive authority.

More than that, it is the motive force of man, stimulating his intelligence and will power, spurring him on to conquer a sphere of action where the individual instead of being absorbed in the social consciousness, finds in society a means of development and of emancipation which permits him to exalt and idealize the portion of outer reality embraced in his own activities.

Washington anticipated the subtle distinction drawn by Benjamin Constant between ancient and modern conceptions of liberty. The great classical democracies comprehended political liberty in its widest sense, but they comprehended civil liberty very imperfectly, not understanding that democracy alone does not assure individual liberty.

CANADA

FOR more than a hundred years relations between the United States and Canada have been friendly and tranquil, and the 4,000-mile border, with not a single fortification, has set an example for peace-loving people the world over. But never has friendship—diplomatic and personal—between Canadians and Americans reached greater heights than during the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration.

United by a common bond of admiration for the Great American, native citizens of not fewer than twenty of Canada's major cities joined resident citizens and former citizens of the United States in honoring the memory of Washington on numerous occasions throughout the Bicentennial Year. From St. Johns on the Atlantic to Vancouver on the Pacific, and in the important cities of the great inland provinces of Ontario, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and Manitoba, the name of George Washington was remembered with respect and honored with public ceremonies.

In Montreal the American Legion, American Women's Club, United States consular officers, Canadian diplomats and government officials and the newspapers joined in celebrating the Two Hundredth Anniversary of George Washington's birth on February 22, on Armistice Day and Thanksgiving Day. United States Senator Warren R. Austin, of Vermont, guest speaker on the last occasion, declared:

We cannot over-glorify the relationship between the British and the Americans, which is the surest means of peace and prosperity for both nations in the future.

Toronto, at a George Washington banquet, toasted alike the King of England and the first and latest Presidents of the United States, while a leading journal of the city, THE MAIL AND EMPIRE, declared:

One might say that the qualities which enabled George Washington to conquer were the qualities which we like to think are peculiarly British, even if they were not actually invented by the British.

In Vancouver tree-planting ceremonies, fraternity meetings, Washington luncheons, Colonial balls and commemorative exercises under the auspices of the American Women's Club contributed to the success of the celebration. Dr. W. B. Burnett, representing the Kiwanis Club of Vancouver, said at one of the tree-planting ceremonies:

Americans delight to honor George Washington as "The Father of his Country." But no less do we revere him as Britain's illustrious son. Neither has England today any more sacred shrines than the three statues there erected to his memory.

The Bicentennial celebration in Kingston, Ontario, proved to be an episode of diplomatic good fortune. For years there had been in this military city a feeling of bitterness against the United States among many of the citizen-descendants of the Loyalists who were forced to abandon their homes in the United Colonies during and following the War for Independence.

Through the medium of "concerted action during the Washington Bicentennial," as reported by the American Consul there, this traditional prejudice was overcome. The united action of Honorable George G. Fuller, American Consul, the American Women's Club, the Kingston newspapers and the clergy brought about this happy result. Seven ministers of Kingston Churches called upon their congregations to regard Washington as a great hero whose ideals and character might be admired by Canadians in common with the rest of the world. The following excerpts sound the keynote of their addresses:

We, too, may celebrate the birthday of this great man who stood for the things which were the foundation of the British Empire: justice, liberty and a trust in God.—Rev. J. D. McKenzie Naughton.

Nations today need such leaders as Washington, leaders of high and holy ideals and ambitions. As long as the United States is blessed by God with such leadership, she will continue to make history, beneficial to not only her own people, but to general humanity the world over.—Rev. Dr. Thomas Green.

Like all truly great characters . . . George Washington belongs to all kindred spirits, regardless of their nationality, tongue or creed. Therefore we neighbors and friends of the citizens across an unfortified boundary line of four thousand miles claim Washington as ours in that realm of life which transcends all barriers made by human strife or natural conditions. He belongs to all whose faces are to the dawn of the new and better day of human freedom that is ever coming and yet is never here. He is one among that company of whom we think when we say: "Let us call to mind the deeds of famous men and of the fathers who begat us."—Rev. George A. Brown.

In Barrie and Peterborough, Ontario, the Kiwanis Clubs took the lead in sponsoring Washington programs, inviting members of the United States' diplomatic corps to address large assemblages on the theme of the Bicentennial.

At North Bay, Ontario, the American Consul utilized the radio station, freely offered for the purpose, to broadcast the message of the celebration. The residents of Sault Ste. Marie and St. Stephan, borderline cities, observed the anniversary at home and also joined in celebrations across the line in the United States.

The Memorial University of St. John's, Newfoundland, conducted a George Washington essay contest. The American Women's Club, of Winnipeg, Manitoba, entertained at a Colonial tea and reception, and the same organization in Regina, Saskatchewan, gave a George Washington banquet. Six bicentenary events were held during the Washington Year in Calgary, Alberta.

A President of the United States was honored for the first time in Fort William and Port Arthur, Ontario, when George Washington was the hero of several commemorations. Under the editorial title

"A Forgotten Grudge," THE DAILY TIMES JOURNAL, of Fort William, said:

The lapse of over a century and a half has healed any sores that were left by the revolt of the American colonies and the Declaration of Independence, which was the foundation of the present United States of America. Present-day Americans bear no more grudge against George III, of England, than Englishmen bear against George Washington.

TRIBUTES IN MONTREAL

American legionnaires, club women, and diplomats gave the message of the George Washington Bicentennial to Montreal, Canada, and the famous old French-Canadian city received it with a degree of interest that was reflected in the Montreal press, the expressions of prominent civic leaders and through the public in general.

THE MONTREAL GAZETTE, a leading newspaper of the city, published editorials concerning the Bicentennial both on February 21 and 22, 1932. In that of the 21st, attention was called to the fact that the REVIEW OF REVIEWS for February, 1932, in discussing the celebration, said that "the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission has rendered a service in reprinting the speech made by Daniel Webster, then Senator from Massachusetts, at a dinner in Washington on February 22, 1832, in commemoration of the Washington Centennial. Webster, in his characteristic flowery style, then referred to the 'voluntary outpouring of public feeling, made today, from the north to the south, and from the east to the west,' predicting that it would be so 'in all time to come, so long as public virtue is itself an object of regard.' And, again, 'a hundred years hence, other disciples of Washington will celebrate his birth, with no less sincere admiration than we now commemorate it.' That hundred years hence has come and the Webster prophecy is due to be fulfilled."

The GAZETTE editorial of the 22nd is one of those frank and sincere newspaper estimates that arises out of such occasions as the Bicentennial to indicate the regard in the hearts of the celebrants for the subject of their tribute. This editorial reads:

THE WASHINGTON BICENTENARY

Emerson tells us that it takes two hundred years to understand a great man. That period has passed since George Washington was born in Westmoreland County, Virginia. The celebration of his anniversary this year is likely to call forth fresh reviews of the career, work and character of the man whose name has become an ode in American history, who for forty-five years served his country in public capacity, and who, as Commander-in-Chief of the American forces, and, afterwards, first President of the United States, is hailed, "First in war, first in peace and first in the hearts of his countrymen." Whatever estimate may be made of George Washington, his name will ever be associated with the struggle which brought about American Independence, and with the framing of the Constitution which he himself held to be the "best that could be obtained" at that epoch. Of the early life of George Washington very little is known. He belonged to the Virginian squirearchy and came of good British stock. He had such scant schooling as the colonial system of that period offered. At 16 he was taken from school. For three years he did duty as surveyor in service of Lord Fairfax. His mother dissuaded him from accepting a commission in the navy. At 20, when the Indians and French were becoming troublesome neighbors to British colonists, George Washington was appointed major of the Virginian troops, and three years afterwards became commander of these forces. In this campaign, which lasted for three years, Washington was successful and learned the art of military strategy which served him in good stead in later years. Upon the conclusion of the Virginia war, he married and retired to Mount Vernon, the next twenty years being occupied in managing his own estate.

This spell of quietude, during which Washington had acted as a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses, was broken by the obnoxious Stamp Act. The colonists resisted this tax. The question of "no taxation without representation" became the slogan of the insurgents. The right of the British Government to impose taxes upon the colonists for support of the British troops overseas was challenged. The Bostonians flung the tea chests into the harbor. The Philadelphians met and passed resolutions against importing British goods. Washington endorsed the cause of the colonists. In 1774 he was one of the seven delegates appointed by the Virginia convention to the Continental Congress. Armed resistance to the British taxation levy ensued, with Washington as Commander-in-Chief of the American forces. At the close of the war, Washington held a position in the American political system which no other man could equal. The Constitution, representing thirteen states, was drawn up by the convention at Philadelphia in 1787, and two years afterwards George Washington was unanimously elected the first President of the United States. He was re-elected for another term four years later and showed great tact and skill in maintaining the balance between the Federal and Democratic parties, then at odds with each other and led respectively by Hamilton and Jefferson, though he did not escape in these last days of his administration the bitterest attacks of political opponents and was harassed out of all patience by the fractiousness of the two leaders of his Cabinet who behaved, to borrow Washington's own phrase, "like two game-cocks in a pit."

Greatness is a somewhat ambiguous term. It is not easy at first sight to see how it can be applied to George Washington. He was no orator. He never made stirring speeches. He was singularly reticent. He has left no salient epigram which grips the human imagination. He would never "shine like a planet if left in a desolate room." There is no evidence of brilliant strokes he ever made or attempted. It has been said that the qualifications of great personages stand either in the ideas they embody or the largeness of their reception as leaders and law-givers in the world. So judge, there are elements that will ever stand out to the credit of this American soldier and statesman. He knew the value of discipline. He never indulged in boasting. He possessed good solid judgment. He brought the virtues of prudence, patience, fortitude and invincible resolution to bear upon whatever tasks he undertook.

If it be the mark of a great man that he works more than he talks and speaks only when he has really something to say worth mention, then Washington is entitled to all merit in this respect. He always expressed a wholesome doubt as to his abilities for the great tasks assigned him; yet once they were accepted, no opposition or difficulties could hinder him doing what he considered his plain duty in their behalf. His career and character amply fulfill Goethe's verdict of a great man, namely, that he works within his conscious limits and meddles not with things beyond his grasp. And, as such, the name of George Washington will always stand forth a notable example of a man who put moderate talents to the greatest activity and the noblest use. This is his lasting monument.

AMERICAN WOMEN'S CLUB

To the American Women's Club in Montreal was given the honor of inaugurating the Bicentennial in that city. The President of the Club, Mrs. Sally Tatley, aptly described the first George Washington event held under the sponsorship of the club in a letter to the American Consul General in Montreal, Hon. Wesley Frost, which letter stated in part:

I am glad to be able to tell you that our American Women's Club did keep in mind the request from Washington, D. C., that we celebrate in some way the Bicentennial of Washington's birth. On February 22nd in accordance with our custom we entertained the Presidents of various women's organizations at a luncheon party. On this occasion our music was patriotic and the speaker of the day took for her subject: "The Lives of George Washington," not an easy subject to speak on before a Canadian audience, but the whole thing was so delightfully and tactfully handled that our Canadian guests declared afterwards that they had been quite won over to Washington's point of view.

To this event Mrs. David Whittall, President of the American Women's Club in Montreal at the time welcomed the 300 and more members and guests who sat at tables decorated with spring flowers and bearing cardboard hatchets recalling the cherry tree legend.

Mrs. A. F. Byers, President of the University Women's Club of Montreal, expressed the appreciation of the guests and declared that the American Women's Club by conducting such activities as a George Washington luncheon in Montreal set a splendid example in the promotion of international brotherhood.

"The Lives of George Washington"—the first as portrayed by Parson Weems who made of Washington a Puritan and a prig; the second picturing him as a soldier and statesman; and a third life suggested by Rupert Hughes, "297 disparaging remarks" concerning Washington—were outlined by Mrs. A. R. McBain.

The benefit of these many lives, so far as the people are concerned, Mrs. McBain said, is that they have restored Washington to his rightful place in history as a typical gentleman of Virginia—no demigod, but a human being, possessing, however, many superhuman qualities.

The eventful career of Washington was sketched in bold strokes and the gathering troubles between the Colonies and England were described—how the Colonists liked to give freely but not to be taxed. The Revolutionary War was not based on the idea of separation, said Mrs. McBain.

Washington was reluctant to take command of the forces as letters showed that agreed with his speech to Congress when he said "I do not think myself capable." But his choice as leader of the Colonial forces was a wise one as events later proved. An English military critic says that all he had was his stainless character; he was well known to be above reproach and of high personal courage.

The manifold difficulties encountered by the army were related by Mrs. McBain and Washington's reactions to them were vividly recounted. His refusal to preside at the constitutional convention and his later acceptance when prevailed upon were cited. When he was elected President he moved from the wide acres of Mt. Vernon to a house on Cherry Street, New York. He had an able cabinet, but not a tractable one. With Jefferson on one side of the issue and Hamilton on the other, the grindstones of State and Federal rights ground Washington between them. Added to this, he had to bear the attacks of a vituperative press, to jibes of which he never became hardened but always resented them.

His second inaugural presented Washington as an impressive figure, the speaker continued. He was dressed now not in sober "Hartford cloth" but in black and velvet, with silver lace ruffles and diamond shoe buckles.

Many quotations from letters written by Washington were cited. His last years were declared happy ones, for Mount Vernon was "filled with" young people, whom he loved. Washington was said to be a devoted son and brother and a good uncle and stepfather. After his own kin and General Nathanael Greene, the friend he loved best was Lafayette.

What was there in the life of Washington to suggest that international goodwill was possible? the speaker queried in conclusion. Washington was completely tolerant, was the answer, and international goodwill is founded on tolerance.

The second Bicentennial event in Montreal of more than ordinary consequence was celebrated by the American Legion, Canadian Post No. 1, on Armistice Day. The following descriptive summary of the celebration is taken from THE MONTREAL GAZETTE of November 12, 1932:

VALLEY FORGE IS REPRODUCED HERE

American Legion Post Celebrates Washington Bicentennial and Armistice Day.

The austere Salle Doree of the Mount Royal Hotel suffered a change last night; straw-littered, and with rude planks and bales strewn around it took on the appearance of stables or a hastily arranged military base. And so it was, for the members of the American Legion Post No. 1 were celebrating the Washington Bicentennial and Armistice Day, and Washington's general headquarters at Valley Forge was depicted.

We must stand abashed before the magnitude of the task of paying adequate tribute to Washington, said the Hon. Wesley Frost, Consul-General of the United States in Montreal, addressing the legionnaires. Recent biography had fallen into the habit, in an iconoclastic age, of stripping the tin halo from national figures, but the time had come for a proper appraisal of Washington. When the tinsel and veneer were torn away from that figure at least, the interior was seen to be impenetrable granite. The speaker traced his career briefly from his first association with Lord Fairfax in Virginia to Lexington.

"He was the century's greatest character, and he expired with the century," Mr. Frost said. "Military genius of other leaders of the time paled into insignificance when compared with his. The most remarkable feature of his character was his steadfastness, solidity, and serenity of outlook, yet he was par excellence a doer and man of action. His chief title to immortal fame was perhaps his personality, which charmed all with whom he came in contact."

The Rev. David A. MacLennan, pastor of Emmanuel Church, led the gathering in prayer and read the Hoover Armistice Day proclamation. Over 100 men attended from New York, Vermont, and Quebec. Major Harry Rethoret, post commander, presided. Entertainment was provided under the leadership of Rube Waddell, master of ceremonies.

The culminating event of the Bicentennial in Montreal, an occasion that Consul General Frost described as "strikingly successful in every way and extensively reported by the newspapers of Montreal" was a George Washington-Thanksgiving Day banquet of the American Women's Club held on November 24, 1932, in the Rose Room of the Windsor Hotel.

The GAZETTE for November 25, 1932, reporting the affair, declared that "friendship between the people of America and Britain was celebrated" at the banquet.

Consul-General Frost sounded the Bicentennial keynote of the day when he read President Herbert Hoover's Thanksgiving Day proclamation in which was embodied the first such proclamation made by President George Washington at New York on October 3, 1789, appointing November 26 of that year as Thanksgiving Day.

The honor guest and principal speaker of the evening was Hon. Warren R. Austin, United States Senator from Vermont, whose address was reported by the GAZETTE of November 25, 1932, as follows:

"One of the great questions confronting us today is whether we who enjoy self-governing principles are capable of self-government and can go through without tagging off on to some new idea which is inconsistent with the principle of free government," declared Senator Austin in the course of his address.

The great task of Washington had been to introduce the United States of America to the world, and he did this, dealing with royalties and ruling classes, without aggressiveness and with dignity, he said. Washington established a foreign policy which all Presidents of the United States have followed to the present, and the speaker added that he hoped the new President of the United States would continue that policy.

"I would say that this was independence, though not isolation. To Washington we owe the neutrality of the United States which has enabled it to go into action with an altruistic spirit and not enter into any long term treaty. This helped us to establish the 'open door' policy in the East, to intervene to help Cuba establish her independence, and to enter the Great War. It gave us opportunities not of aggression but of doing service in the name of humanity."

Senator Austin recalled two summers spent at Maryville and L'Assomption in studying French, where his father had learned French thirty years before, and said he had been in business for many years with a firm established in Montreal half a century ago.

The Thanksgiving celebration brought to mind, said Senator Austin, the outstanding fact of the century of peace, goodwill and neighborliness of the people of the North American continent, particularly the Canadians and Americans.

Special reference was made by the speaker to the George Washington Bicentennial celebration and to the establishment of the principle of self-government. This had resulted not only in liberty for the United States of America, but for the world, for it spread to other nations as well.

BEST AUGURY FOR FUTURE

There could be no more emphatic proof to the world that international peace depends on the conscience of nations than the 3,000-mile boundary line between Canada and the United States which has not a single fortification, said Senator Austin.

"I know there is no more deep seated and well-settled thing among nations than the real friendship which exists between all British and all Americans," he continued. This had been brought out most prominently by the American fleet coming to the aid of the British at the time of the opium war in China, he said, and the intervention of the British to shield Dewey's fleet in Manila Bay.

"We cannot over-glorify that relationship between the British and the Americans, which is the surest means of peace and prosperity for both nations in the future."

The "Green Mountain State" had a revolution years before the revolt of the Thirteen Colonies, Senator Austin remarked, referring to the dispute between Vermont and New York; had a Declaration of Independence of its own and formed a republic which lasted from 1776 to 1791, when the state was admitted to the Union. Its written constitution, adopted in 1777, had been the model for all others since that time. It foresaw the conditions now being experienced, the speaker declared, in that it laid down as fundamental principles, industry, temperance and frugality.

"If we as a nation had lived up to that doctrine, do you think we would be suffering this depression today?" he queried.

"For the future, I ask you whether that document is not a fundamental one to act upon to cure our ills rather than essay new schemes which have a tendency to mediocrity, to cutting down statesmanship, to glorifying the mediocre man who will say 'I am an ordinary fellow like you,' rather than one who aspires and attains to leadership?"

Senator Austin spoke of the invasion of Canada by the American forces and their capture of St. Johns and Montreal. If a reversal had not occurred, the Declaration of Independence, signed August 2, 1776, and not July 4, as commonly believed, would have comprehended all this part of North America.

"I am one of those who think that it is better for the world, and for North America that we have this virile, this promising nation here in the Dominion of Canada than that we should have had a Declaration of Independence which extended over all of the North American continent," he declared, amid applause.

Turning again to George Washington, Senator Austin estimated his chief qualities as his equanimity and judicial poise as president of the convention which created the Constitution of the United States of America, and his genius for leadership which held together the army. The outstanding point of his career was his rejection of the offer of kingship.

AMERICAN WOMEN'S CLUB, TORONTO

"To George Washington, man of exceeding honor, truth, and courage"—Four hundred United States citizens in Toronto, Canada, and their Dominion guests united in drinking this toast proposed on the Bicentennial of the birth of the Great American by Dr. George W. Locke, chief librarian of Toronto public libraries at "The American Women's Club of Toronto Colonial Dinner and Ball and Celebration of the two hundredth birthday of George Washington." As recorded in THE GLOBE, Toronto, February 23, 1932, "all eyes were turned to the framed photograph of the British-American hero as the toast was drunk and the stirring strains of the American National Anthem rang through the great concert hall of the Royal York Hotel—for the brief hour a replica of a Colonial ballroom."

The banquet program was divided into two parts, the first consisting of the invocation by Rev. Father McGarity, M.C., Chaplain of the Newman Club; toasts to the King and the President of the United States by Hon. Damon C. Woods, United States Consul, and Rev. E. Crossley-Hunter of the United Church, respectively; the introduction of the guest speaker, Dr. Locke, by Hon. Emil Sauer, Consul-General of the United States; and the cutting of the birthday cake.

"The Toast to the King," proposed in the following words by Consul Damon C. Woods, elicited special comment among the guests:

MADAM PRESIDENT, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:

In a land whose citizens are proud to be known as British subjects, among a people whose love of their Dominion is intensified by loyalty to the Empire, amid this scene of international amity and neighborly friendship, so typical of the cordial relations that have existed for over a century between Canada and the United States, and in recognition of our common heritage of time-tested institutions, evolved through the centuries by the experience and constructive labor of the Anglo-Saxon race—it is a pleasure and a privilege to propose the health of him who so truly represents the power, dignity, spirit of justice, and the noblest traditions of the British people—to his Majesty, King George V.

The second part of the program was devoted to Colonial dances and music. The minuet as performed before General George Washington and Mrs. Washington was gracefully executed and two of Washington's favorite songs, "The Toast" and "Beneath a Weeping Willow's Shade," by Francis Hopkinson, were rendered as vocal numbers; Colonial period music on the harpsichord and a recited "Ode to the Declaration of Independence" completed the entertainment.

THE GLOBE spoke of the affair as "an impressive and picturesque gathering, at which time flew backward over a period of 200 years and Colonial ladies moved gracefully to their places at the head table, slightly self-conscious in their added poise and dignity, in white silk wigs, pannier gowns, and gay petticoats. . . . The tables were artistic with red, white and blue carnations and the head table was centered with a huge birthday cake which was a miniature replica of Mount Vernon."

Mrs. Frank C. Fletcher, President of the American Women's Club, presided and made a pretty picture in her Colonial frock of black and gold, with a full skirt fashioned of gold cloth and a black basque waist richly embroidered with gold lace, with ruffles edging the square neckline and short sleeves and flowers tucked into the lace.

Introducing the guest speaker, Consul General Sauer said:

Today, the two-hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, there has been inaugurated a world-wide celebration of that event, extending until the American Thanksgiving next November. This celebration is being carried out in response to a resolution passed by the United States Congress last year, followed by a Proclamation by the President on the second of this month, which reads in part as follows:

The happy opportunity has come to our generation to demonstrate our gratitude and our obligation to George Washington by fitting celebration on the 200th anniversary of his birth.

To contemplate his unselfish devotion to duty, his courage, his patience, his genius, his statesmanship, and his accomplishments for his country and the world refreshes the spirit, the wisdom, and the patriotism of our people.

Therefore, I, Herbert Hoover, President of the United States of America, acting in accord with the purposes of the Congress, do invite all our people to organize themselves through every community and every association to do honor to the memory of Washington during the period from February 22 to Thanksgiving Day.

Accordingly, celebrations sponsored by the Government of the United States are being carried out on an unequalled scale. There are celebrations scheduled to take place not only in every city, town, and village in the United States, but throughout the world wherever there are Americans who can join together for the purpose. Moreover, many foreign countries have signified through their representatives in Washington their intention to participate in this celebration.

We, I venture to state, can celebrate the event here in Canada, a Dominion of the British Empire, in the spirit suggested in the President's speech at the celebration at Yorktown last October of the 150th anniversary of the decisive battle of the American Revolutionary War, when he said in reference to the American Revolutionary War and the Battle of Yorktown that: "The long span of history will interpret the American War for Independence and this battle more in the light of a struggle amongst English-speaking people for the establishment in Government of an extension of a common philosophy of human rights begun at Runnymede," when the Magna Charta was signed.

The true spirit upon which the relations between the United States and the British Empire are based, I believe, was exemplified at the Yorktown celebration last October when a tablet was dedicated in honor of Lord Cornwallis, the adversary of Washington in that battle, and was accepted by the present Lord Cornwallis, who was there in person for the occasion.

The George Washington Bicentennial Celebration over the entire world is one that has probably no equal in magnitude and duration to any of its kind in all history. The purpose, as the President expressed it in the proclamation I just referred to, is to demonstrate our obligations to George Washington and to contemplate his unselfish devotion to duty, his courage, his patience, his genius, his statesmanship, and his accomplishments for his country and the world. The purpose of this celebration, in the words of the Joint Resolution of Congress to which I have just referred, is: "That future generations of American citizens may live according to the example and precepts of his exalted life and character and thus perpetuate the American Republic."

The name of Washington is associated in the minds of many people solely with the American Revolution and perhaps with the Presidential office of the United States as its first incumbent, but less is known and said about his accomplishments in bringing about the Union of the States on a foundation which made possible its development into its present form, and for his accomplishments in the interests of representative government. From the time of the Declaration of Independence until the Constitution was put into effect thirteen years later, Washington felt keenly the need of a strong central government. He felt this keenly while he was prosecuting the war because there was lacking a central organization capable of drawing to the fullest extent upon the resources of the country for the purposes of carrying on the war, but he felt it no less keenly after the advent of peace when he stated publicly time and time again that without a strong central government under which the several states could organize, consolidate and expand their resources, the sacrifices made during the Revolution would all prove in vain. Historians are agreed that without Washington's influence and active efforts the Constitution, under which our Government has been operating since 1789, would never have been drafted, or when drafted, would not have been ratified by the several states if it had not been for his influence and efforts. Once it was ratified and put in operation, Washington yielded to the popular and unanimous demand of the electoral college to be the first President, although he was disinclined to public life. He gave up his much cherished private life in order to start a new government in operation, without precedent in any line of its activities, without organization and under many difficulties which only a man of Washington's capacity could solve.

The most striking feature, to my mind, in Washington's relations with the loose Confederation of the several states was his patient endeavor to impress upon the people the utter failure of that government, the dire need of a strong central government, and his faith in the ability and willingness of the people to bring about needed reform through their united voluntary efforts rather than through a move on his part to bring about the desired results through a dictatorship. The reason why Washington chose the course he did, instead of accepting dictatorship or a crown, can only be explained in the light of his confidence in the practicability and possibility of establishing a representative government as the one best suited for the American people. It might be of interest here to read just a sentence from Napoleon's eulogy of Washington when the news of his death reached Europe, only a year after war was threatened between the United States and France and Washington had again been called to head the American Army as Commander-in-Chief in preparation for a war against France. Napoleon said in part: "His work is scarcely finished when it at once attracts the veneration which we freely accord to those achievements only that are consecrated by time."

When we follow the course pursued by Washington in the interest of real Union of the States the latter years of the Revolutionary War and the years succeeding the Revolution until the government of the United States under our present Constitution was finally established, we must agree with the historian, James Truslow Adams, who thus characterized Washington: "When we think of Washington, it is not as a military leader, nor as an executive or diplomat. We think of the man who by sheer force of character held a divided and disorganized country together until victory was achieved, and, who, after peace was won, still held his disunited countrymen by their love and respect and admiration for himself until a nation was welded into enduring strength and unity."

It is my pleasure and privilege, after this brief explanation of the purpose and scope of the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration, to present to you the speaker of the evening. Dr. Locke certainly needs no introduction to any Toronto audience. As Chief Librarian of Toronto and in his active work in educational affairs in this city, he is no doubt known to all of you. As a Canadian he was engaged for many years in higher educational work in several universities in the United States, and I understand our people would be only too glad to have him back. He is therefore particularly well-fitted to act as interpreter in the interests of cordial and neighborly understanding between the people of Canada and the United States. As he commands one hundred thousand or more books, he is no doubt better informed on everything in which he takes an interest than anybody else can be, and I feel that there is a real treat in store for us in hearing Dr. Locke address us on the life of the one whom Americans delight to call the Father of their country. Dr. Locke:

A summary of the guest speaker's address from THE GLOBE, THE EVENING TELEGRAM, THE TORONTO DAILY STAR, and THE MAIL AND EMPIRE, Toronto newspapers, may be made as follows:

Dr. Locke linked the past with the present in discussing the life of George Washington. He deftly reviewed his early years touching on his boyhood and his home life but dwelt chiefly on the years immediately before and during the War for Independence.

"Let me give you a historical picture so that you will get the setting," said Dr. Locke. "There were only sixteen years between the taking of Quebec and the beginning of the Revolution. These were dull days in America—a season of depression such as we are now passing through, and the same remedies were suggested. 'Buy American Goods' was the motto, and Virginia had a Non-Importation Association to keep British goods out, just as people in the Province of New Brunswick last month suggested that English goods be not purchased until the English lifted the tax on potatoes. Among the most drastic, and, it would seem, far-fetched remedies was the proposed formation of a State Church, which presumably would have had more influence with Heaven. We haven't come to that in these latter days," commented the speaker.

On the other hand, the English Government adopted what is even now suggested, intra-Empire trade, and tried to make the New England colonists drink the surplus East India tea. "No doubt it was good tea," Dr. Locke remarked with a smile, "but the colonists did not like the method in which it was served."

"It was a wonderful stroke of luck for the Colonists that they chose George Washington for a leader," said Dr. Locke. "He really overtopped all others in his sense of national entity and national duty. The rest talked of liberty and voiced spirited indignation of tyrants, but their interests were almost altogether individual, municipal or provincial."

Washington lived to prove the merits of his philosophy.

Following the speeches and musical program, the guests retired to the concert hall where they danced and made merry after the fashion of the days of Washington until a late hour.

The Toronto Post of the American Legion and the United States Consul General's office cooperated with the American Women's Club in planning and staging the event.

In the picturesque setting of the Rose Garden at the Royal Canadian Yacht Club, Toronto, under the brilliance of July's golden sunlight, the American Consul General and Mrs. Emil Sauer entertained at an Independence Day-Bicentennial reception. The Premier of Ontario and Mrs. George S. Henry, the Mayor of Toronto and Mrs. Stewart, Sir John and Lady Aird, Col. and Mrs. J. B. McLean, Sir William and Lady Hearst, and more than 150 other governmental and social notables attended the Bicentennial garden party and extended their felicitations to the American Consul General regarding the significance of the day.

As noted in MAYFAIR, a leading Canadian fashion magazine, "the decorations were appropriately carried out in red, white, and blue. The Union Jack and the Stars and Stripes hung side by side. The table was covered with white damask centered with candelabra holding blue candles and the flowers used were red roses. A large George Washington Bicentenary cake cleverly iced to simulate the Stars and Stripes formed the centerpiece of the table."

THE EVENING TELEGRAM and THE TORONTO DAILY STAR gave considerable space to the event and emphasized its Bicentennial character.

On the evening of Thanksgiving Day, 1932, the American Women's Club of Toronto again took the initiative in Toronto's observance of the Washington year and staged a Bicentennial-Thanksgiving banquet and dance at the Royal York Hotel. More than 250 members and guests participated.

The President of the Club, Mrs. L. E. Bickford, called the attention of the guests to the fact that the official termination of the Bicentennial celebration occurred on that day and read to the guests the first Thanksgiving Proclamation issued by George Washington in 1789. She said it had been the great pleasure of the American Women's Club in Toronto to take part in the Bicentennial celebration and she hoped that the activity of the Club had been a means of interpreting the life of the First President of the United States for Americans and Canadians alike in Toronto and had contributed to international good will.

The principal feature of the dinner was an address on international developments during the past year by the Hon. Newton W. Rowell, President of the Canadian Bar Association. Mr. Rowell made fitting reference to the significance of the Bicentennial occasion and Canadian participation therein before delivering his address.

Estimates of the character of George Washington have flowed from the pens of writers of all nations. Here follows an editorial-page feature of February 23, 1932, "George Washington, Man Beneath the Mask," by Mr. J. V. McAree, editorial columnist for THE MAIL AND EMPIRE, Toronto, who claims with characteristic British aplomb that: "One might say that the qualities which enabled George Washington to conquer were the qualities which we like to think are peculiarly British, even if they were not actually invented by the British."

And that: "He (Washington) lived long enough to do the work for which he was required, and probably no man of any age could have done it better. Mr. McAree's article follows:

GEORGE WASHINGTON MAN BENEATH THE MASK

By J. V. McAREE

Maybe this article should have appeared yesterday since it was then that the 200th anniversary of George Washington's birth was celebrated, though as a matter of fact, when he was born, the date was February 11, 1732, the difference having been caused by a change in the calendar when the immortal one was 20 years old. There are many reasons why Washington's name should be held in honor by subjects of the British Crown, for he altered the destiny of the British Empire, and what the revolting American colonies did had a great effect on what happened subsequently in Canada. Apart from that Washington was a salty character and we think that the modern muckrakers, so called, have done him a service rather than an injury by presenting him as Cromwell insisted upon being painted, "warts and all." As W. E. Woodward, author of the first debunked life of the first president, says in THE NATION, "The more I found out about Washington the more I liked him. I had to unlearn at first all the silly fables that had been taught me at school and which have existed a century or more in our folk-lore. But as these childish myths were stripped off I saw that a great personality was beneath them. I began to admire him ardently. He had honor, truth, honesty and courage."

He was not, in view of the light of modern criticism, a great general. Neither was he a great statesman, but he was a great man. He did things which were strategically unsound and he never won a great battle. But he had the will to hold the army together. "He won the war through his defeats," says Woodward. "The British found out that you cannot keep on beating a man forever unless you kill him. If you can't kill him after awhile you have to surrender to him. The British, sick and tired, finally surrendered to Washington." One might say that the qualities which enabled George Washington to conquer were the qualities which we like to think are peculiarly British, even if they were not actually invented by the British. It is an oddity that there have survived no intellectual and political traditions that have earned the name Washingtonian. We hear of Jeffersonian and Hamiltonian, and Lincolnian, and Rooseveltian and even Wilsonian traditions, but Washington seems never to have evolved any particular theories of government. He simply did the job that lay nearest his hand and perhaps thought no more about it.

Another curious thing is that despite the innumerable records that have been searched for news of him, despite profound and scholarly research, no record has been found of his conversations. Of the substance of what he said on many occasions there is no lack. People would spend evenings in his company and report that he had told some anecdotes and talked about planting fruit, that he drank Madeira wine and cracked nuts between his fingers. But nobody has the right to put quotation marks about anything he ever said in ordinary conversation. There are his formal speeches, his army orders, his various reports, his diaries, but of the man's own voice or accent we get not a trace. "Father, I cannot tell a lie; I did it with my little hatchet," is, of course, as purely apocryphal as it would be to describe Washington dying on the Plains of Abraham murmuring "Thank God! I die happy." The inference is that he was not a brilliant conversationalist, nor a fount of homely wisdom, nor a man with much sense of humor.

Yet for many years he was the observed of all observers. He was no hermit. He loved company, and he and his wife gave noble entertainments, as was fitting, for he was the richest American of his day and, with the exception of Herbert Hoover, perhaps the richest man ever to become president of the United States. William Sullivan used to attend the presidential receptions and noted that his excellency was usually surrounded by young and beautiful women, a fact which Mr. Woodward finds not surprising, since he observes, "For some reason elderly distinguished men possess an extraordinary fascination for young girls," and for some other reason, we have no doubt, young girls possess an extraordinary fascination for elderly distinguished men. But when thus surrounded Washington's countenance never softened nor changed its habitual gravity. In other words, if the beautiful young women were kidding anybody it was the young and beautiful women.

His portraits show Washington to have been melancholy, though one cannot escape the look of benignity that shows on his countenance, particularly in the classic portrait by Gilbert Stuart. But this is not the best likeness, we are told. In 1785 the French sculptor Houdon made a life mask and, incidentally, terrified Mrs. Washington, who entered the room to find her husband flat on his back, his face covered with a plaster, and a mysterious-looking foreigner bending over him. Washington was undoubtedly a man of great physical strength, but, despite his outdoor manner of living and his love of the country, he was not constitutionally robust. There was a congenital strain of weakness. It showed in his voice, which was muffled, and he had to exert himself to be heard. He was always falling ill with bowel complaint, colds, liver trouble, for which he dosed himself heartily with the drastic remedies of the day. But he lived long enough to do the work for which he was required, and probably no man of any age could have done it better.

The Kiwanis Club of Barrie, Ontario, a thriving city of 6,000 inhabitants on the shore of Lake Simcoe, "devoted its luncheon meeting on April 29, 1932, to the observance of Canadian-American Friendship," and special emphasis was placed on the significance of the Bicentennial Celebration in the development of the theme of the day, according to a letter received by the Bicentennial Commission from Hon. Damon C. Woods, American Consul, who was the guest speaker of the occasion.

Mr. Woods chose for his subject: "George Washington, The Man of Peace," and, being introduced by the ex-Governor of the District, spoke in part as follows:

In choosing a subject, it seemed fitting to revert to the life of George Washington, the 200th anniversary of whose birth is being celebrated this year in the United States and in many other lands. No man lives to himself alone and no great man lives to his country alone. The personality, example and influence of Washington have extended far beyond the confines of the United States, and it is entirely appropriate that recognition of his superior qualities and achievements should form a theme of study and praise in other lands than his own.

You have all, no doubt, read and listened to a great deal about Washington as a boy, as an Indian fighter, as a planter, as a military leader, and as the first President of the United States. I would like to emphasize one phase of his character which, as evinced in his private and public actions, has had a noble and enduring influence upon the relations of his country with the rest of the world. I refer to his ardent attachment to peace, not only as the basis of goodwill and friendly understanding among peoples, but as the primary requisite for the normal development of stable public institutions, and the promotion of industry and commerce.

Let me begin with a brief sketch of certain conditions and events during the formative years of Washington's career. Chief Justice John Marshall in his "Life of Washington" writes: "At no period of time was the attachment of the colonists to the mother country more strong, or more general, than in 1763, when the definitive articles of the treaty which restored peace to Great Britain, France, and Spain, were signed."

At no previous period of history, it might be added, did British sovereignty cover so wide an area of the earth's surface or exercise so extensive a sway, as at that time. Robert Clive had won the battle of Plassey in India, which brought to England territory of untold wealth, while James Wolfe, on the Plains of Abraham, had added not only Quebec but all of Canada to the British Crown. By the Treaty of Paris, which ended the Seven Years' War, England was left the strongest power in both hemispheres. This expansion and this supremacy were attained largely as a result of the sagacious direction and vigorous policies of England's Great Commoner, William Pitt, afterwards the Earl of Chatham.

In America a young Major of Virginia troops had done all he could to establish British rule and promote security in the frontier region of Ohio. After serving in several arduous campaigns, Major Washington had marched on Fort Duquesne, found it abandoned by the enemy, taken possession, and renamed it Fort Pitt, in recognition of the great statesman who had brought about the revival of British prestige. He had then returned home, laid aside his sword and resumed the management of his plantation. In 1763, with the official return of peace, Washington thought he was through with military duties forever. He had seen much of the horrors of war and had been sobered by what he saw into a profound devotion to the cause of peace. In this he was no doubt confirmed by his sense of responsibility as owner and manager of one of the largest estates in Virginia, made up of his own inheritance and the extensive properties brought by his wife. He had entered upon the life which always appealed to him as the most attractive, that of a planter-farmer and country gentleman. He was not allowed, however, to remain long in private life, as his fellow citizens soon elected him to the House of Burgesses of the Colony. Entering it at the age of twenty-seven, he was welcomed by the speaker in Virginia's name and praised for his high achievements. The young member, who had faced the fire of the French and Indians without flinching, was so embarrassed that he was unable to reply.

"Sit down, Mr. Washington," said the Speaker, "your modesty is equal to your valor, and that surpasses the power of any language I possess." In the assembly Washington acquired the reputation of being the silent member. He never attempted the arts of the debater, but he studied all aspects of a question and often said the final word that sealed a discussion.

Ten years passed and the peaceful days of 1763 gave way to a seething tide of discontent. The colonists were contending that in proclaiming "No taxation without representation" they were appealing to a principle of Anglo-Saxon liberty inherent in their race. In the House of Commons their cause received support from the three great masters of British eloquence—Burke, Pitt and Fox. Meanwhile, the Virginia Planter pursued his engrossing private affairs, watched the course of events, and attended sessions of the House of Burgesses, where he said little but thought much. He did not break into invective or fervid patriotic appeals. He preserved his peace of mind and strove to aid in bringing about a peaceable settlement of the differences with the mother country.

In 1774 Washington was a member of the first Continental Congress, which met in Philadelphia. During this session there were "freshets of Oratory," according to one historian, but Washington remained calm and self-controlled. Silas Deane wrote that "he speaks very modestly and in cool but determined style and accent." Patrick Henry, after the session, was asked "Who is the greatest man in Congress?" He replied, "If you speak of eloquence, Mr. Rutledge of South Carolina is by far the greatest orator; but if you speak of solid information and sound judgment, Colonel Washington is unquestionably the greatest man on that floor."

Passing over the intervening nine years, we find Washington in 1783 again at his country home and convinced that now indeed he could spend the rest of his days as a gentleman-farmer. From the quietude of Mount Vernon he wrote to Lafayette: "Envious of none, I am determined to be pleased with all; and this, my dear friend, being the order of my march, I will move gently down the stream of life, until I sleep with my fathers."

But again he was to be called from his tranquil rural pursuits to the service of his country. He presided over the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States and was the unanimous choice of the first electoral college to be President of the new Republic. Four years later a second unanimous vote confirmed the earlier choice and demonstrated the confidence the people had in his leadership.

Washington's first term as President was devoted to consolidating the forces of internal order and starting the Republic on its course as an independent nation. His second term was preoccupied from the beginning with the problem of preserving peace with foreign nations amid times as difficult as ever attended so important a task.

The French Revolution was culminating in the Reign of Terror. Great Britain and France were in conflict. Powerful influences were at work seeking to drag the newly founded Republic into the struggle on the side of France. Against these forces Washington set his face and on April 22, 1793, he issued his Proclamation of Neutrality. From the beginning of his administration he had held firmly to the idea that if the country could live for twenty years without a conflict with another nation its future would be safe. Two decades of peace were indispensable for that unification and growth which would enable the Republic to stand alone. To that end he opposed the action of the House of Representatives in seeking to suspend commerce with England and instead sent John Jay to London with instructions to negotiate a treaty of peace and commercial intercourse. Jay returned with the treaty in 1794. It did not settle all points at issue but it provided for an abandonment of the western forts, a limited trade with the British West Indies, and a commission to settle the disputed northeastern boundary. This commission was the first of the many international commissions which have since adjusted questions of right and interest between Canada and the United States. In referring to Washington's advocacy of the Jay treaty, the American historian, Professor Albert Bushnell Hart, says: "Washington diagnosed clearly from the beginning that the trade and goodwill of England were essential to the prosperity of his country."

This seems to us today to have been obviously the sound policy, but it was not so obvious to many in Congress and in the different States when the terms of the Jay treaty were published by the Philadelphia AURORA. There were outbursts of indignation that Jay had not brought back more from London, and demands were numerous that the treaty be rejected as wholly inadequate. The Senate, in secret session, had already ratified it, but as money bills to carry some of its terms into effect would have to originate in the House of Representatives, it was argued that the House, too, must pass upon it. Here it was that Washington again displayed his cool, commanding judgment, that rose above the clamor and upheld the true interests of all the people. He submitted the treaty to the House and in conferences with the leaders defended its provisions and urged its acceptance. "Either the Treaty or War," was a phrase attributed to him, and whether he invented it or not he did all in his power to impress upon Congress the gravity of the situation. In his efforts he was ably assisted by a young Congressman from Massachusetts, Fisher Ames, whose final speech in support of the treaty remains as the one great address of the long debates. The seriousness of the crisis confronting the country was graphically pictured by Ames who, in closing his three-hour speech, and referring to his enfeebled health, declared: "If, however, the vote should pass to reject—even I, slender and almost broken as my hold on life is, may outlive the Government and Constitution of my country."

That speech and the weight of Washington's influence behind it turned rejection into acceptance by a majority of three. The treaty not only made peace between Great Britain and the United States the normal condition, but it removed the probability that petty disputes over numerous points at issue would lead to armed conflict. It confirmed the wisdom and rectitude of Washington as a defender of the methods of peace and reconciliation against those of force and retaliation.

In his personal relationships Washington always acted with moderation and a becoming sense of the rights of others. In the highest office of the land he never forgot the liberties possessed under its form of government by the lowliest or the least honorable of its citizens. The violence of some of the partisan press campaigns angered and aroused his friends, but Washington, in a letter to Henry Lee, observed "I have a consolation within which no earthly efforts can deprive me of, and that is, that neither ambition nor interested motives have influenced my conduct. The arrows of malevolence . . . can never reach the most vulnerable part of me." It is stated by historians that he was the head of the first government in the world which did not control the public utterances of the people. This liberality toward others is an evidence of his love of peace, for he well knew that in an enlightened and democratic country peace is always in danger unless championed by liberty of conscience and freedom of thought.

Lord Byron, the great English poet, has given perhaps the finest poetic tribute to Washington in the last verse of his immortal "Ode to Napoleon." We are indebted to an English actor, named Bernard, for one of the best known word pictures of Washington in his final days at Mount Vernon, to which for the third time he had retired, after leaving the Presidency. This actor, whom Washington encountered driving on the road near his home, was invited by him to stop at Mount Vernon during the heat of the day. From the account of his visit I quote briefly: "In conversation," he said of Washington, "his face had not much variety of expression. A look of thoughtfulness was given by the compression of the mouth and the indentations of the brow, . . . which did not seem so much to disdain a sympathy with trivialities as to be incapable of denoting them . . . he always spoke with earnestness, and his eyes . . . burned with a steady fire which no one could mistake for mere affability; they were one grand expression of the well-known line: 'I am a man, and interested in all that concerns humanity.' " . . .

We can well understand that from such a man as the actor described could come these words expressive of his attachment to permanent world peace: "I indulge a fond, perhaps an enthusiastic idea, that, as the world is evidently much less barbarous than it has been, its melioration must still be progressive; that nations are becoming more humanized in their policy, that the subjects of ambition and causes for hostility are daily diminishing; and, in fine, that the period is not very remote, when the benefits of a liberal and free commerce will pretty generally succeed to the devastations and horrors of war."

To the attainment of that ideal he strove with all his great powers, and although he did not live to see it realized, his constructive work, his faith in humanity and his compelling vision of his own country's true destiny formed the foundation upon which succeeding Presidents have builded and upon which succeeding generations of his fellow countrymen have labored in the advancement of world peace. This ideal of Washington remains today as the supreme hope of all who honor his name and cherish the memory of his service to humanity.

IN THE PROVINCE OF ALBERTA

Six George Washington Bicentennial events are on record as having been held in the great western province of Alberta, Canada. The first observance was an afternoon reception at the residence of the American Consul in Calgary, Hon. Samuel C. Reat, on the Two Hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth. The Consul reports "that there were more than three hundred present, and the American Women's Club of Calgary attended in a body." There were also present the officials of the Alberta government and representatives from the Calgary city government and local clubs and organizations. The province and municipal officials conveyed their profound respects for George Washington and the country he founded to the American Consul and expressed their desire to participate in the Bicentennial movement.

During the evening of the 22nd a formal George Washington dinner was held by the American Consul to which were invited governmental and diplomatic dignitaries and leaders of the American community in the city. The decorations, music, menu and toasts were appropriately recollective of the day's theme.

On February 23, the American Women's Club of Calgary met formally in their hall and were addressed by Mr. W. Kent Power, prominent Barrister of Calgary. Mr. Power's discourse dealt with the Washington from the following three aspects, with particular emphasis on the third: (1) George Washington's place in the history of the United States and of the world; (2) The significance of his achievements to those interested in closer co-operation or federation of self-governing units now known as the British Commonwealth of Nations; (3) George Washington as a human being. Quoting from anonymous publication entitled "A Project for the British Commonwealth," Mr. Power said of Washington "that so many years spent as the military leader of a revolution should have left his respect for law undiminished is one of the marvels of history and marks Washington as the supreme product of Anglo-Saxon civilization."

The Domestic Science, Arts, Crafts and Travel Departments of the American Women's Club of Calgary entertained at a Bicentennial social in the home of Mrs. W. F. McNeill, Calgary, on April 19, 1932. Information conveyed to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission by the American Consul states that "this was an important social gathering and was attended by Canadians as well as Americans."

American Independence Day was observed in Calgary in connection with the Bicentennial with the holding of a George Washington reception at the home of the American Consul. The Lieutenant Governor of Alberta was scheduled to be the guest speaker at this event, but, on account of illness, sent his regrets. The reception was marked by a large attendance, many of those present being important officials of the government of the city and the province who were to render their personal homage to America's Founder.

The closing event of the Bicentennial in Calgary was a Washington luncheon arranged by the domestic science department of the American Women's Club. A color scheme of red, white and blue was carried out in the large hall and the members of the reception line were gowned in costumes of the Washington period.

Following the toast to "The King" proposed by Mrs. N. F. Jennings, the members and their guests were asked to arise and drink to the memory of George Washington. Mrs. W. F. McNeill gave a brief outline of Washington's life and demonstrated that the influence of Martha Washington was a powerful factor therein.

A President of the United States was honored for the first time in Fort William and Port Arthur, Ontario, Canada, during the Bicentennial celebration. That President was George Washington, whose name was once anathema in this whole region. Special commemorative services were held on the day prior to the opening and on the closing day of the celebration. The service on Sunday, February 21, 1932, was held in the St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church and was attended by practically all American citizens resident in Fort William and Port Arthur as well as a great number of interested Canadians. The American Consul, Hon. Jesse B. Jackson, to whom much credit must be given for the interest aroused in the local Bicentennial events, in his report of the event to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission says that "universal approval was expressed by all concerned in the success of the celebration in Fort William."

The Washington commemorative address was delivered by Rev. Hugh R. Grant, one of Canada's notable clerics and the man the author of "The Sky Pilot" fictionized as the leading character of the book. THE NEWS CHRONICLE of Port Arthur for February 22, 1932, and the DAILY TIMES JOURNAL of Fort William for the same date stressed the parts of Dr. Grant's address in which he declared that "the link that Washington forms between Great Britain and the United States is unbreakable." In addition to setting forth succinctly and in detail the circumstances from which the original Washington family emigrated to the colonies, the early life of the ancestors of George Washington, the laying of the foundation of the United States Government that lead to the successful formation of the greatest Republic the world has known, Dr. Grant laid emphasis upon the effect of the acts of Washington on the growth of the British Dominions and the betterment of the conditions of the peoples thereof.

Preparation for Dr. Grant's sermons and the celebration in general in Fort William and Port Arthur gave rise to an editorial in the DAILY TIMES JOURNAL on February 20, 1932, titled "The Forgotten Grudge," in which it is asserted that evidence is furnished through the Bicentennial celebrations in Canada that hard feelings between citizens of the United States and Great Britain that were aroused during the War for Independence have subsided. The full text of this editorial follows:

A FORGOTTEN GRUDGE

The lapse of over a century and a half has healed any sores that were left by the revolt of the American colonies and the Declaration of Independence, which was the foundation of the present United States of America. Present-day Americans bear no more grudge against George III, of England, than Englishmen bear against George Washington.

No better illustration of this can be seen than in the fact that the two-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Washington is being made the occasion for special services in Canadian churches tomorrow, on the eve of the national holiday on the other side of the line which commemorates the birthday of Washington every year. The pastor of St. Andrew's church has undertaken to speak on their national hero to the citizens of the United States resident in Fort William. . . .

Attempts by hero-worshippers to idealize George Washington have served to obscure his true character. Parson Mason Weems, who told the story of the cherry tree, left the impression of a nasty little hypocrite who pretended that he could not tell a lie. The character of the mature Washington was that of a real man's man, and we would like to believe that, as a boy, he was also all boy. He was a rich man, a slave-owner, though sometimes dubious as to the right to own other men, and was an excellent business man, with an eye to the main chance and ready to make money honestly. He had the virtues and the frailties of his age, drank good liquor and was fearless in battle. That he had already gained the respect and confidence of his associates before he attained the position that was his in later years, may be seen by his unanimous choice as leader. His real greatness was brought out in the stress of conflict.

The NEWS-CHRONICLE of Port Arthur issue of February 22, 1932, also editorializes on the character of Washington and the effect of his political philosophy on the unity and general welfare of mankind. This editorial reflects the spirit of the Canadian press and people relative to the Bicentennial celebration, and for that reason is herewith quoted in full:

GEORGE WASHINGTON

Today, February 22, is one of two great February birthday anniversaries which the people of the United States are pleased to honor. On this day in 1732 was born the man who was destined to become the Father of his Country, George Washington.

The strange thing about George Washington, or at least about his environment, was that he was a member of a family which left England because of an offended loyalty to a royal house which it supported, and that he became the one man most instrumental in severing his family's adopted country from royalty.

The Washingtons had been aristocrats in England, adherents of the royal house of the Stuarts, and it was when Charles I had been unseated by Cromwell and beheaded by order of Parliament that the Washingtons emigrated to the United States.

Col. John Washington, the pioneer settler, led troops against the Susquehannock Indians. He had a son, Lawrence Washington, baptized at Tring, England, June 18, 1635, whose second son was Augustine Washington, born in 1694. Augustine was twice married. By his first wife, Jane Butler, who died November 24, 1729, he had four children. His second wife, Mary Ball, whom he married March 6, 1731, bore, as her first child, George Washington, born, as was his father, at Wakefield, on the Potomac River, fifty miles below Mount Vernon. The Washingtons by that time owned much of the land in the fertile peninsula between the Potomac and Rappahannock Rivers.

George Washington studied mathematics and became a surveyor in the employ of William Fairfax, father of Lawrence's wife, and manager of the great Virginia estate of his cousin, Lord Fairfax. George accompanied Lawrence to Barbadoes, West Indies, and got smallpox. After his return, he entered the military service of Virginia. He later served under General Braddock in the war between the English and the French.

Washington took command of the Continental Army at Cambridge, Mass., July 3, 1775.

Those who believe—and there are many of that opinion—that the welfare of mankind was served by the course which George Washington followed, are always glad to join with the citizens of the United States in observing his birthday. Those who read their histories in a different way freely admit that he was worthy of the high regard in which his memory is held by the people of the great republic. He was and ever will remain one of history's greatest figures.

Efforts were made by the American Consul at Port Arthur to communicate with every American family in the district prior to Thanksgiving Day in 1932, to apprise them of the George Washington service to be held on that day and invite their attendance. As a result of this effort a great number of American citizens in that locality and a host of their Canadian friends assembled at the St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church on Thanksgiving Day and again listened to Dr. Grant deliver a George Washington sermon. Consul Jackson described the event as "most commendable from every point of view" and further said: "in addition to American citizens residing in Fort William and Port Arthur there were in attendance the Mayors of these cities and various other officials, as well as members of the local Chamber of Commerce and other trade organizations, foreign consular officers and Canadians in general. The discourse of Dr. Grant was considered a most brilliant one and highly appreciated by all present."

Rev. Dr. Grant's sermon follows in full text:

"Seest thou a man diligent in his business? He shall stand before Kings; he shall not stand before mean men."—Proverbs 22-29.

It may seem an anomaly that I, a British subject, should take part in the celebration of the birthday of George Washington; for was not the American Revolution led by him and its success attained through him? But the anomaly disappears when we remember that the revolution was a part of God's plan to bring the British people civil and political liberty; and the revolution on the part of the American people had the heartfelt sympathy of some of the most gifted men in England. From Magna Charta, the trend toward liberty had moved on with steady growth to the end that parliament, the representative of the people, might rule and dominate; and that the King should assume his proper sphere—one of the factors in the government of the people. Not independent of, but dependent on parliament. The end sought was the rule of the people through their own representatives elected freely by themselves. So it is that I, a Canadian, can take part in this celebration, recognizing as I do, that the lesson taught by the revolution has been learned well at home, and we Canadians are as free as any people on the earth. This we owe to Washington and the success he and the Colonists attained in their revolt against the tyranny of the Mother Country. The revolution taught Britain the art of colonizing and the glory of free government, both at home and abroad.

"God moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform. He plants His footsteps in the sea and rides upon the storm." And so, in God's Providence George Washington was chosen to take one step forward in the free determination of a people. A movement that today has conquered the earth. When God has a work in view, He enlists the services of men. When He undertook the emancipation of His ancient people He chose Moses to lead them into liberty. When He wished to abolish slavery in the British Empire, He chose Wilberforce to head the movement. And He selected Abraham Lincoln, the great emancipator, to free the slaves in America. He does not choose haphazardly. Moses was trained at the Egyptian court, adopted son of Pharaoh's daughter, educated in all the ways of Egypt and skilled in the arts of leadership. Abraham Lincoln had given years of usefulness in the legislature of his state, and had become adept in the ways of government. He was of the people, and mind and heart and soul blended together in the making of a rich nature that dedicated itself to the great work of emancipation. These men gave a good account of themselves, endowed for their great tasks by experience and training and faithfulness. They were God's instruments in the fulfilment of His Divine tasks. They stood before Kings. They did not stand before mean men.

After this somewhat long introduction, we turn to the subject: George Washington. When we enquire into the reasons for his greatness, we will be led back step by step, over the years of his life and the incidents connected with it, and we will be struck, I venture to say, with the devotion he gave to his task in every year of his life, simple though the work might be. "He was diligent in business."

One factor that developed his life was that back in his very early youth, he lost his father, and the responsibility of the home and for the family devolved upon him. And so in those early years a character was developed that did not bow down before responsibility, but stood up under its load and burden. We find at the age of 16 he took up the work of a surveyor, and it is on record that so minutely and diligently did he do this work that after a long period of time, no errors are to be found in the surveys that he made. At 21 years of age he was the representative of his sovereign in negotiations with the French along the Ohio river. Not only was he the representative as an emissary, but he also held a commission in the British and Colonial army. We find that he was one of the best and one of the most intelligent farmers of his time. Taking a great pride in his estate, Mount Vernon, and using all his great powers diligently to make of that farm what he thought it should be, and developing his farm along the known scientific ways of the time. He was also known as a legislator in his native state, taking part in the councils of that state, doing in the legislature and for the state "with his might what his hand found to do."

And so taking his life step by step we find that in his boyhood years, in his early manhood, in his middle life, these things in which he had been engaged, were carried out with thoroughness and diligence, and each year saw him developed, through his work in every department of his life, to a higher manhood. And when, at the very apex of his powers, the Revolutionary War broke out, here is a man, chosen by God, to lead the armies of the Colonies in their revolt against the English King.

He is not chosen by the toss of a coin. All his previous experience has been the training ground through which his powers—latent—each year, were developed, until the fullness of the life of George Washington was the result. And so again, here we find that because God was behind the movement for liberty He chooses to show His sympathy for the Colonists, and, through them, to bring to themselves civil and political liberty, and also by them to write a new page in the advancement of liberty to the world. It was through his diligence in lesser things that Washington was fitted to become the greater leader of the American colonies in their conflict with the Motherland. But these virtues are not merely the fruitage of life itself. Behind the life is the Great Life at the Fountain Head, God, from whom all virtue flows. And so, almost, we might say, every man who has accomplished much in the world has not only accomplished it through the virtues that he himself put forth, but he is continually conscious of the power of God in his life, and he is continually waiting upon God and continually endeavoring to become the channel through which God may express himself in the movement that He has undertaken. It is that humility of spirit and humble dependence upon the Divine, that characterizes our great men.

In the late War, Marshal Foch was seen one morning, early, entering a ruined church, and kneeling down at the altar, humbly asking God's aid in the fortunes of the day in the cause which he led.

And so we find George Washington in his early youth a devout member of his church and a leader in it, quietly conscious at all times of the presence of God. He learned to practice that Presence and in the exigencies of his latter life, that practice of the presence of God kept his heart and his courage strong as he faced the issues of the Revolution. Due in large measure to his life's consecration to the Eternal and due to his diligence in the striving to carry out the Will of the Almighty, he felt that in himself, with all his powers, he represented but a little of the magnificent Power that was behind him. And he prayed that presence of God might stay him and might keep him that his life might not weaken before the onslaught of the powers that resisted him. That he was a religious man, we have only to quote from the text of the first Thanksgiving Proclamation, issued by President Washington, October 3, 1789. After the preamble it reads:

"Now, therefore, I do recommend and assign Thursday, the 26th day of November, next, to be devoted by the People of these States to the service of that great and glorious Being, who is the beneficent Author of all the good that was, that is, or that will be.—That we may then all unite in rendering unto Him our sincere and humble thanks—for His kind care and protection of the People of this country previous to their becoming a Nation—for the signal and manifold mercies, and the favorable interpositions of His providence, which we experienced in the course and conclusion of the late war—for the great degree of tranquillity, union, and plenty, which we have since enjoyed—for the peaceable and rational manner in which we have been enabled to establish constitutions of government for our safety and happiness, and particularly the national One now lately instituted—for the blessed, and the means we have of acquiring and diffusing useful knowledge; and in general for all the great and various favors which He hath been pleased to confer upon us."

This shows the trend of George Washington's mind and his attitude toward God. And if this continent is to maintain itself in leadership, it must go back to the principles of Washington. It must cease from viewing life from outside and dip into the inner springs that are supplied from the fountains of the Most High. It must diligently do its great tasks under His leadership in whatever department of life they may lie.

Rodger Babson gives this example: A resident of South America asked this question which he answered himself: "Why is it that South America, with all her rich resources, is so far behind North America in her development?" And the answer he gave was this: "The Spaniards came to South America seeking gold. The Pilgrim Fathers came to North America seeking God." And seeking God their conscience is built up, for conscience is that part of us that God touches, and by which we interpret God. And conscience works out in our lives in integrity, and integrity is the safety of the state. We may build fireproof and thief-proof banks and storehouses, but the safety is not in the material strength of them, but in the integrity of the man that holds the key.

In his rich, diligent life, George Washington sought God, had a conscience void of offence toward God and toward men, and that rich relationship between himself and his God worked out in the greatness of his life by which he brought liberty, not only to his own people, but advanced it to the peoples of the world.

He exemplified fully in his own life the wisdom of our text: "Seest thou a man diligent in his own business? He shall stand before Kings, he shall not stand before mean men."

No better brief of Bicentennial activities in Hamilton, Ontario, Canada, can be prepared than is contained in the following excerpt from a letter of the American Consul, Hon. John D. Johnson, to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission:

This officer has from time to time placed in the hands of responsible Americans in this City literature sent out by your Commission. Due, apparently, to the proximity of Hamilton to the border, there are no American societies in this City, although there are a number of American citizens. The total population of Hamilton is about 155,000. Most of the American citizens are closely allied with Canadian business affairs.

This officer suggested to some of the leading Americans the possibility of a celebration on February 22 but it became apparent, possibly due to the existing depression which has been felt seriously in this large industrial district, that no arrangements were to be made for such a celebration. Accordingly, on the afternoon of February 22 this officer and his wife, assisted by the other officer of the Consulate, held an informal tea and reception at their home. This reception was attended by about seventy-five persons, most of whom were the heads or representatives of American concerns or industries in this City. The reception was also attended by the Mayor and his wife, the head of the local Canadian Club, and several other prominent Canadian residents. The house was decorated with flags of the United States, Great Britain, and Canada, and copies of the Stuart portrait and the photograph of the Houdon bust of George Washington were prominently displayed.

The name and fame of George Washington is not new to Hamilton, however, for apparently Washington during his day was known and respected in that city as well as he was in the United States. This is evidenced by certain minutes of a meeting of the Barton Lodge No. 10 (Masonic), of December 12, 1800, a facsimile of which was sent to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission at the instance of Col. Charles R. McCullough, Canadian historian of note. These minutes say:

Read a Letter from the Grand Secretary informing this Lodge of Communication received from the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania: announcing the Death of the R. W. G. Master Washington, and requesting this Lodge to go in mourning at their public and private meetings. Six months including first meeting: in Consequence of which Br. Aikman moved 2nd by Br. I. Showers that a piece of black ribbon should be purchased for that purpose—the motion being put was carried. Br. John Lottridge agreed to furnish the Lodge with the ribbon. Lodge closed in perfect Harmony 10 o'clock.

A spirit of peace and good will was brought to Kingston, Ontario, Canada, by the George Washington Bicentennial celebration that was without precedent in the relations of the inhabitants of that famous old Canadian military city with the United States of America. The principal character in this drama of better diplomatic and international feelings was Hon. George G. Fuller, American Consul in the Kingston Consular District. Assisting Major Fuller in his plans were such organizations as the American Women's Club of Kingston, ministers of Kingston churches, city officials, Kiwanis and Rotary Clubs, Kingston newspapers, the American Consul General, Hon. Wesley Frost, and various other individuals and agencies. Under the sponsorship and direction of this influential group there were staged in Kingston a series of Bicentennial observances in spirit second to none and in outcome and effect deserving of high distinction in the annals of the Washington celebration.

The story of the Bicentennial in Kingston unfolds like fiction, but to understand its full import, one must know something of the city's history.

The city itself is the capital of Frontenac County, Ontario, Canada, situated at the head of Lake Ontario, 161 miles northeast of Toronto. The Royal Military College in Canada, Queen's University, and the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons, School of Mining and Agriculture, and other governmental institutions are located there. It is the seat of an Anglican bishop and a Roman Catholic archbishop and was once the site occupied by the French fort of Frontenac. From 1841 to 1844 Kingston was the capital of Canada. Its present population is 21,753. The city was colonized largely by immigrant Loyalists or Tories, those patriotic British who during the American war for independence remained loyal to the mother country. During and after the Revolutionary War, because of the intense patriotisms of the day, the Loyalists in most of the Colonies suffered boycotts, ostracism, and confiscation of their property. After the peace of 1783, it was recommended that the various colonies withdraw their severe laws regarding Loyalists, but most of them refused, and unfortunate Loyalists who had not already gone to Great Britain took refuge in Canada.

In the following official dispatch to the Department of State, Consul Fuller graphically describes the situation and uplifting effect of the Bicentennial celebration thereon:

KINGSTON, ONTARIO, CANADA.
MARCH 8, 1932.

TRADITIONAL PREJUDICE OVERCOME

I have the honor to report that concerted action during George Washington's Bicentennial achieved its object of overcoming the traditional hostility towards the United States, so far as many leading citizens were concerned. This traditional hostility was distinct from criticism of contemporaneous problems, and was entirely based on acts of previous generations. . . .

Local bitterness towards the United States Government and nation had its origin in the treatment accorded loyalists after the Revolutionary War, many of whom were driven from their homes and settled near Kingston. It was increased during the War of 1812 when this was the military center for operations on the St. Lawrence River and Lake Ontario. It was kept alive by the Royal Act which provided that descendants of these loyalists should, in perpetuity, bear the title "United Empire Loyalist." Although this title is no longer used in the cities, "U. E. L." is a frequent suffix to names in the rural districts. Associations of these loyalists have kept vivid the century-old quarrels. . . .

When I first suggested the celebration of Washington's birthday, there was much opposition. . . . Some Americans reported that no Canadians would attend the proposed entertainment. I discovered that this was not so. The entertainment by the American Women's Club was crowded and not an adverse comment could be discovered. Consul General Wesley Frost, as guest of honor, won the audience by his personality and created by his talk a new understanding of the character and ideals of the American people.

In addition to the Club's celebration, seven ministers agreed to talk on George Washington and were furnished with material submitted by the United States Commission. . . . Canadian service clubs, made up of the descendants of the loyalists, . . . decided, without instigation, to celebrate the Washington Bicentennial. The Kiwanis Club of Kingston drank a toast to Washington and to the United States, saluted the American flag, and sang our national anthem. The Rotary Club of Belleville held a luncheon on Washington's birthday, and the Kingston Rotary Club three days later, each devoted to his memory and to friendship towards the United States. As guest speaker on each occasion, I talked on Washington and colonial conditions, and quoted from President Hoover's address at Yorktown in October. I referred in particular to Washington's attitude towards Canada, and his various attempts to visit Belleville and Kingston. The innocuousness of my remarks is shown by the following press summary: "As an after-dinner speaker Major Fuller is in a class by himself,—no spread-eagleism, but a quiet dry humor which kept his hearers chuckling as he moved quietly from one phase of Washington's life to another. . . . Major Fuller handled his subject in a way which met instant favor, and he will always be welcomed at Belleville Rotary Board either as a speaker or as a silent guest, for he has a personality which attracts and a fund of real humor and interesting anecdotes."

The Kingston press . . . offered to cooperate in any way, published numerous announcements of the celebration, and devoted three columns to its description. Its leading editorial on February 20 was entitled "George Washington—Patriot," and pointed out that it was only natural Washington should have espoused the cause of the Colonies, and that his love was a rebuke to politicians who use public services to enrich themselves. It concluded: "Old antagonisms have been forgotten. Canada and the United States have existed side by side for a century without forts or warships, and this Washington Bicentennial will further cement the friendship which has existed for years between the two countries."

The summary of a typical sermon on Washington may be interesting. The pastor of the Queen Street United Church advertised his subject as "International Fellowship with Goodwill Reference to the Bicentennial Celebration of George Washington's Birthday." After describing the character of Washington he pointed out the necessity for such leadership in present day politics, and the example given to the world by Canadian-American relations. He said "as long as the United States is blessed by God with such leadership she will continue to make history beneficial, not only to her own people, but to general humanity the world over." He asserted that America's attitude towards debts must be recognized as just,—that no talk of cancellation should be heard until there is assurance that the money thus saved would not be used on further armament. He hoped that the Ottawa conference would lead to closer fellowship within the British Empire, with which the United States might some day associate itself; and that eventually a closer fellowship of civilized and right-thinking nations might be established,—nations which would not live for themselves alone but which would be willing to consider, and if necessary to make some sacrifices for, the benefit of the group; that such a fellowship of nations could bring order and peace into the world through boycott and economic pressure.

. . . The commemoration of the Washington Bicentennial in Kingston has broken the chain of traditional hostility. . . . Congratulations have reached this office from all ranks of life. Consul General Frost, after his return to Montreal, wrote:

"May I express officially my appreciation of the initiative and tact which you have displayed and may I also extend my congratulations upon the good feeling which you have undoubtedly been highly successful in generating at your post."

It is certain that a new appreciation has been created of the friendliness now existing between our two peoples, and the necessity of replacing time-worn antagonism with sympathetic cooperation.

Respectfully yours,

GEORGE G. FULLER,
American Consul.

The Bicentennial commenced in Kingston under the initiative of the clergy on Sunday, February 21, 1932. Seven ministers, representing as many churches, being requested to preach on subjects relative to George Washington, consented without reluctance and were supplied with authentic historical material sent to Kingston by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission.

Very Rev. Wm. W. Craig, M.A., D.D., Dean of Ontario at St. George's Cathedral, devoted his sermon to George Washington and American ideals in the text

"God is our Refuge and Strength
A very present help in trouble."

According to Consul Fuller, this was the first time such a subject had been mentioned to officers, cadets, and enlisted men of the military academy and army, who constitute a large part of the congregation in this historic center of conservatism. The full text of Mr. Craig's sermon is quoted herewith:

God is our Refuge and Strength,
A very present help in trouble.

The great Nation to the South of us is celebrating tomorrow the two-hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, its National Hero. It has asked us to show our sympathy in a neighborly way by saying something about it in our churches. We would be glad to do so in any case; but all the more because we have been asked. We feel that we are not intruding and we can speak with greater freedom.

I wish first to say something about George Washington. We have a distant share in him in two ways:

(1) He was, to begin with, what we would think of as a Colonial Imperialist. His outlook was distinctly in the direction of England. The American Histories disclose this fact by tracing his English forbears. In the Revolution in England they were strong Royalists. Two were knighted by King Charles; and this brother was a fellow of a College in Oxford; and Vicar of Purleigh until he was ejected by the Puritan Parliament. It was owing to his misfortunes and poverty that his son John sailed to Virginia.

The Virginians were all Royalists. Their ambitions and social standards looked to England. The kind of life they fostered was modelled on that of the best landed gentry in the old country. You can see it classified in Thackeray's "Virginians" or in "Richard Carvel."

It was quite natural that on leaving home he should go to Virginia. Virginia is a beautiful country. It is noted for the clearness of its skies; the purity of its air; its freedom from storms. It is moist without being damp; it is so mild as to invite living in the open air; its healthfulness is attested by the vigor and longevity of its people.

Now this John who crossed the ocean as "Second Mate Sayleing ye Vessel to Virginia" was the great-grandfather of George Washington. It is not surprising, therefore, that George inherited the Virginian conception of a happy life.

Washington's life, therefore, centers on his estate, "Mount Vernon," on the Potomac.

"There is a spot on the Potomac River where all the ships that pass toll their bells. So that there, there is perpetual music like far-off village chimes. That spot is the Reach of the Potomac where on its higher Southern Bank stands Mount Vernon, the Home of George Washington."

Day by day parties of American tourists visit Mount Vernon as a sort of pilgrimage. Each room in the house is consigned to the care of the ladies of one State; so that each State has its own room to look after. Its name is above the door; its duty is performed with reverent care.

Mount Vernon brings before us therefore the first interest and characteristic of Washington. He was first of all an Agriculturist. His historical prototype is Cincinnatus, who was called twice from the plough to the dictatorship of Rome.

"Agriculture," he wrote, "has ever been the most favorite amusement of my life." A visitor states that his host's greatest pride "is to be the first farmer in America." Mount Vernon came to him by inheritance as an estate of 2,500 acres; he increased it by frequent purchases of adjoining lands until it became an estate of 8,000 acres. The management of a vast estate like that means certain things which lead us on to other characteristics.

"He was a man of fine physique. He was well over six feet in height. Like Saul, the son of Kish, he towered head and shoulders over his fellows. His head was well shaped though not large, but it stood gracefully poised upon a superb neck; blue-grey, penetrating eyes which were widely separated and overhung by a heavy brow. His deportment was invariably grave; it was sobriety that stopped short of sadness."

It is not surprising that he was not a man of books or to any degree a scholar. He did not have much schooling; he was largely self-educated, like a good many Eighteenth Century gentry. He never mastered the intricacies of spelling. In early years he got possession of an English book of enormous popularity called "The Young Man's Companion." This book was a self-educator—without a tutor—it is described in its preface as "written in a plain and easy style, that a young man may attain the same without a tutor." It taught everything—writing; arithmetic; the proper style and form of letters, wills, deeds, all legal forms; to measure, survey, navigate; build houses; to make ink and cider; how to plant, graft, doctor the sick; and the rules of civility. To this book Washington devoted himself with great assiduity.

A second link with us is that he was a staunch member of the Episcopal Church, and he remained so till he died. He was not distinctively religious. His religion appearing to be unimaginative, unemotional; regular loyalty to Church, and to the first principle of National Religion, which characterized the better classes of the Eighteenth Century.

His greatness has its roots in the following characteristics:

(1) He was a man of strong, violent character and purpose. Throughout his whole life in every crisis that confronted him he showed himself a vigorous, self-sacrificing, courageous man of action.

(2) He was brave to the point of recklessness. His military career is full of incidents which show the recklessness with which he exposed himself to danger, and the readiness with which he was able to face odds that were altogether against him and carry them triumphantly. Writing to his mother after General Braddock's expedition, he says: "I had four bullets through my coat and two horses shot under me, yet escaped unhurt."

An officer wrote: "Our Army love their General very much, but they have one thing against him, which is the little care he takes of himself in any action. His personal bravery makes him fearless of danger."

(3) He was a man of the highest moral integrity:

"The glimpses we get of his inner world of character disclose signs of a strong sense of duty, of strong passions, resolutely controlled, of order, method, industry, all give proof that he took to heart the maxim which we find written in firm, round hand in his copy-book: 'Labor to keep alive in your heart that little spark of Divine Fire called Conscience.'"

Here is a country gentleman that with no wider horizon (to begin with) than that of his plantation and its duties, who because he could be trusted absolutely to do the right for the public good, rose to be the Commander, the first statesman, the founder of a nation, the object of our enthusiastic admiration, which a century of criticism and reflection has only served to strengthen and confirm.

(4) Finally, he is great because he was the man the time needed. The time was dark—one of the darkest times of the history of our British race.

(a) Dark on the one side as the result of crass stupidity. The attitude of the British Government at the time is symbolized by General Braddock's expedition.

Braddock's army marched through the wild American forests in heavy marching order with guns and baggage, and troops in closed ranks; and when some of the Colonels ventured to suggest that all this was inadvisable they were told with a sneer that Indians might be formidable to raw American Militia, but they could make no impression on disciplined troops. When the Indian war-whoops were heard from the surrounding woods, Washington again begged Braddock to break up his serried ranks, but he remained obstinate. It became no longer a column of disciplined troops, but a shamble of panic-stricken soldiers huddled together and shot down by a foe they could not see.

The stupidity of Braddock was only a symbol of the stupidity of a Government that imposed stamp acts, unacknowledged rights of taxation, and sent impossible generals and inadequate armies to fight an indignant, vital, and rapidly developing nation.

In 1775 Richard Penn was asked before the House of Lords if the Colonials were fighting for their Independence. He answered "No!" Then said his interrogators: "For what are they fighting?" "In defense of their liberties," was the reply.

(5) There was darkness on the other side—the darkness of casting off ancient loyalties—of creating military forces adequate to meet the situation; of facing personal perils, defeats, and disasters; of laying the foundations of Government and of a new Nation—a tremendous task—a task that needed a mighty leader, and a good man—and in Washington the Man was discovered, great enough to meet the requirements of the crisis.

For the people of the United States who trace their history back to Washington, we have messages as a Nation and as a Church.

As a Nation we may point out that in cooperation with them we have seen solved two of the most difficult problems of Internationalism:

(a) Trust—a great conflict brought to an end, without any spring of bitterness left in the final settlement to endanger the peace of the future. Whatever bitterness there was is gone. Not merely because time has healed it, but because there was no treaty burdened with injustices which made future tranquillity impossible.

We are reminded in the second place of one of the most remarkable phenomena of modern history. Thousands of miles of frontiers between us, and withal over a century of unbroken peace.

The Disarmament Conference is becoming what some believe to be an empty, visionary, and impracticable task. It is no impracticable task—it is done—it is here!

To the Nation we extend our congratulations, our hopes and wishes for its future prosperity and peace.

As a church we emphasize the value of need for true and living religion in national life. Neither we nor they can go far without it.

The needs of a nation are great—peace and pious homes; home life and honest Government. Natural unselfishness in dealing with the world. A high and untarnished sense of duty in domestic business and political life. A nation in which the nationals are brothers to each other, lovers of common good, Sons of God.

Where is the Dynamic will which makes such things possible? It has ever sprung, springs now, and ever will spring from a life that lives itself ever in the presence of God. If a nation loses God, that nation loses its life.

If God is not there, nothing is there. If God is there, enthroned on the national consciousness, nothing else matters; everything is there.

Rev. J. D. MacKenzie Naughton told his large congregation at St. James Church that Canadians as well as Americans may well celebrate the birthday of George Washington who stood for the principles on which the great British Empire is founded. Under the text "Who knowest whether Thou are not come to the Kingdom for such a time as this?"

the Rev. Mr. MacKenzie said:

February 22nd is the Two-Hundredth Anniversary of the birth of George Washington. We, too, may celebrate the birthday of this great man who stood for the things which were the foundation of the British Empire: justice, liberty, and a trust in God. We would find the greatest formative influence on the character of the world's great men by seeking for it in the teaching received at their mothers' knees. George Washington was reared in a Christian home, amid the family prayers of his father and the Christian teachings of his mother. There may still be seen at Mount Vernon her copy of Sir Matthew Hale's "Meditations and Contemplations," which she used in her own devotion and training of her children. One passage which she had committed to memory ended with these words: "When Thy honor or the good of my country was concerned I then thought it was a seasonable time to pay out my reputation for the advantage of either and to act with it and by it to the highest in the use of all lawful means, and upon such an occasion the counsel of Mordecai to Esther was my encouragement: 'Who knowest whether God has not given you this reputation and esteem for such a time as this?'"

Was not this thought in his mind when, on receiving word of his appointment as Commander-in-Chief of the Continental Army, Washington expressed his willingness, yet sense of unfitness, and wrote to his wife assuring her that the appointment was not of his seeking and of his unwillingness to part with her and the family, adding, "But as it has been a kind of destiny that has thrown me upon this service, I shall hope that my undertaking is destined to answer some good purpose."

First, think of George Washington the soldier. War with England was deplorable but inevitable. The spirit of independence was in the air and many turbulent spirits in America did not want a peaceful settlement of the dispute. The corruption in English political life at the time is almost unbelievable. The Secretary of the Treasury acknowledged that in a single morning 25,000 Pounds was paid for votes. Under such circumstances we could hardly expect wise, impartial statesmanship to prevail.

George Washington was unanimously chosen Commander-in-Chief of the American forces. Through difficulty, suffering, and peril he at last led them to victory. Through all we see him upheld by his trust in God and his sense of the justice of the cause. In his order for ceasing hostilities he said: "The Commander in Chief orders the Cessation of Hostilities between the United States and the King of Great Britain to be publicly proclaimed tomorrow at the New Building and that the Proclamation which will be communicated herewith, be read tomorrow evening at the head of every regiment & corps of the army. After which the Chaplains and the several brigades will render thanks to Almighty God for all his mercies, particularly for his overruling the wrath of Man to his own glory and causing the rage of war to cease amongst the nations."

The Union of the States: When the War was over and independence gained, Washington's intention was to return home and settle down to the management of his estates. But this was not to be. Again we see the influence of the text: "Who knowest whether Thou are not come to the Kingdom for such a time as this." The States which had been given independence now needed unity. Isolated units had to be reconciled. Single states had to be persuaded to sink their own advantage for the good of the whole nation. When the Constitutional Convention met in 1787, George Washington was unanimously chosen presiding officer. He guided their deliberations, and the very fact that Washington approved of the Constitution probably did more than anything else towards persuading the various states to ratify it. Then came the launching of the new Government. Washington was unanimously chosen as its first President. The same qualities which made him his country's leader in war made him her successful leader in peace. A second term followed the first. Thus he served his country as President and laid the foundation of the Nation's greatness. Let us hear his words in his famous Farewell Address, for it is a message all nations would do well to heed today:

"... Let us with caution indulge the supposition, that morality can be maintained without religion.—Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle. . . . Morality is a necessary spring of popular Government."

The Message to us: We today are living in difficult times. Let us not lament but rejoice, for difficulties call for the best in us as we endeavor to surmount them. As Christians these words: "Who knowest whether Thou are not come to the Kingdom for such a time as this" come home to us. It is a call to the Church to lift up its voice and be heard. To the clamor for preparation for war and competition for armaments, the world has a message. This is the way of folly. War does not settle our international problems, but rather creates fresh ones. This way is wrong. It is not God's way. The true way is the way of Sacrifice and love, and it is the only way to an ultimate solution of our difficulties.

In our social and economic troubles the Church has a message. Many are looking to Russia to show the way. That, too, is the way of force. Christ has a better solution: self-sacrifice and Christian love. This would save us from revolution and bring us out of our distress. Surely it is for such a time as this that the Church was put here. We must cultivate first a living faith in God, believe that his way is best and trust him to prosper our efforts; secondly, a readiness to do our duty to the point of sacrifice. National sacrifice of security in the interests of peace; personal sacrifice of wealth in the interests of society as a whole; and thirdly, the power to make a whole-hearted start on whatever task may lay to hand.

A large congregation at the Queen Street Church of Kingston gathered to hear the Rev. Dr. Thomas Green preach on the subject of George Washington under the text as follows:

"The Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans."

"This is my commandment that ye love one another, as I have loved you."

These two texts suggest a double theme for our consideration, racial hatred and brotherly love. It should not take us Christians very long to decide which is the better mental and spiritual attitude of the two.

On the one hand we have the deep-seated, lingering disorder in Europe and Asia due to racial hatred and manifested in national boundaries armed to the teeth on both sides. We see this racial hatred illustrated very vividly and forceably in the most regrettable conflict now waging between China and Japan. May God over-rule it for good in the unifying of the Chinese people. On the other hand, we in North America are able to give a demonstration to the world which is our pride and their envy, of the new order of international relationships made possible when men take Jesus seriously and love one another.

For over one hundred years, on a border line 4,000 miles long, the United States and Canada have lived in peace and friendly relationships, without a navy, a fort, or a standing army of defence.

It is with the kindest felicitations and the sincerest good wishes that we Canadians will share tomorrow in the bicentennial celebration of the birth of George Washington, the father of the United States of America.

All the great men of the world do not belong to any one nation, not even ours. God in His wise over-ruling Providence and in His universal love for all humanity, distributes pretty evenly His manifold blessings and raises up men and women of splendid vision and marvelous powers of leadership through whose convictions, devotion, and self-sacrificing services He endeavors to redeem nations and usher in His glorious Kingdom of righteousness, peace, joy, and fellowship.

George Washington was such a man in the life of his nation. He was not intellectually dazzling like Hamilton, nor brilliantly learned like Jefferson, nor overwhelmingly eloquent with a passionate splendor like Patrick Henry, nor was he a faultless ideal. We know his weaknesses, for he was human. Yet Washington had, in combination, a set of intellectual and moral qualities which left him head and shoulders above any of these men.

His qualities were modesty, self-mastery over pride and selfish ambition, wisdom and its corollary good sound judgment, unselfishness, courage, a sense of duty and call, a love of righteousness, justice and freedom, and all of it backed by a Christian conscience and a feeling of dependence on God and responsibility to God for his life and conduct. May God give us such men to govern us today.

His modesty, self-mastery, and sense of duty are evident in a sincere statement he made concerning himself. "The consciousness of having attempted faithfully to discharge my duty, and to win the approbation of my country, will be recompense for my services."

Washington declined all salary, wages, or emoluments. He was no grafter, nor national profiteer.

His tender conscience, his sense of divine call, his courage for justice and liberty are seen in his inaugural address of 1789 . . .

That Washington was anxious to found his nation on Christian principles is seen in his Thanksgiving proclamation of 1789 calling the people to prayer. He says: "It is the duty of all Nations to acknowledge the providence of Almighty God, to obey His will, to be grateful for His benefits, and humbly to implore His protection and favor, . . . that great and glorious Being, who is the beneficent Author of all the good that was, and is, or that will be."

And the desire that the United States should be always a Christian nation is also evident in his address to the Governors of the various states given in 1783. He addressed therein these memorable words:

"I now make my earnest prayer, that God would have you and the State over which you preside, in his holy protection; that he would incline the hearts of the citizens to cultivate a spirit of subordination and obedience to government; to entertain a brotherly affection and love for one another, for their fellow citizens of the United States at large, and particularly for their brethren who have served in the field; and finally, that he would most graciously be pleased to dispose us all to do justice, to love mercy, and to demean ourselves with that charity, humility, and pacific temper of mind, which were the characteristics of the Divine Author of our blessed religion, and without an humble imitation of whose example in these things we can never hope to be a happy nation."

It was on such a faith as a foundation that Washington built the nation. Nations today need such leaders, leaders of high and holy ideals and ambitions. As long as the United States is blessed by God with such leadership, she will continue to make history, beneficial to not only her own people, but to general humanity the world over.

But God has equally blessed the British Empire with outstanding Christian leaders and statesmen. In this dark hour of supreme testing and trial, we are not lacking in such leadership. And it is of supreme importance that we be so led.

One has but to read the memoirs of Walter Page and Lord Grey to realize what a tremendous power for international good-will and Christian fellowship men can be. But all national leaders need the loyal support and backing of the masses. You and I can do our little part in creating a healthy public opinion that will make it possible for our leaders to overthrow racial hatred by substituting for it good-will, fellowship, and cooperation, by letting love and confidence supplant hatred and fear, and good-will and peace be substituted for strife and war.

It is fundamentally essential that the United States of America and the British Empire remain friendly. More, this friendliness and cooperation must be cultivated in the best interests of not only these two peoples but of the world, and this is not with a view to a new balance of power as over against the rest of the world. I sincerely hope that the political policy of balances of powers is a thing of the past. These two empires, as I see it, have no desire to unite their forces now nor in the future to oppose or thwart the rightful ambitions of other peoples, but to demonstrate to the world the nucleus of a fellowship to which they invite other nations to participate.

Racial hatred is to be overcome by the new commandment of Jesus. We are not to be like the Jews and the Samaritans who would not associate with each other. Love is the law of life. Love is the secret that will solve our international difficulties and dangers. And the solution must come through our great Christian leaders backed by a Christian public opinion.

In the second place, the principle laid down by the United States must be recognized as a just one and in the interests of peace. That is: It is no use talking of cancelling debts, if the money that should and would pay those debts is to be used in further armaments.

World peace can be established only on righteousness, love, and fellowship between the nations. War is the result of hatred, fear, and economic injustice. Attempts have been made and are now being made to bring together the nations of the earth into an international fellowship for the good of all.

The League of Nations is an outstanding illustration of this attempt at fellowship, organized not only for the prevention of wars, but for the fighting of disease and vice, and for the solving of labor problems so international in their scope.

It has always been a thousand pities that the United States has chosen thus far to be an onlooker to her own proposition. It must be rather humiliating for a nation of such power and influence as the United States to be but a corresponding member and to have no vote in the League's decisions.

The idea of fellowship in ideal and action is gaining a firmer hold on the minds of nations as the only solution to world problems. Love, good will, cooperative fellowship is the way out of our world troubles. The world has been getting together in various conferences at Washington, London, Paris, and Geneva, and all the nations of the world are now struggling with the problem of disarmament. The whole world is praying for their success.

The way out is God's way. God's way is love and fellowship. These are just other words for the Kingdom of God. This divine ideal for the world of the Kingdom of God must be realized for the nations to be saved. Salvation is life, more abundant life, not just existence, but life, larger life, abundant eternal life. This is true of nations as well as individuals.

A long step forward was made in the Briand-Kellogg Peace Pact, when the nations decided to no longer settle international troubles by war, but by arbitration methods. This pact outlawed war. This peace pact is a remarkable accomplishment in the abstract, but it needs for its ultimate success some working rules and understanding in the concrete. The Chinese-Japanese embroglio will illustrate this. The Peace Pact is not enough in itself. There must be found a way to amicably settle the economic causes that gender war and strife. Japan needs raw materials and a market, for the life of her people is at stake. So I suggest that the only principle on which a solution of the economic causes of war can rest is fellowship.

This fellowship can be established by nations of like mind getting together and living for the good of each other as well as their own good.

A narrow, selfish nationalism is contrary to the Kingdom of God idea of fellowship and is detrimental to the best interests of the world and to the individual nations concerned. The present armament competition is the fruit of a selfish nationalism. Tariff walls and wars will never solve the economic problems of the day. There should be a conference of nations on tariffs resulting in adjustment, readjustment, and constant revisions of all tariffs that will adequately, fairly, and justly distribute the raw materials of the world, and the finished products for the needs and the advancement of all God's creatures in every land. We cannot any longer in this diminishing world live unto ourselves. Selfishness in nations will always end disastrously as it does in the life of individuals.

The United Church of Canada offers the world an illustration of what fellowship can do to brighten the Kingdom of God, the Kingdom of righteousness, peace, and joy. There were many unions of many sects of each denomination first, and then later the successful union of three different denominations and all this with a view to a larger union that will some day answer the prayer of our Lord that all might be one as He and the Father are one in order that His Kingdom might come for the redemption of mankind generally.

The thing needed today is for nations that are like-minded to get together and not only sign a peace pact but actually work out tariffs, labor problems, and everything else that affects trade and commerce, just as they are now conferring on the size of armies, navies, and air forces needed for the preserving of national law and order. We need to really and actually love and live and work together for each other.

I believe this day is coming. Already we see the little cloud as a man's hand that promises the showers of blessing in the near future.

Let the fellowship begin with the like-minded. Let us agree to fellowship with each other in trade and commerce on a basis that is fair to all concerned.

I do not know how to work this all out in detail. That is a problem for experts. But it can be done, because we recognize that love is the secret of life and peace and justice, and we are going to live together eschewing and shunning national selfishness for the good of the Empire.

Then let this fellowship grow. If the United States, who needs our cooperation in protesting against the unjust actions of Japan, desires to join us in a fellowship of mutually beneficial trade and commerce, then let the door to this international love and fellowship be open. And let the door be open to any other nation to join the fellowship that is ready to act and cooperate on an unselfish basis with ourselves. Let us abandon the selfish competitive policy of every nation for itself.

ington, 1732-1799," in the light of which topic he spoke as follows:

It is always profitable to call to mind great men. The writer of the Book of Genesis pictures the greatness of man in these words, "And God said, Let us make man in our own image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth." The truly great man is he who realizes his Kinship with his Divine Creator. A poet of ancient days wrote, "When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars which thou hast ordained; What is man that thou are mindful of him? And the Son of man that thou visitest him? For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honour. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands." Man was meant to be kingly, to master the forces of the life amid which he lived. To such, nature yields her secrets and animal life becomes subject, and his fellow-men give honour.

Yet man has other contacts than those indicated in sovereignty over nature and sub-human life. He is one among many brethren. The real test of his attainment of the Divine purpose of his creation is in the attitude to his fellows and the dominion exerted among them. Here the standard has been given in the words and life of One who is the Representative Man. "I am among you as one that serveth" are the words of the Galilean. The experience of men has found no higher expression of that which constitutes the noblest and most effective service of man. The sovereignty of service is the one true dominion over his fellows to which man is called. All who exercise it make all men their debtors. They being dead yet speak. Their memory is an inspiration. To recall their character and service is to quicken life in like spirit and endeavor. Their circumstance may be far removed from our own; the tools with which they had to accomplish their tasks may have been undesirable to them and to us but if the service be necessary and the fulfilment of it noble they are our forbears in the realm of high endeavor. They lift our eyes to the heights.

Their deeds awaken in us desires to be worthy of those who have purchased our liberties and made enduring foundations for the temple of humanity.

It is our privilege to recall the life of one of the pioneers of civil liberty. His name is a household word to over one hundred millions who live in the land where he gave his energies to make a free, self-governing realm, and almost equally is his name prized by those living in the Empire whose unworthy representatives he opposed. George Washington is a name honored and beloved throughout the whole English-speaking world, and to all who love liberty and appreciate noble devotion and sacrifice. That the name Washington is given to over two hundred cities, towns, townships, villages, and hamlets in the United States is indication of the place the name holds there.

Like all truly great characters, . . . George Washington belongs to all kindred spirits, regardless of their nationality, tongue or creed. Therefore, we neighbors and friends of the citizens across an unfortified boundary line of four thousand miles claim Washington as ours in that realm of life which transcends all barriers made by human strife or natural condition. He belongs to all whose faces are to the dawn of the new and better day of human freedom that is ever coming and yet is never here. He is one among that company of whom we think when we say, "Let us call to mind the deeds of famous men and of the fathers who begat us. . . ."

It is with the character of the man we are concerned, and with his ideals and purposes and the significance of his whole effort. Three points call for our particular consideration: (1) his singleness of purpose, devotion to one goal; (2) the qualities shown in demands made on him in the realizing that purpose; (3) the spiritual quality which was the real fibre of his being and made him the power he was and is.

(1) Washington's singleness of purpose marked all his national services. Called to be Commander-in-Chief of the army opposing the British, he held firmly to the ideal which prompted his energetic disapproval of the measures fostered by the authorities to force the colonists to be taxed without their consent. Throughout the whole campaign, which was trying in the extreme in many ways, he followed unflinchingly the earnest purpose of achieving freedom for his compatriots. The basis and manner of his appeals to his men, the unselfish devotion which he inspired by his own example, the unswerving loyalty taught and practiced were possible only because of there being one central motive guiding all his actions and deliberations. The fine appreciation of the deeper feelings of life experienced by friend and foe, the noble respect for worth and devotion manifest among those with whom he and his soldiers had associations are indicative of that quality of mind and heart which is motivated by a singleness of purpose noble in origin and directed to noble ends.

Perhaps the strongest evidence of singleness of mind is evidenced in his refusal to use his power and position after the war for personal gain or glory. . . .

When in 1789 the government began under the constitution formulated at Philadelphia, Washington showed the usual unselfish interest in his country's welfare by calling Jefferson a strong opponent to the highest position in the cabinet, his aim being to enlist on the side of the new government the ablest men of the country regardless of their approval or disapproval of the precise form of the constitution. One regrets that an opposition so embittered and inconsiderate of the great services rendered by the first chief-magistrate should have acted later in the spirit they did.

One other point we shall mention. In contrast to the violence shown on either side, Washington advised his countrymen above all to be "Americans." This he considered to be essential to the overcoming of local differences and provincialisms. Also, his insistence that America should stand aloof from the conflicts of Europe, thus inaugurating a policy of neutrality which has remained the policy of the country until the present was what he felt necessary to the working out of the ideals he held as most effective for the best interests of his land. His policies were dictated by his judgments of what would further the advancement of the colonies in freedom and fullness of their possible life.

(2) The qualities of character manifested in his life of devotion to his country's interests are of the nature to be expected from one of the ancestral tree and of the life experiences of Washington. He possessed remarkable powers as a strategist and tactician but it was as a leader of men that he stands pre-eminent. There seems to have been something in his bearing and presence to inspire confidence. He also possessed the happy faculty of always rising to the dignity of the occasion without ever going beyond what the occasion required. That is the estimate given by biographers. The position he occupied indicates the truth of the estimate.

Leadership implies many qualities, not least of which is humility and consciousness of the call of duty as imperative. Is there better expression of these in the life of our hero than in his words when Commander-in-Chief of the Continental Army, "As the Congress desire it, I will enter upon the momentous duty and exert every power I possess in the service and for support of the glorious cause. . . . But lest some unlucky event should happen unfavourable to my reputation. I beg it may be remembered by every gentleman in the room, that I this day declare with the utmost sincerity I do not think myself equal to the command I am honored with." One who speaks thus is fitted to command and will inevitably win the allegiance of those under him.

That he was able to maintain the morale of his army which, due to short enlistments and scarcity of food was always crumbling to pieces, proves his persistence, patience, and poise.

It might be said that he bore himself as a person of culture, courtesy, and sympathetic understanding. He was appreciative of the greatness of the charge committed to him, but his greatness showed itself in his sense of dependence of a power beyond himself and his comradeship with men in a cause he made them feel was theirs. Firmness marked his actions and commands. But what he demanded of others was only what he was willing to give himself. By nature, practice, and conviction he was a nobleman in the true sense of that word.

(3) The spiritual quality of Washington's life is evidenced in its general character but particularly in the expressions of religious sentiments which spring as flowers out of fertile soil. Religion is not a department of life. It is the spirit which motives life and expresses itself in the whole being of the individual. Yet it is particular in one respect. Its essence is faith in God and devotion of life to the purpose of God. The inner springs of life are fed from eternal fountains; deep calleth unto deep, God and His creature meet in fellowship. Such fellowship results in a certain quality of life that gives enrichment to all that is done and said, to the whole bearing. One feels this was so in the life of George Washington.

He had a keen consciousness of God as the Divine Sovereign who disposed all events to the accomplishment of His all-wise purposes. Repeatedly Washington gave orders to his army to give thanks to God as One who supported a righteous cause. Success had been given which could not be ascribed to anything other than the mercy and good-will of the Almighty God. "No people can be bound to acknowledge and adore the invisible hand, which conducts the affairs of men, more than the people of the United States. Every step, by which they have advanced to the character of an independent nation, seems to have been distinguished by some token of providential agency." Such were the words of Washington as he reviewed the ways by which his countrymen had been led. The hope of the future of the nation was bound up with the sense of dependence upon the goodness of God and the reverent piety of the people. . . .

What Consul Fuller described as the "principal event" of the Bicentennial in Kingston was a "reception and entertainment" given by the American Women's Club of Kingston on the evening of February 22. Of the occasion, THE WHIG-STANDARD of February 23, 1932, said:

The Bicentennial of the Birth of George Washington, leader of the Revolutionary forces of the American war for independence and First President of the United States, was most auspiciously marked on Monday evening by a reception and program arranged by the American Women's Club at Kingston at the Hotel La Salle.

The American Consul informed the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission that "the club is composed mainly of American women married to Canadians who did not feel at the time as though they could ask their husbands for money to celebrate the birth of the 'rebel' against whom their ancestors fought. Some felt that Canadians would not accept the invitation, but the local press supported the idea and the entertainment was successful in every way. The large hall was crowded and many had to be refused invitations." Most of the city and local governmental officials were present, including the mayor, the commandant of the Royal Military College, and many of the faculty of the college and of Queen's University, Consul General Frost of Montreal, and Professor R. G. Trotter, who holds the chair of American history at Queen's University and who was the guest speaker. Mrs. Hugh Macpherson, President of the American Women's Club of Kingston, welcomed the guests, and stated that the majority of members of the organization were married to Canadians and were most happy to have their husbands and many citizens of Kingston join them in celebrating the Bicentennial of the Birth of George Washington.

Consul General Frost was introduced to the audience by Major Fuller who spoke in a happy vein, stressing the cordial relations existing between Canada and the United States. He exploded the legend that George Washington had once been in Kingston, saying that although Washington undoubtedly started for Kingston, then Fort Frontenac, on several occasions fate had always intervened and he had never actually reached the city. Major Fuller cited an excerpt from the autobiography of Benjamin Franklin recording a conversation with General Braddock in which the latter stated that after the capture of Fort Duquesne he planned to take Niagara and then Frontenac. In other words, Washington should have visited the city when he departed on the disastrous Braddock campaign. Kingston also entered Washington's prospective military itinerary when he led Virginia troops against Fort Duquesne under General Forbes, but in that campaign Kingston was captured by Colonel Bradstreet.

The American Consul General touched upon international relationships that brought Canadians and Americans close together and compared the ties of their friendliness to "ties that lay like silken scarfs and not like iron shackles." The text of Consul General Frost's address in part follows:

You must let me express my pleasure at visiting Kingston, a city so widely recognized as one of the primary foci of Canadian life. You have here a great university developing Canadian patriotism and a great military school developing means for its protection. You cherish especially, moreover, the British standards which are at the foundation of so much that is best in our great North American civilization.

The Bicentenary of the birth of George Washington is a peculiarly apt occasion for dwelling upon these ideals in common; for Washington is legitimately claimed by both peoples as an exemplar of the qualities they prize. He was unquestionably a typical Briton in race, formation, and associations; and yet was a Briton who could have been produced nowhere but in America. He was a British subject during two-thirds of his lifetime; and yet he was the first great American citizen. In honoring his memory we may unite in a common pride. It is a unique moment—a moment of privilege.

In the perspective of history we can see now that the American Revolution was in reality one of a series of civil wars between Englishmen, most of which took place in the home country itself. They began back in the reign of Henry the Eighth, according to the historians of the delightful "Mr. Punch." "King Henry forced all the monks to give up their property and take wives; this was called 'The Dissolution of the Monasteries.'" It was followed by chronic conflicts over religious and political freedom. Both the dissenters and the royalists showed the fierce earnestness of their breed, taking lives and confiscating property quite impenitently. Finally, however, on one occasion when a renewal of the struggle was about to break out in England it was forestalled by an outbreak which occurred, for once, in the English overseas domains. The dissenters turned out to have a majority, and by showing typical British pertinacity they managed to "muddle through" (with abundant outside help), in a fashion which may also be not without some resemblance to British methods. The conflict, as President Hoover has hinted, would have constituted just one more passage in the evolution of English freedom had its venue not been shifted to a geographically separate region. The unsuccessful party was badly treated, too, according to the American historians whose works I have had the curiosity to consult (Fiske and Channing), and Americans can comfort themselves only with the reflection that the treatment was possibly somewhat similar to that received by previous losers in the purely English episodes of the same conflict.

The situation of the winners, as we know, was itself parlous, as Fiske points out in his "Critical Period." Public and private business was at a standstill, and credit was completely demoralized, while poverty and jealousy threatened incessantly to bring utter chaos. The influence of Washington at this time, his British equability and fortitude, and the prestige of his name and fame as a rallying point, although he held no title, certainly contributed enormously to save the day.

The evolution of democracy thereafter proceeded both in the mother country and in America along lines whose similarity need not surprise us when we consider that the United States remained a purely British-race country for another 60 or 75 years. The English in England progressed steadily along the path of liberalism, until today they assert with pride that their institutions provide as great freedom as any in the world. The American English had also a heavy task in the application of democratic principles to the slave trade on the one hand and to its conciliation with a strong central government on the other. The successes of both branches of the Anglo-Saxon race, under widely divergent conditions, were successes for principles originally conceived in England.

The United States was not destined, under Providence, to remain wholly British in its racial stock; but the extent to which it has lost its exclusively British character is often exaggerated. According to the most recent official data and computations, 55 per cent of the people are of British origin, almost identically the same percentage as in Canada. Over 27 per cent of the Americans, in addition, are of Nordic and Germanic origin; and this just matches the 28 per cent of French-Canadian stock in the Dominion. The latter would be gratuitous for me to praise; but regarding our American Nordic population of non-British origin I may be permitted to express the view that it is fully equal to any in our country. The grandparents of many of these people came forth purely in quest of modern liberty from the autocratic Germany of the middle Nineteenth Century. Both they and our other Nordic arrivals are of identically the same stock as that which was originally blended to create the English race.

In addition to the 80 per cent of our population composed of British and Nordic elements, there remains 20 per cent composed of equal parts of American Negroes and of eastern and southern European stock. The Negroes are well adapted for our southern climate; and the Mediterranean and Slavic types furnish a dash of seasoning which our phlegmatic race, we hope, can well utilize. The diversity of climates in the United States and Canada really calls for a diversity of races; and also for an endosmosis between the two countries. Without believing that the southerners will evolve into subtropical indolence or the Canadians into hyperborean morbidity, we can still feel that each needs racial interpenetration with the other.

The principal address of the evening was delivered by Professor Trotter of Queen's University. Under the title, "Washington and the English-speaking heritage," Professor Trotter discussed the value of the American war for independence in furthering Canadian democracy. The paper was given unusual distinction of being published in the Queen's quarterly or THE YALE REVIEW from which an offprint was struck and given wide circulation. We quote the address in full:

George Washington's career was a vindication of the principles of independence and political liberty which are cherished today by the citizens of the British Commonwealth as well as by the inhabitants of the American Republic. Some of us may wish now and then that Washington had vindicated these principles by a method less drastic than the dismemberment of the old British Empire, the political bisection of the English-speaking world, but there is much to be said for the view that in the eighteenth century the obstacles in the way were insurmountable by any other course than that which he pursued, the violent path of revolution. Moreover, independence as a principle of liberty was thus brought to the attention of mankind in an intense and dramatic fashion. The famous shot heard round the world certainly created more stir in the chancelleries of Europe and among the masses of mankind than seems likely to be produced by the recent passage of the Statute of Westminster, famous as that document has already become.

The Statute of Westminster came as the culmination of a long process of imperial evolution in which the essentials of independence had been already gradually secured by the Dominions step by step through more than three-quarters of a century; indeed the statute marked little more than the legal recognition of an accomplished fact. Nevertheless, the formal laying aside of all claim to paramount authority over the Dominions makes this time peculiarly appropriate for Canadians, and for all British subjects, to join in celebrating the memory of Washington as a vindicator of the principle of independence for British peoples overseas.

It does not need to be said that our independence, only so recently full grown, is not in all respects just like this. The Dominions wear their independence with a difference. Canadian allegiance does not supersede or replace the imperial allegiance, but, however paradoxical it may be, the two exist side by side. Canadians still keep, and were never more determined than now to preserve, their imperial connection, with the common life and common loyalties and political cooperation that it involves.

Yet the whole English-speaking world also has in a unique sense a common life, common purposes, and common ideals. Among its political ideals none is more prominent or more characteristic than this of national independence or, to use Wilson's better term, self-determination. It need not nullify or preclude cooperation—we are all pulling together in many common purposes as never before; but it does abjure all subordination of one nation to the paramount imperial power of another. The fact that full acceptance of the ideal was reached in the Republic and in the Commonwealth in different centuries and by diverse roads is of less significance than that today it is a vital and ruling principle in both.

Had the old empire and the new been established simultaneously, they might have found identical independent or national status by similar methods and in the same period of history. But different times breed different manners. The century and a half from the founding of Jamestown and the wintry landing of the Pilgrims to the Declaration of Independence was very different from the later century and a half extending to the Statute of Westminster from the migration of the Loyalists to Canada and the sailing of the first transport into Botany Bay. The problem of national self-determination for growing colonial communities had to be solved, if solved at all, under very different conditions in the days of the old empire and in those of the new. The question is not infrequently raised as to whether a grant of dominion status as we know it today would have harmonized the imperial discords in the eighteenth century. It might. On the other hand dominion status could hardly have come today, had not many circumstances changed fundamentally in the meantime.

On the eve of the troubles out of which the Revolution grew, the old colonies, with two million free inhabitants, were no longer merely transplanted communities of Europeans, an overseas fragment of the British nation. They were developing a character of their own, something very close to a national consciousness. The representative institutions which from the beginning had played so large a part in their political life had nourished that native spirit of independence inherited in strong measure from their immigrant ancestors and strengthened by recent arrivals. For it must be remembered that the old colonies were populated mainly by settlers who came to the new world to escape conditions in the old which had proved for them too hard, or at any rate too unsatisfactory, to be borne any longer. They largely represented the extremes of dissent against old world authority. A century and a half of life under new world conditions had given to their society a distinctive character, and of this potent fact they were becoming increasingly aware. They had, however, during most of their history, been kept alive to the value, indeed the necessity, of British protection by sea and help by land against the rival empire of the French in North America. Thus a growing spirit of independence was counterbalanced by a consciousness of dependence, and, while the imperial connection sometimes chafed, it was obvious that to cut it would be far from practical politics.

And then, rather suddenly, the situation underwent radical change. The British conquest of Canada removed the backdoor menace of French rivalry. In their new sense of security the English colonies could afford to be impatient of irksome restraints. As fate would have it, the imperial government, blind to the fact that these overseas English communities were now bound to demand larger liberties appropriate to their larger life and their lessened dependence upon England's strong right arm, chose this time for an attempt to enlarge the imperial supervision and control of American life, to limit western expansion by confining the frontiers of settlement, and to encroach upon the traditional monopoly which the colonial legislatures had enjoyed of imposing taxation for revenue purposes. This royal and parliamentary policy envisaged no eventual enlargement of self-government, no national status to be attained in future; its measures of coercive control were not defended as transitional safeguards; imperial authority was to be permanently enlarged and its effectiveness increased.

Thus the stage was set for a straight clash over the issue as to whether one English nation was to be held subject to another. Despite Edmund Burke's assertion that an Englishman was "the unfittest person on earth to argue another Englishman into slavery," the general trend of colonial theory in the eighteenth century and the oligarchical character of English government at home were by no means favorable to the American position. George III and his government of King's Friends were in accord with the ruling spirit of their day and generation when they chose the blind path of coercion. Under the circumstances, if the national spirit of the colonial population was to find adequate opportunity for its political expression, resistance to this coercion was the only course left open for what we may call the national party in the colonies.

Despite all the ramifications of the lawyers' arguments on both sides of the controversy, and all the blurring fog which war-time emotions flung around it, the essential issue remained clear cut in the view of the indubitably great leader to whom his revolutionary countrymen entrusted their cause. He held his followers together with heroic tenacity, till success brought assistance that made possible the conclusive climax at Yorktown. Then was fulfilled the word that Burke had uttered in Parliament, more than a year before the Declaration of Independence: "We cannot, I fear, falsify the pedigree of this fierce people, and persuade them that they are not sprung from a nation in whose veins the blood of freedom circulates."

George Washington is one of the best examples history affords of the Englishman carrying his English principles into execution far from England. For though born and bred in Virginia, he had the virtues if not the defects of an English gentleman. One may not agree entirely with his politics, one may even feel that some at least of the angels were on the side of his opponents the Loyalists, and yet one cannot but admire wholeheartedly the determined quality of his stand for liberty as he conceived it, his championship of the cause of independence against such an imperial domination as Canada would not endure today.

But what of the new empire, which, as we look back over the brief generations since the Revolution, seems to have risen phoenix-like from the embers of the old? It was, in fact, three-quarters of a century before any of its communities reached, in numbers of population or in economic development and social culture, a stage comparable with that of the old colonies on the eve of their independence. For that reason, if for no other, the growth of distinct national sentiments in its far-flung communities, the blossoming thus of the English spirit of independence, was likely to be slow, as indeed it was. But more than that is to be said in comparing the old empire in its maturity with the new empire in its youth. In the latter there persisted a strong sense of dependence on British support and protection. In Canada, Loyalists and French alike remained thoroughly awake to the reality of their dependence upon the British connection, if they were to maintain their no less cherished independence of the expanding republican neighbour on their south, while the French further came to fear that without Britain's guarantee of their peculiar position and minority rights they would be given short shrift by their English-speaking fellow-Canadians. In still younger colonies, such as those in Australia and New Zealand, isolated and remote on the far side of the colored continents, the sense of dependence was no less strong, however different might be some of its causes.

No doubt the prolonged immaturity and the conscious dependence of the colonies of the new empire upon imperial support largely accounted for the fact that many years went by before very serious friction developed over the existing colonial system, which was essentially a perpetuation of the old, for while the North American colonies enjoyed representative government such as had existed in the old colonies prior to the Revolution, this marked the extent of their participation in government. This much they had early demanded, but they neither received nor for some time expected any more. Imperial control was not relaxed in the years following the Revolution. It is true that the short-lived and disastrous experiment of levying taxation to raise imperial revenue was not again attempted, but the mother country's supervision of colonial life was made more effective than before. The immediate lesson drawn from the loss of the old empire was that the new must not be allowed to get out of hand as the old had done. Before long the influence of the French Revolution further aroused the forces of reaction in England, breeding a distrust of the doctrine of popular rights whether in the colonies or at home in Britain.

But the conservative reaction from the two Revolutions could not last forever. In the long run the influence of democratic ideas from across the Atlantic and from across the Channel so strengthened the native English movement for reform that just a century ago the first of the great Parliamentary Reform Acts started Britain on the road to the democratization of her government. By that time, in the overseas colonies, particularly in the rapidly maturing provinces of British North America, in which democratic and national sentiment were constantly and variously stimulated by the near neighborhood of the United States, restlessness was becoming acute in the face of the imperial restraints and the local privileges that were involved in the continuance of the old colonial system.

The Canadian rebellions, as outbreaks of radical minorities, called sharp attention to the critical nature of the problem, but they could not become revolutions, for the majority of the colonials were restrained from supporting violent radicalism by their old traditions of imperial loyalty and their feeling that they still needed the British connection. Revolution was by no means necessary to secure the essence of that which was desired, nor was it believed to be so by most of the colonial reformers. When Robert Baldwin, son of an Irish immigrant to Upper Canada, and Joseph Howe, son of a Nova Scotia Loyalist, sought the extension of the liberal principles of the British constitution to their respective provinces, they pled for it as a means of preserving the connection, which they believed would only be imperilled by continuing the irritations of the old system. Their arguments were not at once accepted as conclusive nor their prayers immediately granted, but they were not spurned. Durham gave them his whole-hearted backing. In the course of another decade of controversy, discussion, and experiment, not without a good deal of mistrust on the part of many and of opposition from various privileged quarters, some of which were colonial, the political leaders of Britain and the colonies felt their way through to the practical realization of colonial autonomy in the form of responsible government.

It is difficult to imagine the solution being found so quickly or so satisfactorily, if the influence of the Crown and the powers of the old aristocratic oligarchy in the mother country had been still what they were three-quarters of a century earlier, when they called forth the American Declaration of Independence. Democratic progress in Britain goes far to explain the different solution of the later crisis. But that is not by any means the whole explanation. Profound changes had recently taken place in British opinion concerning the advantages of imperial control and the justification of its costs and its inconveniences. Commerce with the United States was as profitable as it could ever have been if they had remained in political subjection. What advantage then in retaining control, or even possession, of the newer colonies? The American vindication of independence was now taken as conclusive evidence that in similar colonies self-government could not permanently be withheld. Some therefore argued that the colonies which had now begun to make trouble might as well be cut loose first as last. Or, if they must go, they had best be advanced towards self-government as speedily as possible, in order that they might be dismissed with a blessing, ready to look after themselves and carrying into future relations with their parent state the maximum of goodwill. Others, with faith that the empire might be held together, argued that it could only be done by the paradox of reconciling colonial autonomy with imperial unity, that the colonies could only be retained by giving them within the empire the essentials of that independence which otherwise, being unwilling to forswear their English birthright of liberty, they would insist upon seeking by the path of secession. It is obvious that all these views promoted English readiness to admit colonial self-government. And it is most noteworthy that all of them found chief support in arguments based upon the history of those old colonies which were now the United States.

The growth of self-government in the widely scattered territories of the British Empire, during the next three-quarters of a century, was implicit in the initial acceptance of the principle of responsible government in these British North American provinces in the 1840's. It is true that the rapidity of its extension to other colonies varied with circumstances. It is also true that the enlargement of its scope to include wider and wider ranges of government, until today international as well as internal matters are controlled by each Dominion, has only just been carried to completion. Yet throughout the three-quarters of a century, this development has pretty well kept pace with the growth of each community towards maturity and the progress of the democratic movement alike in mother country and in colonies. That the Dominions have reached the goal of national self-government without the necessity of seceding from the imperial commonwealth is due in considerable measure to the example of the United States. In that sense Washington's achievement in dismembering the old empire for the sake of the principle of national independence may justly be looked upon as a corner stone of the new empire within whose bounds that same principle now rules.

Despite the fact that we live in a world which is rapidly being driven to a realization of the essential unity of its life and interests and welfare, and indeed in some measure because of this very fact, there is everywhere a growing recognition of the importance of satisfying national aspirations. Without the self-respect and confidence, the vigour and initiative, that a pride of national independence makes possible and indeed insures, the currents of social progress are troubled and their streams are wasted in the deserts of self-distrust and futility. Only the man who can hold his head high as the citizen of a free state is capable of his best endeavors, and only such a citizen is worthy to aspire to world-citizenship. We are in dire need of a genuine world order, but it must be one that will preserve and not crush human freedom. That can not be built on the practices of old-fashioned imperialism but only on principles of free cooperation. Its foundations must be deep laid in ideals of independence and liberty alike for nations and for the men and women who comprise them. For such ideals George Washington strove; to such ideals the nations of the British Commonwealth have pledged their faith; and in such ideals they base their hopes of the future for themselves, for their common empire and for the world.

Following the speech-making a very delightful little play, "Yesteryear and Today," written especially for the occasion by Mrs. Hugh Macpherson was produced by Mrs. John G. Goodfellow and associates. The first scene of this play was laid in the drawing room of the home of John Phillip Walker, Sr., during the days immediately preceding the American Revolution. The setting of the play was typically Colonial and the characters were picturesque in their 18th century costumes. The second scene depicted a dressing room of a skating rink in Kingston. A West Point cadet and an R. M. C. cadet conversed together, and discovered that they are cousins, Nathaniel Walker having emigrated to Canada with the United Empire Loyalists as the Loyalist ancestor of the R. M. C. cadet while the West Point soldier was a descendant of John Phillip Walker who remained in the United States. The burden of the play was to demonstrate the intimacy of family relationship between Canada and the United States and to reveal the bad effects of carrying grudges from bygone Colonial days. During the play 18th century music, including "The Bud of the Rose," "The Toast," and "The Kiss of Heaven," was delightfully rendered and two minuets were gracefully danced by members of the club. Reviewing the play, Consul Fuller said:

"The cast worked hard realizing there would be a tendency to criticize this 'American show' and the result was a perfect performance without a single prompt."

THE KINGSTON PRESS published numerous announcements of the celebration and gave an account thereof more than three columns in length. In his letter regarding this event, Consul Fuller said:

A careful investigation has disclosed that all comments on this and other Bicentennial events were laudatory. So far as this district is concerned, there is no doubt of the beneficial results from the anniversary celebration sponsored by your Commission.

Outlining the Bicentennial activities of various fraternal organizations in Kingston, Consul Fuller reported:

The service clubs cooperated during the week in honoring the memory of Washington. On February 22 the Kiwanis Club invited me to attend, drank a toast to Washington and to the United States, saluted the American flag, and sang our national anthem. On the same day the Rotary Club of Belleville held a luncheon devoted to the memory of Washington and as guest speaker I used much of the material furnished by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission and referred in particular to Washington's attitude toward Canada and his various attempts to visit this locality. On February 18 the Kingston Rotary Club had a one-minute silence in Washington's memory, passed a resolution of commemoration and friendship, and ordered a copy sent to this Consulate. On February 28 they devoted the meeting to Washington's memory and I gave an address similar to the one I had given at Belleville.

The Consul submitted the following resume of the addresses given before the above mentioned organizations:

I introduced my remarks that I would briefly review the character of Washington and his place in history between our two countries and then proceeded with the following notes:

Most of the colonists had paid their own expenses to the new world and established settlements without aid. European nations had, until the 18th Century, considered colonies only as sources of raw material and consumers of manufactured goods. After the Seven Years' War a new idea of empire arose in Europe, and a feeling that colonies existed for the benefit of the mother country. The British cabinet introduced new measures of control and taxation which were resented. English elections resulted in a non-representative Parliament completely under control of a ministry, which alienated the loyal colonial merchants, bankers, and shippers by the tea monopoly, and so mishandled the resulting irritation that the other colonies joined Massachusetts in opposition. The better element remained loyal and only one-third of the 3,000,000 inhabitants desired separation. Only 25,000 migrated to Canada, although many of these were of the better class. Communications were such that these distant colonies could not be closely governed from London. If the colonies were to avoid economic ruin, they had to fight to retain the political liberties they had always enjoyed.

The success of the Revolution can mainly be ascribed to the character of George Washington, whose appearance, family, characteristics, and history were briefly reviewed. When he accompanied Braddock it was their intention to advance by Niagara and seize Kingston, then Frontenac. When Fort Duquesne was later occupied by Washington a battle was avoided because the chain of French forts had already been broken by the capture of Kingston by Bradstreet. Washington planned to proceed up the St. Lawrence after he was President but never approached the Canadian border nearer than Lake Champlain and the Mohawk Valley. The confidence he inspired, even among his enemies, was illustrated by a letter Sir Archibald Macdonnell quoted to me. Sir Archibald's great-great-grandmother wrote that the Loyalists had suffered greatly in New York State under General Schuyler, but that General Washington was now approaching and every one realized that he would correct the abuses. The lack of responsible government and credit after the war was described, and the local conditions which lead to occasional mistreatment of the loyalists. Washington's work in stabilizing the government and bringing law and order was mentioned.

Various historians were quoted to show the result of the American Revolution on the development of Canadian independence. Democracy had spread to Europe, English reforms were effected, and it was easy for Canada to develop democracy under a democratic England. The development of transportation and communications made it possible for Canada to grow within the Empire. Other causes which kept Canada from following the same historic development as the United States, were the presence of the French in Quebec, who preferred to be governed by London, and the fact that English settlements were made by those persons who had been most loyal to the King.

Under the caption, "Washington Taken Down From Pedestal," THE KINGSTON WHIG-STANDARD reviewed Major Fuller's Rotary and Kiwanis Club remarks, making these observations:

General George Washington, first president of the United States, leader of the ragged armies of the revolution which began in a so-called "tea-party" in Boston harbor and ended in a motley collection of thirteen states, all hating one another, and only asking to be left alone to work out each their own narrow destiny, is a character of history remembered in Canada more for the cherry tree-hatchet story than for anything else. After having been deified by writers for years, most of the bunk about Washington is being debunked now by modern writers, who reveal him as a real man, heroic if you like, but neither godlike nor puritanical.

Two hundred years ago George Washington was born, and born British in a British colony. His folks were "quality" in England and sure were "quality folks" in "ole Virginia."

Having provided a fitting Uncle Sam atmosphere from Boston baked beans to Valley Forge mushrooms and a large Star Spangled Banner behind the speaker, Major Fuller had no difficulty presenting General George Washington in a very attractive manner, although he did cast some doubt on the tale of the hatchet and cherry tree episode, and the truth of the theory held in some quarters that George Washington was the first and only American who couldn't tell a lie.

As an after-dinner speaker Major Fuller is in a class by himself, no spread-eagleism but a quiet, dry humor which kept his hearers chuckling as he moved quietly from one phase of Washington's life to another, incidentally stripping the statuesque Washington of early writers and painters and presenting him as a human being, a real he-man, possessed of all the virtues and some of the vices of his day and generation. Washington was presented by the speaker as a great military leader and statesman—without him the war of the revolution would have been lost, and he served without pay as well as pledging his considerable fortune to pay his soldiers.

Events leading up to the Revolution were described by the speaker, the friction in England between King George and his parliament, the delay of months in sailing ships' communications across the sea which aggravated discontent, the Boston "tea-party" and the drastic retaliation measures adopted by King George, the dictator. Armed force met with armed force and the result a few battles, a lot of waitful watching, and finally thirteen independent colonies, all hating each other, and no central government—virtual chaos, which the first president, George Washington, had to dissipate and lay a foundation for a new nation one and indivisible.

Washington did not fight to gain freedom, said the speaker, but to retain the freedom the colonies always had. They had to fight their own way and conquer the wilderness, savage tribes and savage beasts, without the aid of the Mother Country, and when it came to be a matter of taxation without representation, then more taxation, they just couldn't see it. In addition they were told by the British government where they could trade and where they could not—their best markets in the West Indies were taken away from them and they were told they could sell only in the English market. Then the East India Company which had fallen upon parlous times was given the monopoly of the tea business for America, and that together with the tea tax and other taxation and vexations caused hard feelings. Then the "colossal blunder" of King George in sending armed forces in retaliation for the Boston "tea-party," the closing of the port and occupation of Boston by British military forces ignited the torch of war and the colonies took time from their farms to make armed resistance. Three months' enlistment was all that was practicable, as the soldiers must get back to the farms, and at no time in this rather comic-opera war was there more than eighteen thousand soldiers engaged at one time. Thus was the story of George Washington, told by the guest speaker in a very interesting manner, interspersed with droll stories and sidelights upon current affairs and events of the time and the effect upon Canada and subsequent British history and the relation between the two countries. Major Fuller handled his subject in a way which met instant favor, and he will always be welcome at Belleville Rotary board either as a speaker or as a silent guest, for he has a personality which attracts and a fund of real humor and interesting anecdotes gathered in his far-flung experience in many countries as the representative of Uncle Sam's Consular Service.

The Bicentennial in Kingston concluded on Thanksgiving Day in the same spirit of good will that marked its auspicious opening. The American Consul was able to report in a dispatch to the Department of State that the George Washington celebration "which was approached last winter with considerable misgivings" had a "happy ending." This dispatch which follows gives an impressive description of the concluding event:

KINGSTON, ONTARIO, CANADA.
NOVEMBER 25, 1932.

THANKSGIVING DAY TERMINATES BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION

I have the honor to report, for the information of the Washington Bicentennial Commission, that the conclusion of the Bicentennial was appropriately observed on Thanksgiving Day, November 24.

The American Women's Club, encouraged by the success of their first public effort on February 22, gave a dinner in the banquet hall of the Hotel La Salle to which not only members, but their relatives and friends, were invited. Officials were not included, as it was the intention to keep it in the nature of a family party. Many American students of Queen's University attended, the first time they had joined in any of the Club's activities.

Speeches were omitted in order to make the evening as informal as possible, but I was asked to read the President's proclamation before dinner and to give a short address after. I took the occasion to compliment the Club and the city upon their unique observance of Washington's birth, and presented to the Club a copy of Washington's portrait which had been received from the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission and appropriately framed. The rest of the evening was spent in games and dancing.

This family Thanksgiving Day party, like the Washington's Birthday party, was distinctly American and more original than most entertainments in Kingston. According to reports from all quarters, it was for this reason most successful, and provided an informal and happy ending to the celebration which was approached last winter with considerable misgivings. The Club desires to have me express its appreciation of the assistance rendered by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission in furnishing such original and extensive material for its commemorative exercises.

Respectfully yours,

GEORGE G. FULLER,
American Consul.

In his address to the dinner guests Consul Fuller adequately summed up the far-reaching effects of the celebration in Kingston and "in appreciation of the interest shown by the loyal city of Kingston" and by the American Women's Club in the celebration presented the latter with a reproduction of the Athenaeum portrait of George Washington by Gilbert Stuart, furnished by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. The Consul spoke as follows:

I want to take this opportunity of congratulating the American Women's Club on their splendid and unusual celebration of Washington's birthday. The fact that so many Union Empire Loyalists joined in that celebration shows the broad vision of this city. It has spread the fame of Kingston to an extent that surprised me. Consul General Frost, who was your guest at that time, after his return to Montreal, extended his congratulations on the good feeling which had been so much in evidence. Representative Bloom, Director of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, wrote that his commission was particularly pleased on hearing of the celebration, and added "it is indeed gratifying to know that in honoring the memory of our First President, we have formed a link not only between his time and ours, but between another Great Nation and the United States." Later he wrote, "We are able to compile and publish a commemorative volume on the Bicentennial as it was observed in other countries and you may be sure that the events in Kingston will have an honored place therein."

The Washington Birthday Party given by your Club seems to have attracted more attention than the reports I have labored on this year. When I visited the Department of State in the spring, it was the first subject mentioned, not only in the Canadian section and administrative division, but in such strange places as the visa office, and that of the Economic Adviser. And it has not been forgotten. Last Saturday the Protocol Officer dashed in from his office in the White House where he arranges ceremonial functions for the President, and his first words were in effect, "Hello Fuller, how is Kingston? That was a great party they gave on Washington's birthday."

Today marks the end of the Bicentennial Celebration which has been unique in that it was not confined to one place, but was celebrated in practically every church, school, and lodge in the United States and in most countries of the World. No other national hero has been honored in a celebration so widespread. Throughout the British Empire these celebrations were particularly extensive, because it is now realized that Washington was an Englishman, and that his part in the liberation of the Colonies was of distinct value to the development of the present democratic Governments of England and the Dominions.

There has just been published a result of some research into the origin of the Washington family, which is so closely linked with English history that a few words will be of interest to this audience.

The name "Washington" was that of a small village in Durham county, still so-called. In early Norman times the Manor of Washington, or Wessington, was in possession of William de Washington, the earliest member of the family to have taken this name. The Washington family later settled in Yorkshire, where the name was frequently written WESSINGTON. From Yorkshire, the Washingtons went to Westmoreland, where Robert D. Washington was the Lord of Milburn during the reign of Edward I. One son, John Washington, was the first to settle in Warton, in Lonsdale, northern Lancashire. The family flourished there during the 14th and 15th centuries. John Washington's grandson, Robert Washington, caused the square tower of Warton Church to be built about 1470, which is still standing. Only a few years ago part of the pebbles and lime fell from the tower and revealed the long-lost Washington shield, together with the initials "R. W. S.," which stand for Robert Washington and his wife.

Robert's son, John, married a sister of Sir Thomas Kytson, of Warton Hall, who was sheriff of London in 1533 and who built Hengrave Hall in Suffolk. In the great banqueting hall nine stained-glass windows still exist, emblazoned with the arms of the noble families allied by marriage to the Kytsons, the last of these being that of the Washingtons.

John's son, Lawrence Washington, married in the powerful Spencer family and was twice Mayor of Northampton. In 1539 he came into possession of Sulgrave Manor. One son became Sir John Washington, of Thrapston, and a younger son became Rector of Purleigh. It was the two sons of the Rector, the nephews of Sir John Washington, who emigrated to the United States.

We will all be dead by the time another centenary of Washington's birth arrives but, in order to leave a permanent record of this celebration, the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission has caused a valuable reproduction to be made of the Athenaeum Portrait of George Washington by Gilbert Stuart. This has been done by a special process and, mounted on canvas, it resembles the original in the Boston Museum of Fine Arts. One copy is in the White House, another in the entrance hall of the Department of State. In appreciation of the interest shown by the loyal city of Kingston in commemorating the birth of a great Englishman, and of the work of this Club in commemorating his memory, I have the pleasure of presenting to the American Women's Club that reproduction of the portrait of the First American.

More than 750 American citizens live in the jurisdiction of the American Consulate in North Bay, Ontario, Canada, but, as Consul William E. Chapman reported to the Bicentennial Commission, "they are too widely scattered to permit them to organize worth while commemorative celebrations," and therefore could not convene for Washington ceremonies.

How to convey to these scattered children of the land of Washington and their Canadian friends the message of the Bicentennial was the problem to work its own solution, as many consuls would have done, but exercising his originality conceived the idea that he could reach them all by radio and set about obtaining broadcasting facilities.

He consulted the owners of Station CFCH, North Bay's enterprising broadcasting studio, and they gladly volunteered the free use of their station for Consul Chapman's purposes on the 200th anniversary of the birth of George Washington. The Consul framed his address in part from material sent to him from the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission and with Alderman Roy H. Thompson as his patron, went on the air at 7.30 p. m., February 22, 1932. This is what Canadians and Americans within the wave length of the station heard him say:

Good Evening my Fellow Countrymen and My Good Canadian Friends: I refer to my Canadian friends because such a wide circle among you have done and are doing so much together with the Americans of my District to make life most agreeable to Mrs. Chapman and me in North Bay.

Right here we have an example of Canadian kindness, courtesy, and generosity in the invitation of Mr. Roy H. Thompson, owner of this radio station, to use it for this broadcast.

We appreciate most gratefully the kindness of the good people of this fair city. I feel I should not let pass this opportunity to say this and to add that it is an honor as well as a privilege and a pleasure to be living among you.

My reference to Canadians includes in full measure also our friends of British birth. Among all of the many expressions I received today of respect for George Washington none was more eulogistic or more appreciated than that of Mr. Daniel South who was born in England and who resides in North Bay. Although we never met he called me by telephone to express that respect in a manner which made me know it came from a sincere heart. He stated that he would be listening to this talk, and I want to say to him that the spirit envisaged in his conversation is the kind that constitutes the firm foundation of understanding, friendship, and peace that happily has so long prevailed among the English-speaking peoples.

While what I am about to say concerns a great celebration that is now taking place in the United States of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, the first President of the Nation I have the honor to represent officially in your good city, I trust you will find it of sufficient interest to justify my response to the kindness of Mr. Thompson.

History is interesting to every one. Eagerly we peruse its pages to increase our knowledge of the works of men from Adam down through the ages. It is man who makes history and it has been truly said that every great achievement is the lengthening shadow of some real man.

From every worthy human act arises by natural psychological impulse a keen interest in the man or men who performed it. The conquests and defeats of Alexander the Great and of Napoleon, the rise and fall of the Roman Empire, the conquests of Cortez in Mexico and Bolivar South America are events of absorbing interest.

The achievements of great men and great women become the more forcefully immortalized also because the world finds enjoyment and satisfaction in perpetuating the names of those responsible, as well as their ideals. In a word we are all given to venerable respect for true heroes and lasting human deeds in the interest of the peace and welfare of mankind, and from this attitude we reap the rich reward of the inspirational uplifting appeal to mind and heart.

Canadians and Americans alike are particularly proud of the century of unquestioned peace and cordial harmony between the two countries. In all my extensive travels I have found no international boundary lines which seemed to me to so nearly imaginary only as that between Canada and the United States. It is a great blessing to the peoples of both countries that it is so. It would be a great blessing to the world if all nations could use it as an example.

It is most fitting indeed that there is soon to be established on the border between the United States and Canada an international peace garden to commemorate the one hundred years of peace between them. Seven hundred acres of the tract selected lie in Manitoba and seven hundred in North Dakota, a tangible manifestation of the magnificent benefits which have resulted from mutual respect, mutual trust, and mutual good faith.

Can the establishment of that great international peace garden of 1,400 acres of land lying directly across the boundary be less than an inspirational and uplifting symbol of the pride of the two great peoples affected in their one hundred years of neighborly friendship? It will be a beautiful symbol of an even more beautiful thought.

It is in response to this prevailing human tendency to uphold and glorify worthy traditions that today the people of the United States and of several other countries are celebrating the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, who won independence by his military genius and formed by his statesmanship a sound and prosperous republic.

On December 2, 1924, a little over seven years ago, Mr. Calvin Coolidge who was then President approved a resolution of the Congress to study and recommend a proper celebration in 1932 of the two hundredth anniversary of George Washington's birth which occurred in the State of Virginia on February 22, 1732. The purpose of the Congress in passing the resolution is stated in the resolution itself as follows: "that future generations of American citizens may live according to the example and precepts of his exalted life and character and thus perpetuate the American Republic."

The Congress created a United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission and appropriated a good sum of money for its work in making preparation for the celebration. For many months that Commission has been preparing for the celebration which begins with special emphasis today and will continue until Thanksgiving Day, November 24, 1932. Mother's Day, Independence Day (July 4), and Labor Day, etc., will be intervening occasions of Bicentennial honor to the name and achievements of George Washington.

In the congressional resolution it was provided that an address be delivered to the American people concerning the significance of the celebration. It was most fitting that the address was delivered by the man who was President when the resolution was passed by Congress. In his eloquent and inspiring address before both houses of Congress, the Cabinet and many distinguished guests President Coolidge said in part: I quote "On the 22nd day of February, 1932, America will celebrate the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. Wherever there are those who love ordered liberty, they may well join in the observance of that event. Although he belongs to us, yet by being a great American he became a great world figure. It is but natural that here under the shadow of the stately monument rising to his memory, in the Capital City bearing his name, the country made independent by his military genius, and the Republic established by his statesmanship, should already begin preparations to proclaim the immortal honor in which we hold the father of our country."

In the past the United States Government itself has done little more toward celebrating Washington's birthday than to keep it as a public holiday, but as will be readily realized from what I have said, the Government took the initiative seven years ago for the great official celebration that begins throughout the nation and in several other nations today. The United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission has announced that representatives of several other foreign governments have expressed their purpose to participate in the celebration. Bohemia, (now a part of Czechoslovakia), France, and Poland are offering important historical documents for exhibits. Roumania will hold music festivals and plays on the life of Washington, at the National Theatre in Bucharest under the auspices of the Society of Friends of the United States of America.

The George Washington Bicentennial Committee at Stuttgart, Germany, is arranging to present a set of American books as to an institution of learning in that city to form the nucleus of an American library section. The same organization is to send an English-speaking young man on an educational tour of the United States.

The American Government has been advised by the Government of Latvia that the name of Hanza square in Riga, the Capital, will be changed to Washington square in honor of the memory of Washington. Another city in Latvia will change the names of a square and a street similarly. Celebrations are taking place also in Hungary, Greece, and Mexico.

President Hoover recently issued a proclamation requiring the American flag to be flown today at half-staff over all Federal Government offices in the United States and over embassies, legations and consulates abroad. A special silver coin (the quarter) and memorial postage stamps in twelve denominations are being issued.

Under the patriotic direction of the Governors of the forty-eight States and the several outlying territories and possessions of the United States, and their political subdivisions, practically the entire population of the Republic are cooperating with the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission in the greatest celebration of a great man that has ever taken place in my country. It is but natural that patriotic and fraternal organizations have come forward to do their part and it is said that forty million members of such bodies have been preparing elaborate programs for today and later. Twenty-five million women will also participate in the bicentennial event. One of their aims is to spread the teaching and preaching of good citizenship particularly among the youth of the country. Twelve character-developing programs will be distributed to the school children in the United States.

The American Tree Association of Washington, D. C., is arranging to plant 10,000,000 trees through the land in celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth. Being a practical man, Washington was a great lover of the soil. In a letter to a friend he said: I quote: "I think with you that the life of a husbandman is the most delectable. It is honorable; it is amusing, and with judicious management, it is profitable. To see the plants rise from the earth and flourish by the superior skill and bounty of the laborer fills a contemplative mind with ideas which are more easy to be conceived than expressed."

It would seem that the planting of 10,000,000 trees is not an inappropriate tribute to the pleasure Washington found in seeing "plants rise from the earth and flourish."

The general program for the nation-wide celebration contemplates the production of a motion picture in sound and colors depicting the life and principal events in the career of George Washington. The picture will present historic shrines of the United States and other pertinent features. It is said that no private enterprise could possibly produce such an authentic, elaborate, and unique picture, because no amount of money could influence the Federal Government to permit the priceless uniforms, dresses, furniture and other possessions of the Washington family to be used for commercial purposes. The Eastman Teaching Films Company has the contract for making the official picture and no other film made by any other company will be recognized as official.

Every nation should seek to keep its people familiar with its own history, as well as that of other countries. It should seek to profit by the outstanding accomplishments of its greatest statesmen and others. George Washington as the first President was handicapped since, in this respect he was largely a pioneer, but he was filled with unshaken confidence in the ability and integrity of the people who had settled the colonies which under his leadership became the thirteen original States of the Union he formed. He had confidence in their resourcefulness and power to develop the great resources of the new republic. In these respects the generations that followed him have undoubtedly overshadowed and outdone his most sanguine expectations. But the American people owe to him profound credit for having made possible what the United States is today. They have always accorded to him that credit and the Bicentennial celebration is being conducted by them to give unmistakable manifestation of the respect and honor which they feel that George Washington so well earned.

It stands to George Washington's credit that his great success as a soldier and statesman was not tinged by building the American Republic out of the wreckage of any other country, although other strong men have had their honors for founding new nations upon the debris of former governments crushed by them.

Born two hundred years ago in an unpretentious home at a place then called Bridges Creek, now known as Wakefield, State of Virginia, Washington's education at school was limited. His father died when he was only eleven years of age, leaving him with a heavy burden of home responsibilities. Yet, at the age of sixteen years he did notable work as a surveyor. His forward march to success was continuous thereafter for he never ceased to be a hardworking student.

But Washington does not belong to any one State or any one group of people. He belongs to the United States as a whole, and American national pride in him is enhanced instinctively by the fact that the country gave to the world his immortal name.

Refreshing ourselves anew at the fountain of his fine personal character and patriotism, the hearts of Americans are today unanimously stirred to join in a great spiritual pilgrimage back to his memory, his counsel, his guidance, his exemplary principles, his judgment, his foresight, his faith, and his vision. Perhaps it is beyond us to live up to his example, but I am proud to know that familiar traces of his admirable personal traits have flowed along through the generations that followed him and still manifest themselves today among a majority of the people of the United States.

Through the Bicentennial celebration now in progress the American people will take new understanding of and devotion to the duties of citizenship. They will take greater love of their country and of their fellowmen at home and abroad into the secrets of their hearts.

Good-night.

The Bicentennial message was imparted to the enterprising city of Peterborough, Ontario, Canada, and its 20,000 inhabitants by the local Kiwanis Club on October 28, 1932, when the regular weekly luncheon was devoted to the honor of George Washington, "British-American patriot."

The American Consul General, for the Ontario district, Hon. Emil Sauer, was invited to journey from Toronto to Peterborough to make the principle address to the Kiwanians. Mr. Sauer chose for his text: "The Life of George Washington," and reports that "there were about a hundred guests present, and the address seemed to be well taken by all."

Included among the attendants, as reported by THE PETERBOROUGH EXAMINER in an article on the occasion, were "a representative group of manufacturers and merchants, and also Mrs. Percival Foster, field secretary of the Y. W. C. A. in Canada who was accompanied by Miss Leta Brownscombe, General Secretary of the local association."

The speech, read from a manuscript was introduced by the following ex tempore remarks:

Mr. President, Mr. Allen, Members of the Kiwanis Club, Ladies and Gentlemen:

I thank you with all my heart for your kind reception. I have very pleasant remembrances of my visit to Peterborough several years ago, when I had the privilege of addressing your club, and I could certainly not resist when I was invited a few weeks ago to address you again on this occasion. The subject of my address, as Mr. Allen has pointed out to you, is the life and character of George Washington. It is indeed difficult to attempt to do justice to this subject and at the same time speak with the circumspection expected of one in my position. I just asked Mrs. Foster, field secretary of the Canadian National Council of the Y. W. C. A., who is present, whether she did not think that I had a lot of courage to talk on this subject, and she said: "No." However, I hope you will bear with me if I read my speech:

On February 22nd of this year, there was inaugurated a series of celebrations of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, not only in the United States but in all parts of the world where there are American citizens who could join together for the purpose, and participated in even by foreign governments and people. These celebrations are sponsored by the Government of the United States in pursuance of a Joint Resolution of the Congress passed last year and followed by a proclamation of the President on February 22nd of this year, which directed that the celebrations be carried out from time to time during the period from February 22nd to Thanksgiving Day, November 24th.

These celebrations are carried out in a spirit, I believe, that was exemplified in the celebration last year of the one hundred fiftieth anniversary of the battle of Yorktown, when a monument was unveiled there in honor of Lord Cornwallis, the adversary of Washington in that memorable battle, and was accepted on behalf of his descendants by the Earl of Cornwallis, who was present on the occasion. Said President Hoover in an address at that celebration: "The long span of history will interpret the American War for Independence . . . more in the light of a struggle amongst English-speaking people for the establishment in government of an extension of a common philosophy of human rights, begun at Runnymede."

The purpose of the George Washington bicentennial celebrations this year is not only to demonstrate the gratitude the American people feel for the First President and Father of their country, but as President Hoover himself pointed out in his proclamation, it is to contemplate Washington's "unselfish devotion to duty, his courage, his patience, his genius, his statesmanship, and his accomplishment for his country and the world," and as Congress suggested in its Joint Resolution, these celebrations should serve to impress upon the minds of the American people the true character of Washington in order "that future generations of American citizens may live according to the example and precepts of his exalted life and character and thus perpetuate the American Republic."

A Scotch writer of the last century, Mr. J. Currie, said: "A state to prosper must be built on foundations of a moral character, and this character is the principal element of its strength and the only guaranty of its permanence and prosperity."

I do not see that this proposition could be questioned from any angle from which we may consider it. Rome was great in character and traditions before it became great as a world power. It owed its physical greatness to that character and tradition, and it owed its decline and destruction to the disintegration in its moral fabric and the eventual disregard of what was best in its traditions. History shows that the Roman Empire, like so many other nations, was destroyed not so much by enemies from without as by enemies within, which made it a prey to the conquerors from without—and the enemies within were the disintegrating influences resulting from excess conquests and exploitation of the conquered.

Another proposition I should like to lay down is that the character of nations is moulded to a large extent by the impress left upon them for good or bad, by their recognized leaders. What is good or bad in the traditions of a nation comes to a great extent from the character and influences of its leaders, and nations that have been fortunate enough to have leaders who moulded their traditions on a sound and healthful basis are under lasting obligation to them. It is from these traditions that succeeding young generations derive their guiding inspiration.

Before proceeding to present any facts or discussions of the life of Washington, let me quote to you a few opinions of his contemporaries and of authorities who have written or spoken on his life and character since his times. First, let me quote to you from the heads of the French Government who had been in so serious a controversy only a year before Washington died that an army was raised in our country to resist French demands, with Washington as its Commander-in-Chief. Only a year after this controversy, when Washington died, Talleyrand, the French Foreign Minister, in eulogy of Washington, said:

"The name of Washington is inseparably linked with a memorable epoch. He adorned this epoch by his talents and the nobility of his character, and with virtues that even envy dared not assail. History offers few examples of such renown. Great from the outset of his career, patriotic before his country had become a nation, brilliant and universal despite the passions and political resentments that would gladly have checked his career, his fame is today imperishable."

Napoleon himself expressed himself as follows: "His work is scarcely finished when it at once attracts the veneration which we freely accord to those achievements only that are consecrated by time."

Samuel Smiles, a Scotch author of the last century, in his classic book on "Character," thus described Washington:

"Washington left behind him, as one of the greatest treasures of his country, the example of a stainless life—of a great, honest, pure, and noble character—a model for his nation to form themselves by in all time to come. And in the case of Washington, as in so many other great leaders of men, his greatness did not so much consist in his intellect, his skill, and his genius, as in his honor, his integrity, his truthfulness, his high and controlling sense of duty—in a word, in his genuine nobility of character. Men such as these are the true life-blood of the country to which they belong. They elevate and uphold it, fortify and ennoble it, and shed a glory over it by the example of life and character which they have bequeathed. 'The names and memories of great men,' says an able writer, 'are the dowry of a nation.'"

James Truslow Adams, one of our own historians, characterizes Washington as follows: "When we think of Washington, it is not as a military leader, nor as an executive or diplomat. We think of the man who by sheer force of character held a divided and disorganized country together until victory was achieved, and, who, after peace was won, still held his disunited countrymen by their love and respect and admiration for himself until a nation was welded into enduring strength and unity."

There are different points in the life of Washington each of which might form the subject of a separate address—his education and how it served to mould his character; his military career; his outstanding diplomatic ability and style, although Washington probably never made a formal study of diplomacy, et cetera.

I propose to speak today mainly about Washington's character, particularly as it is exemplified in his services to his country, his writings, and his public utterances. I shall refer only very briefly to other points in his life.

Regarding Washington's boyhood, there are a number of stories which are more or less amusing and which some people take more or less seriously, but it is hardly possible in this brief address to discuss the origin or authenticity of these. It suffices to state that Washington received his education largely in the school of experience and stern realities which left little chance for the development of softness of mind and body, such as some of these stories might suggest. He was fortunate in having a good mother whom he revered from boyhood and throughout life and who no doubt influenced greatly his character, particularly in the development of a strong devotion to duty and of practical and methodical application to duty. He was also very greatly attached to his older half-brother Lawrence Washington, who had been educated in England, and who was an officer in the British Navy, and highly cultured. It might be of interest here to note that Lawrence Washington, who inherited directly the greater part of the estate of the father and married a wealthy Virginia lady, built the home which was later inherited by George Washington and is now a tourists' shrine. This home Lawrence Washington named "Mount Vernon" in honor of Admiral Lord Vernon, under whom he served in the British Navy. We might assume from this that he got along well with his superior officer and held pleasant memories of his service in the navy.

It was no doubt a healthy home influence of a good mother and a distinguished brother of character, coupled with native seriousness of mind, that led George Washington, at the age of thirteen years, to copy one hundred and ten rules of conduct and decency, as he himself characterized them, which he wrote in his notebook, the original of which is still in existence. These rules certainly indicate that he took life seriously, that he took himself seriously even at that early age. The rules reminded him that he must always keep his person neat and clean, never wear clothing that was soiled or torn, never talk in company when others were talking, sit when others were standing, et cetera. But there were also rules that went deep into his character. For example:

"Shew not yourself glad at the Misfortune of another though he were your enemy."

"Strive not with your Superiors in argument, but always submit your Judgment to others with Modesty."

"Be not hasty to believe flying reports to the Disparagement of any."

"Undertake not what you cannot Perform but be Careful to keep your Promise."

"Let your Recreations be Manfull not Sinfull."

"Labour to keep alive in your Breast that Little Spark of Celestial fire called Conscience."

Psychology teaches that character is formed in early infancy and childhood days when the mind is pliable and when the child continually absorbs into the sub-conscious mind thousands of suggestions that mould his character for good or bad; for health, morbidity, or disease, and for success or failure in later life. Washington put his one hundred and ten rules in writing obviously because he wanted continually to be reminded of them, and unconsciously they must have sunk down into his soul to resist contrary impressions and suggestions that children are always liable to absorb.

The late Senator Lodge in referring to these rules in his books on the life of George Washington states that "The one thought that runs through all the sayings is to practise self-control, and no man ever displayed that most difficult of virtues to such a degree as George Washington. It was no ordinary boy who took such a lesson as this to heart before he was fifteen, and carried it into his daily life, never to be forgotten."

The early results of such discipline are to be noted from the fact that in his boyhood days he attracted the notice and admiration of Lord Fairfax, a wealthy, highly-educated and cultured nobleman, who resided in Virginia and who employed George Washington as assistant to survey his immense tracts of land lying beyond the Blue Ridge Mountains, when Washington was barely sixteen years old. This work he performed so well that Lord Fairfax had him made county surveyor. These facts are mentioned not only because they illustrate Washington's early connection with active life but because the experience brought him in contact with the wilderness beyond the white settlements of Virginia, where he had to work his way along, often facing hostile Indians, and where his body was hardened through rough outdoor activity and hardships. He wrote to a friend regarding his experiences in his surveying activities as follows: "Since you received my letter in October last, I have not sleep'd above three nights or four in a bed, but, after walking a good deal all the day, I lay down before the fire upon a little hay, straw, fodder, or bearskin, which is to be had, with man, wife, and children, like a parcel of dogs and cats; and happy is he, who gets the berth nearest the fire."

Without such early experience Washington could most likely not have carried out the dangerous mission to the Ohio Valley, to protest against the French occupation of that country, when he was only twenty-two years of age. This exploit and a report he prepared on the trip made him known not only throughout the colonies but in the mother country. Despite the hardships and rough experiences that Washington had to undergo in his boyhood and early manhood days, he also, unlike Abraham Lincoln, had an opportunity for acquiring a tolerable school education and, in boyhood and early manhood, of mixing with the most outstanding personalities in the social, political, and official life of the colony. He was refined in character and manners as well as hardened for the greatest amount of physical endurance and the roughest kind of frontier life.

The high lights in the life of George Washington are his services in the French and Indian War, his services as Commander-in-Chief of the American Armies during the Revolutionary War, his services in securing the adoption of a new constitution under which the United States has since been governed, and the formation of a strong federal government under that Constitution and, finally, his services as first President of the United States.

His services during the French and Indian War were mainly in connection with the protection of the western frontier against Indian depredations, and his several expeditions to the Ohio Valley against the French outposts there, including his services under General Sir Edward Braddock in the ill-fated expedition against Fort Duquesne. During the period from the close of the French and Indian War in 1763, to the beginning of the Revolutionary War in 1775, Washington lived on his plantation, was a member of the Virginia Legislature or House of Burgesses, as it was called, and he kept in constant touch with public matters, although engrossed mainly in the work of managing Continental Congress in 1774 and 1775, and was elected Commander-in-Chief of the American revolutionary armies by the Second Continental Congress in 1775.

Washington's work as Commander-in-Chief of the American revolutionary armies involved the problem of prosecuting the war without a central authority that could be considered adequate for the purpose. The thirteen states, after the Declaration of Independence, were held together through a common purpose of achieving independence from the mother country, and they formed a loose confederation, represented by a Congress, which had authority to enlist an army; appoint, discharge and promote officers; borrow money and issue paper currency, and by this means provide to a certain extent a purchasing power necessary for prosecuting the war. But it lacked the authority necessary to establish and maintain credit through the levy and collection of revenue and to draw upon the resources of the country for its requirements. It could only call upon the separate states to contribute their respective quotas for the needs of the central government and the needs of the army, and the states, to say the least, were anything but punctilious in complying with these demands.

There was no conscription, not even enlistment for the duration of the war. To a large extent, fighting had to be done with the aid of state militia which could be held together only with the greatest difficulty and which melted away almost as quickly as it could be gotten together. The federal or Continental currency soon depreciated and eventually became almost worthless. There was jealousy and misunderstanding among the states, apparently each one feeling that it was doing more than its share in prosecuting the war, but the united efforts were not nearly what could have been brought forth under a strong federal government capable of carrying out its orders.

It was under such conditions that Washington had to face the British forces that were superior in number, training and equipment. It is generally understood that the British Commander, General Howe, did not prosecute the war more vigorously during the years 1775, 1776, and 1777, because he fully expected that resistance of the rebellious colonies would soon collapse under the impossible conditions I have just outlined in brief.

Washington was a man of vision and who saw what was necessary to carry on the war with reasonable prospects of success, complained and appealed incessantly to the Congress and the separate state governments for men, money and supplies. Washington's army often had to undergo intense suffering from want of supplies, and, according to Washington's own reports, morale often ran dangerously low. Recruiting and training presented the gravest of problems because of the short periods of enlistment and the continually changing complexion of the army. Under such conditions, the main army, commanded by Washington himself, always opposed the main British Army in the area between New York and Philadelphia for a period of six years, and during these years of conflict, Washington could hope to do no more than to keep his army from being captured or annihilated, and here and there throw it into minor engagements. What a strain these long six years must have been upon Washington can well be imagined, particularly when he knew that the resources of the country would have been adequate for the maintenance of his army and for carrying out more successful campaigns, if these resources could have been drawn upon with the aid of an adequate government. If this were not enough, Congress often became impatient over his complaints and supplications, even expressed its dissatisfaction over the lack of results accomplished by the army, and a considerable membership of the Congress even joined in the so-called Conway Cable intended to dispense with Washington as Commander-in-Chief and put in his place the incompetent General Gates who was credited with the first and only major victory gained by the American forces before Yorktown; namely, the victory of Saratoga in 1777.

I recall these details not simply by way of eulogy of Washington, but to ask the question why he put up with such a situation, why he did not establish a military dictatorship, as did Cromwell, Napoleon and other lesser lights, organize a dictatorial federal government so as to be able to draw upon the resources of the country in order to make more vigorous prosecution of the war possible. There were not lacking opportunities for such a move. Many, if not most, of the political leaders might have opposed such a move, but Washington had the loyalty of the army and the love and confidence of the people at large behind him. Before the end of the war a written proposition was made to him by officers of the army that he assume the title of king and put an end to the intolerable situation. This proposition he turned down with "abhorrence," to use his own expression.

When independence was finally achieved, Washington performed one of the most outstanding services of his life for his country as well as for representative government generally by establishing without resort to force or dictatorial power, a new federal government of the people, capable of fulfilling its mission. Before the end of the Revolutionary War and continuing until the present Constitution was finally ratified in 1788, he strove incessantly to establish, through united and cooperative efforts, a strong federal government, capable of holding the states together and defending them against internal as well as external dangers. He spoke and wrote incessantly to bring home to the people the needs of such a government. He viewed with alarm the strife and jealousies between the different states and he explained time and again that the existing situation was bringing upon the states the contempt of the whole civilized world, and that the blood and treasures spent during the Revolutionary War would eventually prove of no avail if the situation would not be remedied through the establishment of a capable federal government. It might be interesting, if I had time, to go into details of Washington's incessant endeavors to bring about a strong federal government. However, time will not permit that I refer to more than two instances. In his last address to the army he said:

"Although the General has so frequently given it as his opinion, in the most public and explicit manner, that, unless the principles of the Federal Government were properly supported, and the powers of the Union increased, the honor, dignity, and justice of the nation would be lost forever; yet he cannot help repeating, on this occasion, so interesting a sentiment, and leaving it as his last injunction to every officer and every soldier, who may view the subject in the same serious point of light, to add his best endeavors to those of his worthy fellow-citizens towards effecting those great and valuable purposes, on which our very existence as a nation so materially depends."

Accordingly, he used every soldier and officer as a missionary in the cause of union. Furthermore, he addressed a circular to the Governors of the different states in which he pointed out that he was so thoroughly convinced of the necessity of a strong government that "silence in me would be a crime." In this circular he states further:

"I will therefore speak to your Excellency the language of freedom and of sincerity without disguise. . . . There are four things, which, I humbly conceive, are essential to the well-being, I may even venture to say, to the existence, of the United States, as an independent power.

"First. An indissoluble union of the States under one federal head.

"Secondly. A sacred regard to public justice.

"Thirdly. The adoption of a proper peace establishment; and,

"Fourthly. The prevalence of that pacific and friendly disposition among the people of the United States, which will induce them to forget their local prejudices and policies; to make those mutual concessions, which are requisite to the general prosperity; and, in some instances, to sacrifice their individual advantages to the interest of the community."

When the Constitutional Convention was finally brought together, Washington was a delegate and, as may be expected, was made chairman. Once the Constitution was adopted by the Convention, he continued zealously and actively to have it ratified. He no doubt won many adherents among the prominent political leaders of the country by his persuasiveness, pointing out to them that he too had objections to the Constitution but that it was the best obtainable and should therefore be ratified, because failure to ratify meant disaster. He never stated what his objections to the Constitution were and it is conceivable that he used this argument to enable opponents with due self-respect to accept it. At the present time it may be taken as a matter of course that the Constitution should have been accepted and we can hardly realize what a tremendous struggle it was to secure ratification, particularly when we consider how long it took Virginia, New York and other states to ratify it, some ratifying after the necessary three-fourths majority had been obtained and the new government was started in motion. We can say with all confidence that without Washington's influence, the Convention would never have agreed upon a Constitution and even if it had, without him the Constitution would never have been ratified.

There are not lacking books on the life of Washington that have been written with the purpose apparently of casting doubt on the character, abilities and even the integrity of Washington. I have read books that set forth an endless mass of details including extracts of correspondence, carefully selected for the end in view, and records intended to cast reflection on the life and character of Washington. If you wade through this mass of details you can hardly wonder how any contemporary of Washington, if these stories were true, could ever have taken him seriously. But if we look over the wilderness of details presented, the facts can after all not escape us that in every important turn in his life he showed his preeminence among his contemporaries. I refer to his self-discipline when, as a mere boy, he attracted the attention, admiration and interest of Lord Fairfax. At the age of twenty-two he went on a dangerous mission through the wilderness to the Ohio Valley, after another officer had turned down the proposition as impossible of carrying out, and that upon the return from that mission and the publication of his report he became known not only throughout the colonies but in the mother country. He was the only one who survived the ill-fated expedition of General Braddock with increased prestige and prominence. We think of Patrick Henry as preponderantly an orator and might be led to believe that he considered oratory the highest of possible human attainments. Yet when Henry was asked who was the greatest personality at the First Continental Congress, of which he himself was a member, he replied: "If you speak of eloquence, Mr. Rutledge of South Carolina is by far the greatest orator. But if you speak of solid information and sound judgment, Colonel Washington is by far the greatest man on the floor."

When it came to choosing a Commander-in-Chief of the American armies at the beginning of the Revolutionary War, there was practically no other one considered, and finally, when the Constitution was ratified, the unanimous demand of the country was that Washington become the first President. He had the unanimous vote of the electoral college not only for his first election but again for a second term, and he would have again been elected for a third term if he had not urgently requested to be relieved. And he consented to be the first President of the United States and give up his more congenial private life only because of a sense of duty and upon the urgent solicitation of his countrymen in order to lend his ability and prestige in organizing the new government on a firm basis.

Critics describe Washington as austere and cold, overlooking his intensely human sentiments and sympathies as shown in his letters and public utterances. No one denies that Washington was intensely devoted to his wife and step-children, and when at home at Mount Vernon he had visitors and entertainments almost daily, with luncheons and dinners, card parties, dancing, and fox hunting with horses and hounds. He is described as having been slow in thinking and reasoning, but his critics seem not to take into consideration the immense responsibility which his decisions and actions carried.

If I may impose further on your patience, I would like to read you a brief quotation from Washington, taken from a letter he wrote to a friend, Mrs. Macaulay Graham, in reply to a letter of congratulations upon his election as first President of the United States:

"Although neither the present age nor posterity may possibly give me full credit for the feelings, which I have experienced on this subject, yet I have a consciousness that nothing short of an absolute conviction of duty could ever have brought me upon the scenes of public life again. The establishment of our new government seemed to be the last great experiment for promoting human happiness by a reasonable compact in civil society. It was to be in the first instance, in a considerable degree, a government of accommodation as well as a government of laws. Much was to be done by prudence, much by conciliation, much by firmness. Few, who are not philosophical spectators, can realize the difficult and delicate part, which a man in my situation had to act. All see, and most admire, the glare which hovers round the external happiness of elevated office. To me there is nothing in it beyond the lustre, which may be reflected from its connection with a power of promoting human felicity.

"In our progress towards political happiness, my station is new, and, if I may use the expression, I walk on untrodden ground. There is scarcely an action, the motive to which may not be subject to a double interpretation. There is scarcely any part of my conduct which may not hereafter be drawn into precedent."

There is one more service that Washington performed for his country which is too often overlooked but which was nothing less than the laying of the foundation for the long years of peace between the United States and the British Empire. The fact that war broke out between Great Britain and the United States only fifteen years after Washington's term as President expired does not rebut the argument that he laid the foundation on which subsequent years of peace could be established.

It will be remembered that soon after Washington became President war broke out between France and Great Britain, the beginning of the so-called Napoleonic Wars. As France assisted the American colonies in their Revolutionary War, it looked logical to the French as well as undoubtedly to most of the Americans, that the United States should come to the aid of France and declare war against England. However, Washington looked upon the French revolutionary excesses not only with doubt but with positive alarm, even predicting that the French nation was on the verge of going from one extreme to another which might lead to a despotism worse than the one overcome by the Revolution. France sent a Minister to the United States, M. Genet, who at once not only started an active propaganda to draw the United States into the war, but violated American neutrality. The country even had to witness a spectacle where a foreign minister endeavored to arouse our country against its own president. As a result of M. Genet's activities, Washington had him recalled.

However, I refer here not only to Washington's neutrality policy in the war between France and Great Britain, but to the settlement of controversies with Great Britain, through peaceful negotiations of a treaty, the so-called Jay Treaty. This treaty, negotiated by a special commissioner whom Washington sent to England, Chief Justice Jay, did not meet American expectation and was disappointing to Washington. Among the people it aroused intense antagonism, and determined efforts were made to defeat ratification. What aroused particular resentment in the treaty was the fact that it did not settle satisfactorily American demand for certain rights of seamen on its merchant vessels and, second, article 12, which provided for the prohibition of exportation from the United States of certain specified articles of commerce. From a practical point of view, the latter did not amount to anything at that time, but the article was opposed on the ground of principle. On the other hand, the treaty provided for the evacuation of the British forts in the West and for the settlement of the Boundary, both of which were most dangerous questions in controversy and continually threatened the peaceful relations between the two countries. Washington favored and ultimately secured ratification, because he felt this the only alternative to continued friction and threatening war. Washington thus laid the foundation for the future peaceful relations between the United States and Great Britain. This was unfortunately interrupted by the War of 1812. That war was scarcely completed when the Rush-Bagot Treaty was signed which is associated with the undefended boundary between Canada and the United States. I say despite the War of 1812, credit for the establishment of the original basis for permanent peace between the two countries belongs to Washington more than to anyone else, because he laid the foundation upon which the future foreign policy of the United States and, in particular, our peaceful relations with Great Britain, have been built.

Despite the political controversy that was raging in the country during the last years of the life of Washington, and despite the calumny that was heaped upon him on account of the Jay Treaty, his popularity and fame were never greater in his life than at the time of his death two years after retirement from public office. It was at his funeral that he was for the first time called the father of his country. We may well ask how did he withstand and outlive all the criticism and opposition. I have heard one of Canada's foremost statesmen in an address on Lincoln suggest that if Lincoln had lived, his popularity and fame might not have outlived the bitter controversies of the post-war, reconstruction period. Washington's worst critics admit that he had unconquerable tenacity, that when he once set his teeth to do a thing he could never be shaken from his purpose, and they seem to attribute all the success for which he is credited to that quality. To my mind this does not explain his success and undying fame, prestige and popularity. There can be no doubt that his fame, like that of Abraham Lincoln, is imperishable because of his unselfish devotion to a cause which he considered would serve the best interests of his people, to his unbounded confidence in the capacity of his fellow-citizens for self-government, his untiring and unselfish efforts to promote that cause, with personal dangers to himself, and in the face of political resentment, vituperation and calumny heaped upon him, at the same time sacrificing what would have been to him a much more congenial life as a private citizen. I heard a prominent Torontonion say that Washington more than any other man in history answers the IF in Kipling's famous poem. In conclusion I shall read you three of the verses of that poem:

"If you can keep your head when all about you
Are losing theirs and blaming it on you,
If you can trust yourself when all men doubt you
But make allowance for their doubting too;

If you can wait and not be tired by waiting,
Or being lied about, don't deal in lies,
Or being hated don't give way to hating,
And yet don't look too good, nor talk too wise;

"If you can dream—and not make dreams your master;
If you can think—and not make thoughts your aim,
If you can meet with triumph and disaster
And treat those two impostors just the same;
If you can bear to hear the truth you've spoken
Twisted by knaves to make a trap for fools,
Or watch the things you gave your life to, broken,
And stoop and build 'em up with worn-out tools:

"If you can talk with crowds and keep your virtue,
Or walk with Kings—nor lose the common touch,
If neither foes nor loving friends can hurt you,
If all men count with you, but none too much;
If you can fill the unforgiving minute
With sixty seconds' worth of distance run,
Yours is the earth and everything that's in it,
And—which is more—you'll be a Man, my son!"

Very few Americans live in Quebec, Canada's stronghold on the St. Lawrence, where Wolfe and Montcalm fought their epochal battle on the Plains of Abraham, but seventeen of those who do reside there gathered at the American Consulate on Thanksgiving Day, 1932, and paid their respects to the memory of George Washington, whose Bicentennial closed that day.

According to the Consul, Hon. John Randolph, the event was an inspirational one. As the guests partook of their holiday repast, Mr. Randolph read to them the first Thanksgiving proclamation, uttered by President George Washington, in 1789, and all were reminded of the fact that the day was made an enduring reality by the triumph of the principles fought for by Washington and his compatriots.

The avowed purpose of the American Women's Club of Regina, capital of the province of Saskatchewan, Canada, according to the President of the Organization, Mrs. J. H. Evans, is "to create a feeling of good will and friendliness toward our Canadian friends and neighbors." An opportunity to promote this object was afforded in the George Washington Bicentennial celebration.

The members of the club invited a host of their Canadian friends and all Americans residing in the vicinity to attend its Thanksgiving Day banquet, on November 24, 1932, which was made a typical George Washington event, marking the culmination of the Bicentennial in Regina.

The principal feature of the dinner was a George Washington address delivered by the American Consul, Hon. John S. Calvert, who with Mrs. Calvert were the honored guests. Mr. Calvert declared that Washington was a "typical American," one who might be respected and honored alike by peoples on either side of the United States-Canadian Border. The full text of the Consul's speech is herewith quoted:

I have been asked to read, as is customary, the annual Thanksgiving Day Proclamation of the President of the United States and at the same time to make some remarks on a subject appropriate to the present occasion. The Proclamation this year is unusual in that it consists almost entirely of the reproduction of the original proclamation made on October 3rd, 1789, by our first President, George Washington. The reason for this, as you doubtless know, is that the year 1932 marks the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Washington which has been generally celebrated throughout the United States and in some other countries during the period which commenced on the anniversary of his birth last February 22nd and which closes today. I find therefore in the body of this document a subject which seems to me very appropriate, and that is George Washington himself. I will now read the proclamation of President Hoover quoting the original one to which I have referred.

[Reads Proclamation]

A Commission to plan suitable celebration this year of the Washington Bicentennial was created by Congress in the year 1924 and has been in existence for several years. Patriotic and civic organizations, schools, churches and individuals have participated in this celebration at the request of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. The object has been to impress upon Americans of the present generation the debt they owe to the founder of our country. The writings of Washington have never been completely published by private enterprise and therefore Congress has authorized their publication which is now going on under the direction of the Commission. It has been to some extent forgotten that Washington was a prolific writer and that his advice on many subjects is still applicable to our present day life. The new edition will consist of 25 volumes containing some of his writings never before published.

It was said by Abraham Lincoln that no eulogy of Washington was needed or expected and that to add glory to his name was as impossible as it would be to add brightness to the sun. He advised that none attempt it. While it would appear that this advice has been disregarded through the formation of the present Commission, it may be said that conditions have changed since the time of Lincoln and that it was thought necessary to recall again the debt owed by every American living or dead to the first President of our country.

In the first place the original biographers of Washington were excessive in their adulation and in the second place American children have for generations been given in their school books a picture that was untrue inasmuch as it pictured him as a species of saint which he was not and never claimed to be. He was a man six feet two inches in height, with sandy colored hair, weighed 210 pounds when 40 years old and was actively and intelligently interested in every phase of life including the sports and social diversions popular in his time. About ten years ago a school of biographers commonly known as "Debunkers" undertook to prove that Washington was not a plaster saint and that he was much over rated. They succeeded, whether they intended it or not, in showing that he was a human being of an admirable type and nothing was brought out which detracted from his actual greatness.

In my opinion the biographers I have referred to have performed a public service, whether intended or not, as they created an interest which has led more serious historians to bring before the present day public the more important facts in connection with the life of the founder of our country. In the first place it has been shown that Washington possessed above all the capacity for hard work which is the equivalent of genius. Facilities for education were not great in Virginia following the time of his birth in 1732 and the education he acquired was the result of his own studiousness. At the age of 16 we find him an engineer engaged in important surveying work in the forests of Virginia, and before he became of age he was entrusted with important military and diplomatic missions to the French both by the British Government and by the Colonial Authorities. He showed then, especially in connection with Braddock's ill-fated expedition to Fort Duquesne, high qualities of leadership as a soldier which were later exemplified in his superb handling of his forces in the War of the Revolution.

The fame of Washington does not rest principally upon his capacity as a soldier. It rests chiefly upon his qualities as a statesman and patriot, but in many other fields of endeavor he was supreme in his generation. For instance as a farmer he successfully farmed several thousands of acres of land while still a young man. His information with regard to agricultural problems was enormous. He was our first scientific farmer and student of methods of improving livestock, of rotating crops and of diversified agriculture, being the first to introduce in America the use of fertilizer when the virgin land "ran out." Had Washington done nothing but farm, his reputation as America's first authority on this subject would survive. We can next consider him as a business man which should appeal to us as a business people. Washington was eminently successful as a business man and at the commencement of the War of the Revolution he was the wealthiest individual in the United States. Living in the country not even in an incorporated place, he organized joint stock companies, opened mines and quarries, and did a considerable shipping business. His farm was of course a business in itself. He exported flour and grain, produced wool, cotton and flax which was manufactured on the place and imported large quantities of goods from abroad.

As a statesman and patriot Washington achieved a reputation which will always endure marking him as one of the great men of all times. Possessing a remarkable understanding of government through heredity and self-training he was in his official life able, moderate and wise. He was also extremely courageous. It is not generally recalled that in the stand taken by Washington in the War of the Revolution he followed a course in which he risked not only his life but the largest fortune in the United States. People of this class usually take the conservative course but Washington followed his conscience in the matter which led him to be a Revolutionist, though not the type of Revolutionist found in France during the Reign of Terror and more lately in Russia. Washington was a Revolutionist as the Barons at Runnymede were revolutionists. He did not seek to overthrow the existing form of society but fought to preserve liberties including that of self-government already possessed by his race for nearly a thousand years.

The real greatness of Washington was shown in his capacity of statesman and it is for this that we owe him the greatest gratitude. It is not now generally realized that at the close of the War of the Revolution Washington as our leader was called upon to reconcile the differences of thirteen generally hostile and sometimes wrangling colonies. Through his wisdom and also through the respect in which his character was held by all he was able to weld these thirteen colonies into a single nation and his work still stands. No other man of his time could have done this. Thomas Jefferson stated that

Washington was the only man in the United States who possessed the confidence of all and that there was no other who was considered as anything more than a party leader. Since then we have had of course leaders who were more than mere party leaders but never one who to the same extent possessed the respect and admiration of the entire American people as did Washington in his time and as he should do now.

There is no reason why Washington should not continue to represent the highest ideal type of man to all Americans. He was in most respects what we would like to consider a typical American although he did not in his public life exemplify the achievement of highest office by one born in poor surroundings; something which has so often occurred during our history. His elevation to supreme command, however, did show that we in America have always been remarkably free from class distinction. Washington's wealth and position was no bar to his advancement as his poverty would not have been had he been poor. Our presidential elections have shown this to be the case time and time again.

It is reported by those in charge that the Bicentennial Celebration this year has been successful both in the United States and in a number of foreign countries. In America over 800,000 distinct organizations participated in commemorating the Two Hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth. Some of the lasting memorials established, in addition to the publication of Washington's writings which I have before mentioned, were the construction of a Memorial Boulevard between the City of Washington and Mount Vernon and the commencement of the George Washington Memorial Parkway in the Federal district. Congress has also established Washington's birthplace, Wakefield, as a national park and has provided funds for erection of a replica of the original building. It is also reported that many cities and villages in the United States have renamed streets and squares in his honor. This had already been done in some foreign countries to an extent hardly appreciated by Americans who have not lived out of the United States. Particularly in France and in South America one often enters a small town of only two or three streets and finds one of them named for Washington. Monuments in his honor are scattered throughout the world. In Regina I have noted with a feeling of gratitude that there is both a Washington Avenue and a Washington Park.

Bicentennial celebrations of Washington have been held this year in a number of foreign countries, notably in England. The English Speaking Union has for a number of years done much to honor the memory of Washington particularly in the restoration of Sulgrave Manor, one of the ancestral homes of the Washington family—a family that was well known in the north of England for several centuries prior to the time that the grandfather of George Washington emigrated to America after the loss of the Stuart cause. In England today it is hardly possible to find a writing that has survived the passage of time which in any way detracts from the character of Washington as now universally regarded. I will close with a quotation from the English historian James Bryce, whose history of the American commonwealth is commonly considered as most authoritative: "Washington stands alone and unapproachable, like a snow peak rising about its fellows into the clear air of morning, with a dignity, constancy, and purity which have made him the ideal type of civic virtue to succeeding generations."

Sault Ste. Marie is a city divided against itself, geographically speaking, for part of the city is in Chippewa County, Michigan, on the American side of the St. Mary's River, and the other part is in Ontario, Canada, across the river, but when it comes to celebrating in honor of George Washington both sides are one.

The American Consul in the Canadian part of the city, Hon. Howard A. Bowman, has reported to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission that Canadians and Americans resident in Sault Ste. Marie, Canada, "are accustomed to participate in such celebrations as the George Washington Bicentennial with their American friends," ten minutes ferry ride across the river, and for the most part this is what they did during the Bicentennial year.

To focus local interest on Bicentennial activity, however, Consul Bowman gave a series of Washington "teas" at the Consulate, "to which were invited prominent Canadian citizens and representative local American residents." These functions were held on Washington's birthday, 1932, Independence Day, and Thanksgiving Day.

George Washington literature was at hand for the guests and they were entertained with music and dancing recalling the days of Washington. International amity reached its highest form of expression in these exchanges of greetings among the citizens of the two great North American countries present at Bicentennial fetes.

The Memorial University College took the leading part in the Bicentennial in St. John's, Newfoundland, Canada. With the cooperation of the American Consul General in St. John's, Hon. Edward A. Dow, President J. W. Paton and his associates at the school instituted a George Washington Bicentennial essay contest. Mr. Dow posted cash prizes and the students entered the competition with marked enthusiasm. Three subjects were announced:

1. How does the work of George Washington, Alexander Hamilton and the Federal Convention mark a new step in the development of Federal Government?
2. The origin and subsequent development of British political institutions in British North America prior to 1776.
3. Discuss the constitutional issues of the American Revolution from the point of view of both the Colonists and the British Parliament.

The results of the contest were announced at a special college assembly immediately after the close of the Bicentenary year. The American Consul General was welcomed with stirring renditions of "America" and "Ode to Newfoundland" by the students. The President of the College thanked all who had contributed to the success of the contest and declared that any "such interest which binds different peoples together is welcome at such a time as the present when nationalist spirit is intensified by the effects of the great war. Any such interest is more especially welcome when it makes the kindred peoples of the U. S. A. and Great Britain realize their unity; for both these peoples stand for the same principles—political and social freedom, equal justice and ordered peaceful progress, which shall be for the whole race of mankind."

THE DAILY NEWS of St. John's made particular reference to the following part of President Paton's remarks:

A great personality transcends all the partition walls of nationality. An Einstein, a Shakespeare, a Dante were for all nations and for all times. George Washington was such a personality. He vindicated on this continent certain principles of political freedom and self-government which are essential to human development and human progress. He did more than that. The breakup of the Spanish empire in the South resulted in a whole group of independent nations with separate tariffs, their separate armies and fleets. They made war on each other. The independence of the thirteen British colonies developed into a Federal government, organized on a far larger scale than had hitherto been known in history and far more stable. This was even a greater achievement on the part of Washington and the far-sighted men who were with him. It has saved North America from reproducing the intolerable division and internecine wars of Europe. It is right that such a man should be worthily commemorated.

Consul General Dow presented the essay awards to Mr. James T. F. Howley, first prize winner; Miss Olive Wood, and Mr. Thomas J. Ryan. To each of the three was presented an official Bicentennial medal on behalf of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission in Washington, D. C.

Stimulated by the spirit and success of the observance of the Bicentennial at the college, President Paton took it upon himself to carry the message of George Washington to other groups. By special invitation he gave a lecture on the subject of George Washington before the Holy Cross Society, an organization composed of working men of the community. To this group President Paton spoke in part as follows:

The man in the street is apt to say "Washington was a rebel. Why celebrate a rebel?" The man in the street is the man who doesn't think. I find myself that it is dangerous to start thinking on the street. One is apt to get run over. But if the man in the street will, when he gets home, put on his thinking cap, and inform himself as to what George Washington really stood for, he will discover that it was not Washington who was the rebel. He stood steadily for the established principles of representative government and civic freedom. He was loyal to all that England stands for. It was the misguided king and his misguiders who were disloyal. If Washington was a rebel, so was Pitt, so was Edmund Burke. No responsible person today will contest that the statement that Burke was right and North was wrong. Burke's speeches are used as textbooks in England for the teaching of history today. . . .

When the weary years' fighting was over, Washington was free to have dinner alone with his wife. Probably his one thought was for rest and retirement. Little did he think that the work which still remained to him was, from the standpoint of world progress—even more important than his work as Commander-in-Chief. There remained still to build up the constitution of the United States. To get these colonies together acknowledging one central government, to form them into a nation was a task which no other single American, no group of Americans could have accomplished apart from George Washington. Others like Hamilton, Jefferson, Franklin could supply the brains, but only George Washington had that commanding personality to get the team working together in harmony for the common cause. The several states were strongly individualistic in temper, their great ideal was independence. "Why should we not go ahead without interference?" was their attitude. Their instincts were centrifugal, not centripetal. Indeed, there was as yet no acknowledged center, no city obviously marked out as the natural seat of government. The colonies were scattered along over one thousand miles of coast, there were no roads, no rapid and easy communications. There had been no national consciousness before the trouble with the mother country evoked it and gave it shape.

Nor was the prospect of a stable Federal Government at all promising. The precedents in history were rather sickly plants. Professor E. A. Freeman's abortive history showed that Federal Government had hitherto been confined to quite small areas, and never in these had it been stable. The greatest achievement of Washington and those who worked with him was that they succeeded where so many before them had failed. Out of thirteen separate entities they built up a single sovereignty. Leaving to each state the fullest measure of freedom in shaping out its own life and its own social and political organization, they reserved to the central authority the great questions of peace and war and foreign relations in trade and commerce, a central and supreme authority in matters judicial deliberative and executive.

And what has been the result? The Spanish Empire broke up into individual states. It has reproduced in South America the troubles of Europe with all the mutual suspicious and discrepant interests which produced the great tragedy of the World War. But in North America from sea to sea men of the most diverse races and dispositions live together in settled peace without any conflict of policies and armies, without any tariff barriers. Disputes are settled by justice and not by violence. From sea to sea, from North to South there are peace and settled, ordered life, and freedom broadened from precedent to precedent. It demonstrates to all mankind the way of onward progress. And for this, mankind has to thank, under God, George Washington. Like all great men he was greater than he knew.

Just across the American-Canadian border from Calais, Maine, is the New Brunswick city, St. Stephen. The American vice consul for the district, Hon. George L. Brist, reported that although Americans living in St. Stephen did not actively celebrate the George Washington Bicentennial on the Canadian side of the border, the biggest part of them, together with many of their New Brunswick friends journeyed to Calais and other nearby American cities to join in Bicentennial festivities given by churches, schools, clubs, and civic centers. These same celebrants undoubtedly carried back to Canada with them the ideals inculcated by the George Washington festivities.

The American Women's Club of Winnipeg, capital city of Manitoba, Canada, centralized the interest of the city and district thereabouts on the George Washington Bicentennial by holding a reception and colonial tea on the afternoon of February 22, 1932, at Club headquarters. More than a hundred resident Americans, including Hon. P. S. Heintzleman, American Consul General of the district and his staff and representatives of other branches of the United States Government resident in Winnipeg attended. Canadian women's organizations of Winnipeg were represented either by their leaders or by delegates.

The affair was marked by all of the courtly grace and beauty of the Colonial era. Ladies in polonaise frocks, powdered wigs, and slippers recalled history lessons about Martha Washington, Dolly Madison, and other women of Colonial days. The minuet as known to Washington was danced with practiced perfection and lilting songs of the period gave variation to the entertainment.

President Herbert Hoover's Bicentennial proclamation was read to the assembled guests and the celebration was declared officially opened for participation in Winnipeg.

Canadian guests made flattering comments about the dignity and spirit of the occasion and of its heightening influence on the cordial relations already existing between Canada and the United States.

Vancouver, British Columbia, third city in size in the Dominion of Canada and the nation's leading Pacific seaport, celebrated the George Washington Bicentennial in a series of impressive commemorative events beginning on the two hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth and sustained with patriotic interest throughout most of the Bicentennial year.

Washington tree-planting ceremonies in one of Vancouver's beautiful public parks; Kiwanis Club meetings honoring the great Virginian; and a number of notable luncheons, Colonial balls, and commemorative exercises under the auspices of the American Women's Club contributed to the success of the celebration. The Premier of British Columbia, Hon. S. F. Tolmie, journeyed to Seattle, Washington, on the two hundredth anniversary day and participated in the dedication of Seattle's great George Washington Bridge, a structural unit in the Pacific Highway that will eventually link Canada with Mexico. Vancouver journals were notably liberal with their news and editorial space regarding the Bicentennial. THE VANCOUVER SUN and THE VANCOUVER DAILY PROVINCE printed several columns of pictures of local Bicentenary events and the latter paper declared that such celebrations in British Columbia constituted a means of "stressing friendship and good-will between the United States and Canada," and in a Washington birthday editorial stated:

The story of this celebration does really overshadow the story of the man George Washington itself. For it is true that he is now a legend and a colossus, and perhaps on a greater scale, at least in the sense of advertisement, than has ever attended the apotheosis of any other national hero. Not that Washington seizes the imagination of the world as Napoleon, for instance, seizes it. But it is true that in the last hundred years the stature of George Washington has grown in the minds of his fellow countrymen until they have ceased to reason about him, and he is in process of becoming one of the great tribal gods of history. The new Russia has her embalmed Lenin, and the new Italy her living Mussolini. But Washington, in a special sense, is the beginning of the United States—no other country has a "father" of his influence and renown.

Well, it may seem to the friendly observer beyond the borders of the United States that Lincoln at least might contest the claim of Washington to be honored as the greatest President, but, when the last appraisal has been made, the figure of Washington, through all the mists of legend, emerges as that of a first-class man. Lord Fairfax, writing of him while he was still a young man, and seeing that he was likely to go far, said that he was a man who would "go to school all his life." That was a just word. He had wisdom and honor and courage, and he was equal to a great occasion in history.

To the American Women's Club in Vancouver was given the privilege of motivating the city's Bicentenary program in accordance with the plans outlined by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission in Washington, D. C. Mrs. Robert J. Mitchell was made chairman of the Vancouver committee.

The first event was a Washington birthday luncheon held in the crystal ballroom of the Hotel Vancouver on February 22, 1932. This affair brought together more than 300 members and guests of the American Women's Club. THE VANCOUVER SUN, commenting on the luncheon said:

No more perfectly arranged affair has ever been given by any organization in Vancouver. From the singing of "God, Save the King" to the final strains of "The Star Spangled Banner," it was an event to arouse the deepest chords of patriotism regardless of nationality.

The guests were welcomed by the Club President, Mrs. John Alexander Blair, and ushered by the members of the Reception Committee, who were picturesquely garbed in Colonial costumes, to tables where individual cards bearing Bicentennial motifs designated their places. Colonial nosegays, framed with Bicentennial paper lace frills, were the guest favors as well as hand-tinted programs. Red, white, and blue—the Colonial color triumvirate—was utilized in the decorative theme. Red tulips, white freezias, and blue jonquils in an old Sevres bowl graced the head table at which were seated the United States Consul General, Hon. Ely Eliot Palmer; the officers of the Women's Club; Rev. G. O. Fallis; United States Trade Commissioner, E. G. Babbitt; and the lady officials of the Women's Canadian Club.

Mrs. J. L. Turnbull, vice-president of the Women's Canadian Club, proposed the following toast to George Washington, written in 1778 by Francis Hopkinson, first known native American composer and one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence.

'Tis Washington's Health—fill a bumper around,
For he is our glory and pride;
'Tis Washington's Health—our hero to bless,
May Heaven look graciously down.
Oh! long may he live our hearts to possess,
And freedom still call him her own.
Oh! long may he live our hearts to possess,
And freedom still call him her own.
Still call him her own.

Several songs by Francis Hopkinson, among which were great favorites of Washington, were rendered by Mrs. G. G. Cotterall accompanied by the Orpheus Trio, and a graceful interpretation of the Colonial minuet was danced by eight members of the club, followed by a cleverly enacted George Washington play, "The Lure of the Sea," furnished for the occasion by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission in Washington, D. C.

Hon. Ely E. Palmer, American Consul General, was the speaker of the day, and also officiated in an honorary capacity of chairman at the luncheon, pronouncing the official opening of the Bicentennial in Vancouver. Consul General Palmer's address follows:

Two hundred years ago, in Westmoreland County, Virginia, George Washington was born.

One hundred and thirty-five years ago, having fulfilled his great destiny, universally esteemed, and leaving as an enduring guide and inspiration for his contemporaries and for posterity his immortal Farewell Address, Washington withdrew to the peace of Mount Vernon, where two years later he died; eulogized by Thomas Jefferson as "the only man in the United States who possessed the confidence of all," as one whose "character was, in its mass, perfect, in nothing bad, in few points indifferent" and of whom Jefferson added that it might "be truly said that never did nature and fortune combine more perfectly to make a man great, and to place him in the same constellation with whatever worthies have merited from man an everlasting remembrance."

One hundred years ago, in the Capital City which Washington founded and which bears his name, Daniel Webster, in eloquent tribute to the character of Washington and in exhortation to that generation to "trust to the influence of Washington's example" declared that "a hundred years hence, other disciples of Washington" would commemorate "his birth, with no less of sincere admiration than" that with which its centenary was then being celebrated.

The second hundred years have passed, and today we have come together to honor the memory of one acclaimed through the world; in the words of Abraham Lincoln: "Washington is the mightiest name of earth—long since mightiest in the cause of civil liberty, still mightiest in moral reformation. On that name no eulogy is expected. It can not be. To add brightness to the sun, or glory to the name of Washington is alike impossible. Let none attempt it. In solemn awe we pronounce the name, and in its naked deathless splendor leave it shining on."

In the words of President Coolidge, who was President at the time of the passage of the Joint Resolution of Congress which provided for the celebration of this Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of our First President: "His was the directing spirit without which there would have been no Independence, no Union, no Constitution, and no Republic. . . . His influence grows. His stature increases with the increasing years. In wisdom of action, in purity of character, he stands alone."

In the words of President Hoover's eloquent address of this morning before the Senate and House of Representatives, members of the President's Cabinet, other officials of our Government and distinguished citizens of our Country, as well as the members of the Diplomatic Corps, and the no less eloquent and to me particularly significant eulogy of Washington by the Cuban Ambassador in the Hall of the Americas of the Pan-American Union, speaking on behalf of the representatives there gathered of all the American republics.

But the true significance of this celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the birth of George Washington is not to be found in official gatherings, no matter how inspiring they may be, as those of this morning in the Pan-American Union and at the Capitol indeed were.

The true significance is expressed in a letter addressed to the Secretary of State by the Director of the United States Commission for the Celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, as follows: "It should be made plain that the George Washington Bicentennial is to be different from any celebration ever held under the auspices of the United States Government. Instead of bringing the people of the United States and other countries to the celebration, the celebration is to be taken to the people everywhere. It is not to be localized in any one place. It is to continue from February 22, 1932, to Thanksgiving Day, November 24, 1932, and it is hoped that Americans in every State, city and town in the United States, as well as those sojourning abroad, will hold their own celebrations during that period, and also other nations will join with the United States in commemorating the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington."

It is with this significance in mind that we have gathered here today, and Americans in Vancouver are, indeed, fortunate in that there exists in this city such a splendid organization as the American Women's Club, to sponsor and prepare such an interesting and significant program. As I know that you are all looking forward to the program, may I without further remarks say that officially I esteem it a great privilege to be here today and that I consider it a great honor at this time to open this George Washington Bicentennial program.

At a public ceremony on Memorial Day, May 30, 1932, in Stanley Park, Vancouver, two Washington elms, one a gift of the American Women's Club and the other of the American Consulate General, were planted on either side of the Harding Memorial, a famous Vancouver civic shrine. The occasion was a signal one not only because of the planting of the trees, but because of the sentiments voiced by the speakers.

Dr. W. B. Burnett, representing the Kiwanis Club of Vancouver, declared that George Washington was not only one of America's greatest heroes but was looked upon as one of Great Britain's illustrious sons. To the large crowd of Americans and Canadians who had assembled for the event, Dr. Burnett said:

Two hundred years ago Almighty God gave to this world a man child destined to become one of the greatest champions of Anglo-Saxon liberties. Americans delight to honor George Washington as the "Father of his country." But no less do we revere him as Britain's illustrious son. Neither has England today any more sacred shrines than the three statues there erected to his memory.

It is a lamentable fact that an all too common opinion of the Revolution of 1776 makes it a revolt of the American Colonists against the deliberate and persistent oppression of the British people. But, as every student of actual history knows, it was no such thing. It was a successful revolt of the American subjects of King George—Britishers all—against his attempted tyranny on this side of the Atlantic.

George the Third was the son of a German prince, who hated England even while he ruled over it, and who could not speak the English language. The great minds in England were solidly with the Revolutionists. And the British people answered King George's appeal for recruits with nothing but jeers. Many notable officers resigned their commissions in the Army rather than serve against their fellows overseas, and General Amherst, the Commander-in-Chief, flatly refused to do so. The troops which fought against the Colonists were mainly Hessians, hired by King George to replace the Britishers who would not fight. When King George failed to fasten his yoke on the necks of the Englishmen who dwelt in America, the Colonies had their independence, and the Britishers at home, acting in full accord and sympathy with their brethren overseas, had ended the last attempt of an English king to become an autocrat. The fall of Yorktown marked the fall of George the Third and the leaders in England knew that George Washington had gained a victory which marked a new milestone in the progress of civil liberty in the Anglo-Saxon world. The plain fact is—the American nation was founded for the express purpose of maintaining those rights which the Colonists claimed as Englishmen.

So today American citizens do well to cross that phantom Boundary line—defended by Good Will and Brotherhood—and plant on British soil a sapling of a tree he loved, in reverent memory of that great man, "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

"Two Empires by the sea
Two nations, great and free,
One anthem raise.
One race, of ancient fame,
One tongue, one faith we claim,
One God, whose glorious name
We love and praise."

The President of the American Women's Club uttered the following dedication and prayer concerning the tree planted by that organization: "I dedicate this tree in memory of all of the brave men who died for our nation. It shall be called the American Women's Club Memorial Tree.

"Almighty God, Who created all life and saw this tree perfect while yet in the seed, I leave it to your tender care. May it grow in grace and beauty. Amen."

In his address of dedication, the American Consul General reviewed the historic activities of the First President and officially united the Government of the United States with the events of the day, speaking as follows:

On occasions such as this it seems fitting to recall the philosophy of our Quaker poet; his calm disdain of gold and power, his patient acceptance of "fortune's bubbles rise and fall," his pleasing doctrine that "who sows a field, or trains a flower, or plants a tree, is more than all."

Man's partnership with Nature, whether in field or garden, is, indeed, significant, and particularly impressive in the planting of a tree; an occasion both solemn, in that it is "fitted to awaken serious reflections," and joyous in its anticipation that the tree will prove to be "a thing of beauty," and "a joy forever."

Is it not, then, peculiarly appropriate that trees should be planted and dedicated this year throughout the United States and in many other countries as evidence of universal celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington and as living monuments to his memory?

Can one fail to be impressed with the peculiarly universal character of such a tribute when it is announced that President Hoover has planted an American elm in the White House grounds, that seedlings from plantings of black walnut seeds from Mount Vernon have been set out in the grounds of the Governor's residence in Juneau, Alaska, and in the government-owned grounds of our Foreign Service buildings in many countries, that States and cities, universities and other institutions, women's clubs, fraternal societies and service clubs, community leaders and school children, have planted and dedicated millions of such living monuments to the memory of Washington?

Can one fail to be impressed with the enduring character of this tribute when one recalls the patriarchal elm at Cambridge and its traditional association with Washington's assumption of command of the Continental Army one hundred and fifty-seven years ago, or when one learns that at Berkeley Springs, West Virginia, there stands a younger, though now truly venerable, elm set out by a young surveyor and which bears the inscription: "This tree was planted by George Washington"?

When we consider that of such living monuments Nature is both architect and builder and that in his partnerships with Nature man's contribution to these monuments is confined to the selection of a site and the dedication of the memorial, may we not feel today that as regards this site at least our part has been well done?

Could there be a more beautiful or inspiring setting for such a memorial, or one more favorable for the handiwork of its architect and builder?

How difficult it is to find words of dedication adequate for such an occasion! And so, in presenting this memorial elm, in the name of the American Consulate General and on behalf of those who are now members of its staff and whose hope it is that this tree will stand through many generations yet to come, I feel that it is appropriate, and particularly in that this tree is now rooted in Canadian soil, to use a line from Wordsworth, and considering that the memorial is both a monument to the Father of Our Country and a good will offering to the country in which we are guests but do not feel ourselves to be strangers, to ask that this American elm be welcomed in this "brotherhood of venerable trees."

The ceremony was observed by 22 veterans of the Spanish-American War, and the service was concluded with a prayer by Archdeacon F. C. C. Heathcote.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

AS SOON as it became known that the Celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington was to extend beyond the boundaries of the United States and be world-wide in scope, officials and citizens of the Dominican Republic displayed a strong desire to participate in the tribute to the memory of George Washington.

After the exercises on February 22 in Santo Domingo City, the capital of the Dominican Republic, the Secretary of State for Foreign Relations, Max Henríquez Ureña, sent the following cablegram to our Secretary of State:

SANTO DOMINGO
FEBRUARY 20, 1932.

PRESIDENT HOOVER,
WASHINGTON D C

SUPREME COUNCIL 33 DOMINICAN REPUBLIC COMMEMORATES SECOND CENTENARY BIRTHDAY ILLUSTRIOUS MASON GEORGE WASHINGTON AND TAKES THIS OPPORTUNITY TO EXPRESS FRATERNAL GREETINGS MASONRY AND PEOPLE UNITED STATES.

LOPEZ PENHA SOUVEREIGN GRAND COMMANDER

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY HONORS WASHINGTON

The most important event of the Bicentennial Celebration in the Dominican Republic took place on February 22 when the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies met in joint session to honor the memory of the First President of the United States on his Two Hundredth Birthday. The meeting was held in the largest hall of the Senate building and was attended by the President of the Republic, General Rafael L. Trujillo, M., members of the diplomatic corps, and specially invited guests.

Shortly before ten o'clock in the morning our Minister, H. F. Arthur Schoenfeld, met the President, at his request, at the Government Palace and rode with him to the Senate where a military guard in dress uniform was drawn up to receive the party. Upon the arrival of the Presidential party the military band played the Dominican national anthem. The group proceeded to the Senate chamber where the meeting was to take place. All visitors had already gathered. After the President and his party took their seats on the speakers' platform the meeting was officially opened.

The President of the Senate, Mario Fermin Cabral, delivered an address on George Washington. As the speaker began a 21-gun salute was fired from the fortress Ozama, a short distance away. At the close of the speech the band played the "Star Spangled Banner."

The address of Señor Fermin Cabral, in translation, is here quoted.

MR. PRESIDENT:

In declaring the National Assembly solemnly opened I speak your name to indicate that it is to your happy suggestion that we owe this session which is the spiritual offering of the Dominican Republic to the glory of the great North American Liberator who lives not only in the hearts of his fellow-citizens but also in the hearts of all citizens of the Western Hemisphere, the glorious fatherland of us all.

This homage is rendered also to our own illustrious compatriots, José Gabriel Luperón and José Western, who fought on American soil with supreme heroism under the banners of Lincoln for the abolition of slavery.

You, Mr. President, are every day accomplishing achievements which bring renown and honor to the Republic. Hence the citizens of the Dominican Republic, the soul and fibre of the nation, desire ever to see you standing glorious and happy on the summit.

MR. MINISTER:

Gentlemen who honor us with your presence. Greetings and welcome to this National Assembly.

A unanimous sentiment of admiration for the memory of a great man, purest flower of public virtue, today brings into association civilized people all over the world to pay homage to the father of the North American nation. Seen from the distance of two centuries, George Washington is the resplendent sun which illumines the earth with the promise of democracy and liberty.

The life of George Washington, like that of all great men in history, is always fresh in the spirit and in the hearts of all generations.

From his earliest years as a soldier, as an indefatigable man of action, Washington showed the temperate character and strength of will which did honor to his race and to his nation.

He began his career as a soldier and tasted the bitterness of adversity at the Monongahela and at Fort Mifflin where his undisputed heroism was put to the proof. He returned to the shelter of Mount Vernon.

Mount Vernon was the sanctuary of his life, his place for meditation and labor. At Mount Vernon he became the man ready to face battle. He had no faith in the pacific solution of the difficulties with England over taxes and he knew that the conflict must be settled by war.

In view of this uncertainty, he unified the common will, conciliated interests, and provided for all the contingencies of the emancipatory campaign, to which he gave life and form in his spirit.

At the Continental Congress his proud military figure and his well-known patriotic labor in the Virginia Assembly awoke the enthusiasm and admiration of the representatives who saw in him the future champion of American liberty.

Therefore when the first shots of liberty were heard which kindled enthusiastic patriotism in the thirteen Anglo-American colonies, the Congress unanimously elected him Commander-in-Chief of the armed forces of the united colonies.

Washington, a man of exceptional qualities for the supreme command of the army, did not hesitate to accept his responsibility as director of the war. He called to his side the veteran soldiers; he disciplined the colonial army which until then had existed only in name; he gave orders, equipped it, and started it toward the field of honor and glory.

The war extended all over the land with varying fortunes.

The struggle was arduous, long, cruel and uninterrupted. The glare of the conflagration rose to the heavens, and the thunder of battle resounded like a sinister messenger over the mountains and seas. Rochambeau and Lafayette, from immortal France, Steuben from Prussia in the day of Frederick the Great, and a thousand other heroes, came to the aid of Washington and achieved the marvelous success of North American independence.

Washington, great and magnificent, still covered with the dust of battle, takes the chair at the Philadelphia Convention and directs those memorable debates in which the most brilliant talent of the epoch took part, at times their disagreements seeming to endanger the very life of the new-born Republic.

But no: determination and the equanimity of George Washington bring final accord and the constitution is adopted. Gladstone termed this document the most marvelous work that the spirit of man has ever accomplished.

Washington, in triumphal progress toward unfading glory, takes the oath as first President of the United States of North America, and with the clear vision of the patriot and outstanding statesman, he organizes the economic and judicial administration, the foundation of the model republic.

In the exercise of the presidency, everything conspires to success. His talent, his ability, his wisdom as a soldier, politician, and statesman, led him to surround himself with efficient collaborators, so efficient that each one of them by himself could move a world. Alexander Hamilton, the Adamsses, Jay, Madison, Morris, Marshall, Jefferson, Knox, Franklin—brilliant constellation of the American flag.

In refusing reelection after his second presidential term, Washington laid down a constitutional principle not written into the Magna Charta of the United States—a principle respected by later generations as the most sacred precept of democratic law.

In transmitting the power and retiring to private life, a never-failing trail of light extended from the Capitol to Mount Vernon, consecrating the political morality which made the ruler the idol of his people. The death of the great leader of independence, of that eagle which ascending to the summits, magnifying them, passed away in the New World on a cloudy December day in 1799, and it seemed as if the sun would never shine again.

Certain it is that Washington did not have the brilliant military qualities of Alexander, Hannibal, Caesar, Napoleon and Bolívar, even though Frederick the Great of Prussia called him the First General in the World.

But, gentlemen, when you think of the United States, with its superabundant life, powerful, with its great institutions, its industries, its commerce, newspapers, agriculture, mines, banks, navy and air fleet, inventions, transcontinental lines, Panama Canal, railroads, and all that constitutes its power, activity and life; when its progress is measured which has embraced every manifestation of human activity in little more than a century and a half, we are overwhelmed, we are amazed, at the gigantic achievement of George Washington, who is without a rival, without an equal in human history.

Stupendous, colossal work which seems to find the space between earth and heaven too confined for its wide and free expansion! The American Revolution exemplified the powerful influence of new ideas of government and democracy which were promulgated and have been firmly adhered to throughout its history, and it had as its immediate consequence the tremendous political convulsion in Europe: the French Revolution.

Loud call to liberty which resounds through the ages like the first reveille of the rights of man!

Then Toussaint Louverture and Dessalines rose against their masters and brought the dawn of redemption to the long night of Haitian slavery.

And Bolívar, like a titan makes the Andes tremble, awakens the eagle, drowsing on the summits, and the glorious eternal epic of South American independence commences.

The circle of European tutelage in America is closed with the sacrifice of José Martí, illumined by the effulgence of the solitary star and by the lustre of the victorious swords of Gómez and Maceo in free Cuba.

All this is George Washington, the liberator, creator and founder of the American nation, whose life unfolded within the greatest and best ordered democracy that human eyes have seen on the face of the planet!

Minister Schoenfeld replied in Spanish. Following the formal ceremony, refreshments were served in an adjoining room of the Senate. The text of Minister Schoenfeld's address is as follows:

The National Assembly of the Dominican Republic by meeting in solemn and special session today participates in a world-wide commemoration of the birth of George Washington two centuries ago. This session, it seems to me, is more than an act of mere courtesy. I do not understand that this ceremony is limited in its significance to a demonstration of respect for the Liberator of Thirteen British Colonies in North America or for the First President of the United States of America.

We are not called on here to give even in barest outline the facts of Washington's career. It is enough to remember that, by the impulse of the unique qualities that were in him, a train of historic events was brought into being, and that he profoundly moved the destiny not only of his country or of this hemisphere but, plainly, of the world. Washington was the founder of the Independence of the United States. He started on its path a relatively small, weak nation. But a mere allusion to the chronological sequence of certain transcendent events which followed the American Revolution suffices to explain some of the significance of his achievements.

Can there be doubt that the events in America between 1776 and the setting up of the Government of the United States under the constitution of 1789 in great measure determined the course of the French Revolution? Does any student of the history of the American Republics deny that the ideas of the French Revolution and the political philosophy of the constitutional system of the United States, controlled the movement which led to the independence and the republican framework of the States that rose on the ruins of the western colonial Empire?

It is true that the movement which resulted in the independence of the Dominican Republic was markedly different in many ways from similar movements elsewhere in America. Duarte, the illustrious founder of Dominican independence, nevertheless grew to maturity in the atmosphere of his time; he absorbed the political thought which then dominated high-minded youth in an awakened world. Hence, it is necessarily true that he and the men of the Trinitaria who were inspired by his passion for the freedom of the Dominican people, were among the direct and legitimate heirs of Washington's political personality, which had already become a glorious tradition.

Our western civilization is often described as involving an antithesis. It is said that the fellow-countrymen of Washington follow a way of life radically different from that for which the Latin Republics of America stand. But is not this a superficial view? The social historian may claim with truth that in many of the outward forms, there is a wide distinction between the customs, manners and practical methods of the peoples represented in the two Americas. But what thoughtful observer who has had occasion in his own experience to live alternately on the eastern and on the western shores of the Atlantic will deny that, as to many of the fundamental factors which in the long run must control the essential development of nations, there is a greater similarity in the outlook and aspirations of our respective American peoples than exists between ourselves and any other national group, regardless of ties of tradition and even of blood? I believe that these basic resemblances arise out of the common necessity of meeting, though it be at different stages, the same basic problems throughout our western world.

Washington in his personal and in his political career was an incarnation of what, for want of a better term, we call Anglo-Saxon civilization. It is not as an Anglo-Saxon, it is not as the incarnation of Anglo-Saxon culture and civilization that Washington stands pre-eminent among the founders of the Greater America. He is pre-eminent rather because he was among the first to realize the necessity for and unquestionably the first to carry into execution the utter severance of the American world from the political control of the Old World. He was able to set us all in the path of realizing our own destiny. He thereby performed a service to humanity for which his memory is held in singular gratitude by us and by men in all countries, including, I venture to add, the successors of the Imperial nations of the time of our struggles for Independence. The great lesson his life taught has been substantially learned—the lesson of political freedom not only for its own sake, but that there might be within the limits set by the requirements of organized society, economic and spiritual freedom.

This ceremony, therefore, so far from being only a courtesy to my country, is an act of solidarity with those who are conscious of the history of the past. This special session satisfies one of the most indispensable of human needs, to which the classic writer has given the name of "hero worship." Hero worship, Carlyle points out, becomes a fact inexpressibly precious; the most solacing fact one sees in the world at present. There is an everlasting hope in it for the management of the world. Had all traditions, arrangements, creeds, societies that men ever instituted, sunk away, this would remain. The certainty of Heroes being sent us; our faculty, our necessity, to reverence Heroes when sent; it shines like a polestar through smoke-clouds, dust-clouds, and all manner of down-rushing and conflagration.

If the brilliant analyst of the French Revolution had in mind another than Washington when he wrote what I have just quoted, the thought he expressed may well occupy us today.

We know only too well from our own experience in recent times the depths of despair, the obstacles apparently insurmountable, the pain and suffering mankind has encountered in the state to which we have brought our affairs. In times like these we do well to lift our eyes to our great men. It is of Washington as a universal Hero that this august Assembly, on behalf of the Dominican people and like the spokesmen of other millions throughout the world, is thinking today, clinging to "an everlasting hope" which is responsive to a universal need.

BICENTENNIAL TREE PLANTED

Following the ceremony at the Senate Building, most of the party proceeded to the "Parque Independencia," the largest park in the capital city, where a small laurel tree presented by the American colony and dedicated to the memory of George Washington was to be planted. A thousand people already had gathered to witness the ceremony.

Mr. William E. Pulliam, Chairman of the Bicentennial Committee of the American colony in the Dominican Republic, made the presentation speech, which was followed by the playing of the "Star Spangled Banner." The tree was planted by the President of the Republic, and the speech of acceptance on behalf of the city was made by the Vice President of the "Ayuntamiento" of Santo Domingo, Licenciado Arturo Logroño. This beautiful ceremony was terminated by the playing of the Dominican national anthem.

The presentation remarks of Mr. Pulliam were as follows:

At the request of the committee appointed for the celebration of this glorious day, and in the name of the entire American colony resident in this country I have the honor to express thanks to you and through you to the entire Dominican nation which has lent its valuable cooperation to give lustre to this ceremony commemorative of the immortal George Washington, father and founder of the United States of America.

Two hundred years ago today George Washington was born. His great heart, his great virtues have made him a world figure; he belongs to the whole universe. His transcendental achievement consisted in establishing firmly the bases of the independence and liberty which are today the patrimony of the whole world and in particular of the Pan American Republics.

Wherever Americans are living today on this earth they will celebrate this glorious bicentennial, and at Santo Domingo we mark this memorable date by presenting to this capital the symbolic Washington Tree, which is the gift of the American colony, which I have the honor to represent through the kindness of my compatriots under the leadership of our Minister, the Honorable H. F. A. Schoenfeld.

This agreeable act is the expression of the cordial relations existing between our two countries and the growth of the tree which we are to plant here will be the measure of the increased cordiality of our future relations.

In ending, gentlemen, let me express our deep and heartfelt gratitude for this splendid testimony of sincere and cordial solidarity.

A translation of the speech of acceptance by Señor Arturo Logroño follows:

Mr. President of the Republic, Mr. Minister of the United States, Ladies and Gentlemen:

No more symbolic act than this could be done to commemorate the Bicentennial of the birth of the great soldier of Wakefield.

To plant a tree in honor of the spirit of the Father of the North American Nation, a tree which merits the name of Tree of Liberty, and to perform this act under the marvelous Antillian sky which seems higher and bluer than other skies, breaking the soil on which was built the first European home in America, all this signifies a most beautiful and eloquent expression of Pan American solidarity and brotherhood in this hour of anxiety through which the world is passing in great spiritual stress—witnessing the revival of barbaric wars and the bankruptcy of international morality.

Pan American solidarity and brotherhood, respect for the rights of others, effective mutual understanding of the souls of each one of the nations of America, which are all legatees of its destiny, sincere cooperation between the leaders, the absence of egotism in mutual relations, these are the necessary factors of indestructible material and formidable force, constituting the firm united front which the American from Alaska to Tierra del Fuego must present to those representatives of obsolete imperialistic aspirations, who seek to tread upon liberty, revive servitude and outrage the rights of man, under the same skies that witnessed the voyage of the ships of Columbus over the lonely wastes of an uncharted ocean and the landing of the Mayflower pilgrims at Plymouth.

In expressing the pleasure it gives the municipality of Santo Domingo to offer to the distinguished North American colony a place in its finest park for the Washington Tree to be planted, my words, inadequate though they be, have nevertheless on this day of brotherhood the privilege of being the words of the oldest city in the New World.

In this old Castilian city our Spanish forefathers built the first church in America; in this city the First Admiral harvested sorrows, suffered the outrage of chains and finally found peaceful repose for his mortal remains; here the eldest son of the immortal navigator, built a strong fortress; and on moonlight nights the city has heard, over the murmuring of the river, the thrumming of Doña María de Toledo; here the stern and terrible Frey Nicolás de Ovando, Commander of the Lares of the Order of Alcantara, the hawk of the Conquest, built watchtowers, temples and bastilles; from here, ventured forth Diego de Velázquez, who conquered Cuba; Ponce de Leon, who conquered Puerto Rico and roamed through the swamps of Florida seeking the fountain of eternal youth; Nicuesa who discovered Central America; Alonso de Ojeda, the bold captain; Hernando Cortés, who was a notary at Azua and the Conqueror of Mexico; Grijalva, who discovered the San Juan River; Rodrigo de Bastidas, who explored the coasts of Colombia and Venezuela and whose son became an Archbishop and now sleeps under the stones of our Primate Cathedral; and Núñez de Balboa, the intrepid discoverer of the Pacific, whose ships were transported on the backs of his soldiers and who proclaimed the triumph of the cross over the waters of the Southern Sea.

So at this moment in history when, happily, the destinies of the nation are entrusted to the young and valiant President, General Rafael Leonidas Trujillo y Molina, and the sun of genuine liberty shines on the Dominican people, it is with legitimate pride that this illustrious city, the capital of the Republic, offers to the distinguished American colony a choice spot for the planting of the symbolic Washington tree.

And as Dominican soil is fertile soil, this tree, the tree of liberty, will soon raise its emerald foliage in this park in luxuriant splendor and as a salutary lesson in patriotism and an invitation to share the brotherhood of the Americas, it will evoke the memory of the great man whose spirit the Dominican people today honor with sincere solemnity.

Leader, precursor of liberty in America, valorous to the point of temerity in the famous campaign in New Jersey and the crossing of the Delaware, under the fire of the enemy on that memorable Christmas of 1776; inflexible, like Bolívar in his crossing of the Andes, enduring the terrible snows of that winter at Valley Forge; simple and generous hero of Yorktown, his chief claim to greatness lies characteristically in the supreme purity of his life.

Father of his country, the great nation redeemed from servitude by his genius and his virtues is worthy of the great man. Glory internationalizes, and Washington, the founder of liberty in the United States, is not the local liberator of a single country but a leader of America and a benefactor of humanity.

Today, all the free nations on the face of the earth, among them the Dominican Nation, stopping for a moment in the turbulent course of their activities, should with respect and devotion turn their loving thoughts to the sanctuary at Mount Vernon where reposes for all eternity the "first in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen."

In the afternoon of February 22 a Bicentennial reception was tendered at the United States legation. This reception was attended by more than two hundred invited guests, among whom were Dominican officials and United States citizens residing in the Dominican Republic.

The day of celebration was brought to a close with a dinner at the Dominican country club, which was followed by the singing of patriotic songs and dancing.

SCHOOLS CELEBRATE

All the schools in the Dominican Republic held Bicentennial commemorative exercises on February 23. The General Superintendent of Education, Dr. Pedro Henríques Ureña, prepared a short paper on George Washington, which was used as the basis of the school exercises. This essay in translation is here quoted:

Yesterday, the 22nd of February, two hundred years were completed since the birth of George Washington, father of the Independence of the United States. In 1776, in North America, thirteen colonies of England decided to separate themselves from their mother country to enjoy political liberty as they wished it, without the hindrances which stood in their way. The decision of those colonies brought war, as was still the custom; only in more recent times have we seen, once in a while, the separation without fighting of two countries which were united; as happened with Sweden and Norway, for example. The English colonies of North America chose to direct the War of Independence a mature man who had shown energy and discretion in his private actions as well as in his public ones. This man was George Washington. He brought the campaign to a happy ending and thus was born the United States, a nation, then small, but which caught the attention of the world as the first modern attempt at democracy after centuries of governments founded on the inequality of the classes: the oppressed of Europe looked upon that nation, native of America, as a reappearance of the ancient democracies of Greece and Rome.

The Republic once established, Washington was the first President. He governed the people as he had commanded the army, with energy and prudence, without ever being moved by vanity of the world or petty interest. All his efforts had only one object: the good of the nation. After governing four years he was reelected President for another four. At the end of his second term the people wished to reelect him but he refused in words which constitute a real political testament, preserved by the United States as if it were law. A saying summarizes the opinion that his contemporaries had of Washington: "First in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen."

The city of Santo Domingo assumed a holiday air on February 22. By an official order Washington's Birthday was declared a national holiday, Schools, public buildings, banks, and other institutions were closed. Everywhere flags of the United States and the Dominican Republic were in evidence. The tribute to the memory of George Washington on his Bicentennial was most sincere. It was another indication of the world fame of the Father of his Country.

Most of the credit for the success of the Bicentennial Celebration in the Dominican Republic is due to the splendid efforts of the Bicentennial committee of American residents of Santo Domingo. Mr. Pulliam was active chairman of the committee and Minister Schoenfeld was honorary chairman. The other members were as follows: Rev. William Wyllie, Walter S. Reineck, Walter L. Fox, P. T. Madsen, N. L. Orme, T. F. Norris, J. E. Wheeler, Victor Jungk, Barney E. Morgan, R. C. Round, H. B. Senior, H. E. Gates, J. E. Brown, Jr., W. H. Davidson, and W. E. Funn.

OTHER BICENTENNIAL EVENTS

On April 14, 1932, the President of the Dominican Republic, Rafael L. Trujillo, sent the following message to the delegates assembled in Washington, D. C., in recognition of Pan American Day. This message was read at the tomb of George Washington at Mount Vernon on the same day:

TO EVOKE THE MEMORY OF GEORGE WASHINGTON ON PAN AMERICAN DAY, ON THE OCCASION OF THE BICENTENARY OF HIS BIRTH, IS THE SAME AS TO REAFFIRM THE CONTINENTAL SIGNIFICANCE OF THIS GREAT CHAMPION OF LIBERTY. THE GLORY OF WASHINGTON AS A SYMBOLIC HERO DOES NOT BELONG EXCLUSIVELY TO THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA; THE WHOLE AMERICAN CONTINENT CLAIMS IT FOR ITSELF. WASHINGTON REPRESENTS THE ADVENT OF REPUBLICAN DEMOCRACY IN THE WORLD, AND THAT LOFTY PRINCIPLE IN THE REALM OF POLITICAL IDEALS WAS DEVELOPED AND CONSOLIDATED IN MODERN TIMES BY THE JOINT EFFORT OF ALL THE NATIONS OF THE NEW WORLD WHEN THEY BECAME INDEPENDENT REPUBLICS. TO AMERICA IS DUE THE STRENGTHENING OF REPUBLICAN

IDEALS, WHICH EACH DAY BECOME MORE AND MORE WIDELY SPREAD THROUGHOUT THE WORLD, AND THE LOFTY FIGURE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON MARKS THE BEGINNING OF THIS NEW STAGE IN THE POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT OF NATIONS.

FERVENTLY ADMIRING THE MILITARY GLORIES AND THE CIVIC VIRTUES OF GEORGE WASHINGTON AND FULLY UNDERSTANDING THE HIGH SIGNIFICANCE OF HIS PERSONALITY, I HAVE THE HONOR, AS A FAITHFUL INTERPRETER OF MY GOVERNMENT AND MY PEOPLE, TO ASSOCIATE THE NAME OF THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC WITH THIS TRIBUTE.

RAFAEL L. TRUJILLO,
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC.

On July Fourth, the anniversary of American independence, a reception was held at the American legation which was attended by Government and municipal officials as well as distinguished citizens.

On Thanksgiving Day, November 24, the Bicentennial Celebration was brought to an official close with Thanksgiving services held in the local Episcopal church.

HONDURAS

OLUMBUS discovered Honduras; Spain subjected the land; Great Britain offered protection, but it remained for an American, George Washington, to show Honduras "how to build on a solid foundation a republic, free, great, affluent, powerful, and commanding universal respect," which was, for this central American nation, the example that heralded its own proudly won independence.

More than a hundred years after this inspired struggle for freedom, Honduras had opportunity, during the George Washington Bicentennial, to express its gratitude for the example set by the Great American. Not fewer than six cities in the country joined in this tribute.

The President of Honduras, His Excellency Vicente Mejia Colindres, commissioned Dr. Don Celeo Davila, Minister from Honduras to the United States, to read the following message on Pan American Day, April 14, 1932, at the graves of George and Martha Washington at Mt. Vernon:

THE GOVERNMENT AND PEOPLE OF HONDURAS JOIN IN THE HOMAGE THAT THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA IS RENDERING TO GEORGE WASHINGTON ON THIS SECOND CENTENARY OF HIS BIRTH.

THE FOUNDER OF THE GREAT AMERICAN REPUBLIC WILL ALWAYS MERIT UNIVERSAL ADMIRATION. SO LONG AS THE SPIRIT OF DEMOCRACY ABIDES IN THE WORLD, THE FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES WHICH HE DEFENDED—THE UNION OF ALL; SACRED RESPECT FOR PUBLIC JUSTICE; THE MAINTENANCE OF PEACE AND HARMONY WITH OTHER NATIONS;

THE BALANCE BETWEEN THE BRANCHES OF GOVERNMENT; TOLERANCE FOR THE OPINIONS OF OTHERS—THESE WILL FOREVER BE AN INEXHAUSTIBLE FOUNT OF INSPIRATION FOR ALL PEOPLES.

THE NATIONS OF AMERICA OWE HIM A DEBT OF GRATITUDE, FOR BY THE MOST CONSTRUCTIVE EXAMPLE THAT THE AGES HAVE SEEN HE SHOWED THEM HOW TO BUILD ON A SOLID FOUNDATION A REPUBLIC, FREE, GREAT, AFFLUENT, POWERFUL, AND COMMANDING UNIVERSAL RESPECT.

VICENTE MEJIA COLINDRES,
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC.

In the capital city, Tegucigalpa, the Bicentennial Celebration opened on Sunday, February 21, when the National Band of Honduras dedicated a complete concert program to Washington. The concert was given on the Plaza Morazan located in one of the principal public parks of the city. Hon. Julius G. Lay, Minister to Honduras from the United States, reports that "a large group of Americans and others enjoyed the concert from the veranda of the International Club facing the park," and that a large crowd surrounded the bandstand. The repertoire was selected from the portfolio of American musicians, "Washington Evening Star March," by Stannard, and several Sousa selections being featured.

More than three hundred invitations were sent out by the American Minister and Mrs. Lay for a Washington reception at the Legation on Feb. 22. The response was evidence of the magic of the name Washington. All of the Honduran officials with few exceptions were present, as well as the foreign diplomatic corps and the American residents of the district. Several out of town guests, including the Consular Corps from Tela, journeyed to Tegucigalpa to attend the reception.

The spacious verandas surrounding the patio and the reception and dining halls were festooned with tropical flowers and foliage, and the flags of the two nations concerned were hung side by side. During the first hour of the reception the National Band of Honduras, offered for the occasion by the President, played in the courtyard of the Legation. At the termination of the band concert a native marimba orchestra supplied the music for the event.

Many floral and written tributes on the occasion were received at the Legation from prominent persons, among them being the President of Honduras, the Rector of the Central University, the Undersecretary of Foreign Affairs, and others. The Consul General of Costa Rica ordered his country's flag to be flown in honor of the "great American patriot," as he described George Washington.

Newspapers of the Tegucigalpa reechoed the Bicentennial theme with great enthusiasm. In the leading journal, EL CRONISTA, on February 22 there appeared a generous account of the celebration planned for the United States, Washington's Farewell Address, Daniel Webster's Washington Centennial Address, a biography of Washington's life, "The American's Creed"; Juan Montalvo's essay, "Washington and Bolívar"; a signed article, "George Washington," by C. Tenorio, and an editorial, "The Bicentennial of Washington's Birth." The last two of the above mentioned articles have been translated from the Spanish and follow in full text.

GEORGE WASHINGTON

Outstanding figure in the annals of North American history, George Washington's name is the creative symbol of the August Democracy in its highest conception. His principles of liberty laid the foundations of a great and powerful nation, whose wise organization was inspired in an evolutionary spirit of supreme vision, to bring to his people beauty, soul, and power. All his plans, ideas, and achievements have proved their worth and today the celebration of the Bicentennial of his birth is proof of the love with which he is looked upon as a father, of the devotion with which he is idolized, the adoration felt for one who has passed over the threshold of divinity.

This day of rejoicing reflects his brilliant past, his genius in all phases of creative thought; as a soldier who became a hero; a statesman who was outstanding among the most distinguished of his epoch, and who is still without a rival; as a philosopher who united eloquence with unanswerable logic. He was born under a lucky star which guided him to the heights of immortality, where, by the side of his eminent comrades in the great crusade the hero of the Union occupies the diamond throne and prays for the great destiny of his country; symbol of that greatest hour of his unfading glory when he supported the Declaration of Independence and the Federal Constitution, he is seen in spirit still governing his country, surrounded by the Pleiades of patriots who in life encouraged him with their valor and the light of their intelligence; Samuel Adams, Benjamin Franklin, Alexander Hamilton, and a series of profound thinkers stand beside him in eternal devotion.

History repeats many memorable episodes of his life with vivid details which contribute to perpetuate his memory in the soul of humanity, especially on the American continent; if his ardent patriotism destined him to face the fatal consequences held in store for him by the reverses of war as he wielded his sword against a colossus boasting his pride of power, he accepted this destiny because there burned in his breast the fire of a martial spirit; in his soul the noble inspiration of pure patriotism, and in his mind the sublime ideal of liberty for his people, vivifying, deifying, with votive offering on the altars of unequaled greatness, resplendent with radiations of the multiple benefits for the future destiny of the continent. The spark of Washington's inspiration kindled the fire of Bolívar's heart that was to impel him to undertake his glorious work; his soul, like that of Washington, was wounded by the suffering of humanity under the burden of slavery, so that he never wavered in his purpose in spite of the adversities that dogged his every step. In his hours of grief, in the disillusionment that he experienced, he looked toward Washington and was comforted and inspired by the magnitude of his dream, he ventured all with unbounded confidence in victory, until victory crowned his temples with the laurels of the Liberator.

One creative genius inspired another to conceive the same high purposes; the two ascend together to the pinnacle of glory, and immortality preserves them like relics in its marvelous sanctuary.

George Washington is not only the father of the great liberty of North America but he contributed to the realization of the Indo-American ideal of liberty. Therefore he is loved by all the nations of the New World.

If the sun on its journey around the world on February 22nd has ever before beheld the United States in such holiday mood since it became a free nation, on this great day the astral king will find the whole world rejoicing as a just reward for the multiple virtues of the chosen son of the North American nation.

THE BICENTENNIAL OF WASHINGTON'S BIRTH

On this day the American nation, and with it the whole world, celebrates the second centennial of the birth of George Washington.

Part of today's edition of EL CRONISTA is dedicated to the commemoration of this event, thus doing honor to the history of the father of the North American democracy.

Washington is one of the great men who have best personified moral sentiments and just ideas, imbuing the soul of the American people with his own honorable and noble feelings, and to these sentiments and these ideas they owe their real greatness.

The independence of the United States contributed greatly to the emancipation of the whole American continent. Europe thereby lost its political power over the new world.

Working and struggling for more than a century and a half, the United States has become the most powerful nation on earth. Canada will become a nation independent of England unless she becomes a part of the American union.

In the near future we shall have only a single continental vinculum thanks to the might of the Anglo-Saxon people.

The virtues of its great men are reflected in its institutions. George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin and many other representatives of its policy and thought, have created in the great federation a respect for man. Individual liberty in the great republic has actuated its integral progress.

On this day, as we publish our admiration for the land of Monroe, we send our cordial greetings to the representative of the United States in Honduras, His Excellency, Mr. Julius G. Lay, associating ourselves with the rejoicing of the North American nation which on this day reverently commemorates the second centenary of the birth of the man who was, is, and ever shall be, "first in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen."

EL MARINO, leading journal of Puerto Cortes, published a special edition on July 4, 1932, in which it was stated: "On the 155th anniversary of the Independence of the United States, EL MARINO takes pleasure in sending a cordial greeting to the American people, in whose honor and in remembrance of their heroes and of the American colony resident in the Republic of Honduras this edition is published.

An editorial in the same issue reaffirms the above sentiment, saying:

"As a tribute of sympathy to the American people who today are commemorating the 155th anniversary of their political Independence and the Bicentennial of George Washington, we have prepared this special edition, small in size but great in the sincerity and justice of its estimation of the Heroes who sacrificed themselves to give liberty to that great nation which is justly proud of being the creator and the cultivator of democracy."

A signed editorial in this special edition, titled "George Washington," sets forth a sincere estimate of the great American from a Latin American viewpoint as follows:

GEORGE WASHINGTON

This is the greatest name registered in the history of the United States of North America. Washington was the eponymous hero who bequeathed the immortal inheritance of liberty and independence to the North Americans.

History with its chronological studies is the best judge to determine who are the outstanding men of the ages, who like Washington, Franklin, Jefferson and Madison, have given the stamp of honor and glory to the Anglo-Saxon race.

England, mistress of these dominions, brought his ancestors over to fructify the seeds of progress and civilization which before Nelson had not known how to use the talent she was endowed with. Of this virile lineage were born those illustrious men who rose to be statesmen, to deliberate, and to achieve sovereign rights for a country which by its size and population deserved them. And thus it was that Washington gave himself in soul and heart to winning the victory, and as an upright citizen, a philosopher, a lover of justice and liberty, undertook the great crusade of emancipation from 1775 to 1789 when he became President of the Republic by the unanimous will of the people. Difficult was his struggle with the English; but thus it had to be to earn for him the undying veneration of a nation which idolizes him and loves him for the sincere patriotism he displayed in winning for his people the highest and greatest privilege of sovereignty. The times have changed, but the name of Washington does not pass away, will never die; he is always present watching over his sons and illumining the pathway that they must follow to avoid not conspiracies against the nation but a conflagration which would destroy all his patriarchal work of redemption.

Washington and Bolívar were twin brothers who passed like giants from one spot to another defying the storms of the ocean and the unchained fury of the heavens, but they like Nereus were victorious; the former in North America, the latter in South. Therefore they are great and from Olympus ride on the wings of the Phoenix which soars in space on every 4th of July, the day on which North American Independence was proclaimed, with true love of justice and liberty.

Therefore putting aside this day our prejudices and differences of opinion, we clap our hands to the rhythm of the loud clarion calls in token of brotherly gratitude to the sons of the great American nation which displays the beautiful banner of the Stars and Stripes of the North.

La Ceiba, Honduras, celebrated in honor of George Washington on Independence Day, 1932, when the local American Club sponsored a Bicentennial dance and festival. The American Vice-Consul at La Ceiba, Hon. Warren C. Stewart, reports that "the decorations used were patriotically designed to honor Washington, and all available portraits of him were hung in the dance hall." A large crowd attended. The only other Washington observance in this city was a special program at the local American school, at which Consul Stewart was the principal speaker. A framed portrait of Washington was presented to the school on this occasion.

Only eighteen American children were resident in Puerto Castilla, Honduras, during 1932, but "for the benefit of these children the teachers in the public school held a ceremony on February 22nd in memory of George Washington's 200th birth anniversary, to which parents and others were invited." So reports Hon. Lyon H. Schraud, American Vice-Consul, and continuing, says: "The program consisted of a little play, 'Washington,' in which the parts were taken by the children; the singing of patriotic songs, in which the adults joined, and the presentation of a picture of Washington to the school by Vice Consul Henry S. Haines, who was then at this post and who also made a speech on the subject of George Washington."

On July 16-17 the older American people at Puerto Castilla honored Washington at an outdoor festival, at which American games were enjoyed by a large crowd.

EGYPT

WHEN George Washington was born, the Kingdom of Egypt had made more than sixty centuries of history and its background was the fabric of civilization, but Egypt recognized in George Washington a hero and a sage comparable with the greatest of its ancients and therefore joined with the world in celebrating the two-hundredth anniversary of his birth.

Bicentennial programs and festivals were held in Cairo and Alexandria; the school children in the Valley of the Nile were supplied with Washington literature to acquaint them with the life and times of the First President of the United States; and Egyptian statesmen voiced the sentiment of their nation with respect to Washington and the United States.

The Kingdom of Egypt issued its message of congratulation to the Government of the United States upon the occasion of the Bicentennial in the form of a display in the public press. The special Bicentennial edition of the WASHINGTON TIMES, Washington, D. C., for May 30, 1932, contained in bold type the following official declaration:

THE KINGDOM OF EGYPT
FELICITATES THE
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
UPON THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF ITS FIRST PRESIDENT

In the same edition the Minister from Egypt, Sesostri Sidarouss Pasha, testified to the strength of the fraternal bonds uniting America with Egypt.

Through the Royal Egyptian Legation at Washington, a copy of the Stuart portrait of George Washington was presented by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission to the Egyptian Government, and the following acknowledgment thereof was received from the Egyptian Minister:

I have the honour to inform you that the Egyptian Government has written to this Legation asking me to forward to you their sincere thanks for the very beautiful portrait of George Washington which you sent them through this Legation.

While extending to you the expression of their great appreciation for this kind gift, I wish to avail myself of this opportunity to congratulate you upon the success of the celebration of the two-hundredth anniversary of the birth of your First President and World Patriot, George Washington.

From the American Minister in Cairo, Egypt, Hon. W. M. Jardine, the following report was received of the Bicentennial celebration there on Washington's birthday, 1932:

The two-hundredth anniversary of George Washington's birth was fittingly celebrated by the American colony in Cairo on the evening of the 22nd of February at the Legation. About 250 American residents of Cairo and Americans visiting Cairo at the time were the guests of the Minister and Mrs. Jardine.

The halls and salons of the Legation were beautifully decorated with American flags and fresh flowers, by Mr. I. Cushman Gray of the Legation staff, and each guest was presented with a small American flag.

A most delightful program had been arranged by the American Women's Club of Cairo, the participants therein being dressed in costumes of the eighteenth century which were kindly loaned the Women's Club by the Royal Opera House through the special courtesy of the Egyptian Ministry of Public Instruction. Mr. Cleland, Dean of the American University at Cairo, opened the program by a short address, which was followed by the reciting of the Pledge and the Creed by all in attendance. Miss Anna Lee Grainger danced a charming minuet. Mrs. Howard played a medley of American songs of the period, and Miss Ann Freshman and Professor Reubendahl also danced a minuet. The program closed with the entire assemblage singing "America."

Upon the conclusion of the program, the guests were served with appropriate refreshments.

A miscellaneous selection of George Washington literature was sent to the headquarters of the Near East Foundation in New York City in the hope that it would be forwarded for use to proper sources in Egypt. Mr. L. N. Davidson, director of the Near East Foundation, acknowledging the receipt and pointing out the utilization of this literature, said:

I recently received some printed matter and music from the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, for which please accept the sincere thanks of myself and that of more than 2,500 orphan boys and girls in Egypt under the supervision of the Near East Foundation.

On the evening of Washington's birthday, 1932, the American colony in Alexandria, Egypt, assembled at the home of Judge Robert L. Henry, American Representative, Mixed Court of First Instance, and gave honor to the name of George Washington in that ancient city. The American Consul, Hon. H. Earl Russell, reported "about 80 people present, including most of the Americans in the city of Alexandria, who witnessed a program commemorative of the day, composed of the reading of Washington's Farewell Address and of various articles received from the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission describing different periods in the life of the First President."

On March 11, 1932, on the occasion of a visit of the American Minister, Hon. William M. Jardine, and Mrs. Jardine to Alexandria, the American Men's and the American Women's Clubs combined and held a Bicentennial dinner on board the S. S. Excalibur of the American Export Lines, then in port at Alexandria. The Minister delivered an address appropriate to the occasion in which he enumerated the high standards of living advocated and practiced by George Washington.

The American Women's Club of Alexandria included in its 1932 study program the biography of George Washington and historical material to aid in this study was furnished by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission.

EL SALVADOR

 JOINING with all other Latin-American Republics, President Martínez, of El Salvador, sent the following message, which was read at the tomb of George Washington on Pan American Day, April 14, 1932:

ON THE AUSPICIOUS OCCASION OF PAN AMERICAN DAY, I HAVE THE HONOR OF OFFERING MY ADMIRING HOMAGE TO

THE MEMORY OF THE GREAT PATRIOT, GEORGE WASHINGTON, AND OF PAYING MY RESPECTS TO THE PAN AMERICAN UNION, WHICH I FERVENTLY HOPE WILL CONTINUE TO BE A BOND OF UNION, A BULWARK OF JUSTICE, AND A STRONG TIE JOINING THE AMERICAS IN CONSTRUCTIVE BROTHERHOOD.

MAXIMILIANO HERNANDEZ MARTINEZ,
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC

BOLIVIA

 HE George Washington Bicentennial Celebration in Bolivia began in a most auspicious manner. Citizens of that Republic joined with United States residents in Bolivia in recalling the Two Hundredth Birthday of George Washington, and in honoring his memory. Public officials, the school and the press showed by their activities the reverence in which the name of George Washington is held in Bolivia.

The United States Minister, Hon. Edward F. Feely, tendered a reception on February 22nd at the United States Legation in La Paz, the Capital city of Bolivia. Attending this memorable gathering were the President of the Republic of Bolivia, the Cabinet, the diplomatic corps and some three hundred invited guests.

The schools of Bolivia, acting in accordance with an order from the Director General of Instruction, Señor Roberto Bilboa la Vieja, held commemorative exercises on February 22. Speaking editorially in its issue of February 19, LA RAZÓN, one of the leading newspapers of Bolivia, commented as follows:

We can do no less than applaud the initiative taken by the Director General, and it is to be desired that all educational institutions hasten to render homage to the North American leader.

SCHOOLS PARTICIPATE IN BICENTENNIAL

The circular of the Director General, calling for school participation in the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration, was addressed to the principals of the schools and read as follows:

The Bicentennial of George Washington's birth occurring on the 22nd of the present month, the Office of the Director General of Instruction has resolved to recommend that you hold exercises commemorative of this great event in the school under your direction.

The object of this celebration is to afford students the spectacle of an exemplary life animated at every instant by the most noble virtues, which extended through his constant practice to forge an outstanding personality in the life of the nation.

Your professor of General History, whom you will ask to prepare an essay on the subject, should emphasize the importance of the North American Revolution of Independence in the fight for democratic institutions throughout the world, pointing out the importance of its favorable outcome on the French Revolution and on the War of Independence of the American nations that were until then subject to Spain.

The Office of the Director General hopes to receive a report on your compliance with this suggestion.

VICE PRESIDENT EULOGIZES WASHINGTON

The American School Association of Bolivia published a special Bicentennial number of its magazine in which the leading article entitled "A Historical Parallel" was contributed by Dr. Jose Luis Tejada S., Vice President of the Republic of Bolivia. The article is here quoted:

Naturalists, in their investigations of tropical flora, find in certain regions groups of plants and flowers which are not found again over immense stretches of territory however much they may present the same physical conditions. There is something mysterious and unknown which thus reunites and isolates in determined environs, certain creations of Nature. In the well-filled chapters of human history a like phenomenon may be observed in men. Through the centuries pass men out of whose brains come the most varied concepts, and whose activities are widely diversified. Suddenly, however, in countries widely separated, one from another, and as though in response to the fulfillment of laws not yet determined, there appear in different parts of the world extraordinary beings, endowed with similar faculties, animated by like conceptions and impelled by the same dynamic power.

The latter years of the Eighteenth Century and the beginning of the Nineteenth Century offer one of these singular examples. During the period of less than 25 years history records the activities of three men outstanding in the similarity of their political conceptions and in the grandeur and tenacity with which they have played their parts, men who have won for themselves not only the love but the admiration of the generations in which they lived, as well as of those which followed.

In the two Americas and in Western Europe, separated as they then were by an immense distance, and isolated by the lack of an immediate and close spiritual contact, there appear three unusual figures: Washington in the North; Bolívar in the South; and Napoleon in Europe.

These three men realize their historic destinies almost at the same time. All are warriors, directing and employing force for the realization of their ideals, but all three of them maintain with their swords new political concepts which are to make radical changes in human thought, and all three devote themselves fearlessly, with the support of the armies they lead, to the opening of the broad path which the human race has followed in search of liberty and welfare.

Each of these geniuses plays his part in completely different surroundings. Each of them finds in his path varied conditions, and must overcome obstacles of a different kind, but all of them are enthusiastic in their struggle for the accomplishment of analogous purposes.

It fell to Washington to direct along the path which was to lead his people to independence, democratic forces already formed, and which in their incipient development had already felt the urge of liberty. His compatriots are descendants of those Saxon emigrants who abandoned their homes in response to definite ideas of liberty of conscience, and of autonomy for their productive capacities. These tendencies had already crystallized in the organization of colonial assemblies embodying local aspirations of the people and serving as a guide for their collective efforts. It was the work of Washington and his collaborators to extend the scope of their activities; to transform those local assemblies into national institutions; to offer them as a basis of solidarity, ideals whose scope made necessary a close union, and to defend their decisions through the medium of armies made up of colonists poorly disciplined at first, it is true, but all conscious of the great purposes in view.

Napoleon inherits from the holocaust of the Revolution a concept of liberty which is to find in the political entities of Europe a formidable obstacle to its extension and implantation. His initial labor is therefore principally one of demolition. At the passage of his armies, dazzled by the glowing radiance shed by the warlike genius of their leader, the most solid of the European thrones totter and fall; the strongest alliances are shattered; even the Papacy trembles, and the impetus of his power and the pressure of his ambition demoralizes and upsets the organization of Spain, thus lending to the cause of South America an unexpected support, which undoubtedly represents one of the outstanding factors in the successful outcome of the revolution that was to set free the peoples of this continent.

Bolívar plays his part in surroundings entirely unlike those of the others. His conceptions bear the characteristic stamp of genius. His activities are to extend over immense reaches of disorganized countries where Nature on a stupendous scale has wrought formidable contrasts which present unforeseen physical difficulties, and where man through early breeding with the autochthonous element has originated moral problems entirely unknown to his rivals for glory. The human element which he is called upon to employ hardly realizes its destiny. It follows with enthusiasm the glitter of his victorious sword, and is not dismayed in the face of defeat but is not remarkable either for discipline or organization.

Two hundred years have passed since the birth of George Washington, and in the remembrance of his action and the results of his eminently constructive work a cold analysis cannot but honor him by ascribing to him the cognomen—democrat. Napoleon could not resist the intoxication of his victories, and his soul soon yielded to ambitions which stained the purity of the democratic creed. He became an autocrat, was crowned Emperor, and made himself the absolute dictator of the destinies of his people, and through them of a part of the destinies of Central Europe.

Bolívar, impelled perhaps by disappointment, skeptical it may be of the success of the results of his sword had achieved, conceived the idea of a life-term presidency and proposed it as a solution, quite in contrast undoubtedly to his early republican ideas.

Washington, on the other hand, at the zenith of his power and glory, did not for a single instant vary the simple and constructive democratic concepts which urged him to action. He carefully organized his country, conceived and recommended its isolation from the rest of the world as a means of dedicating to the conquest of its grandeur and its happiness the maximum of its efforts, and when admired and, one might say, idolized by his compatriots, he was urged, not to perpetuate himself in office, but only to prolong his term of office, he declined the signal honor with true democratic simplicity, and gave to his people and to democracy in general the noblest and most remarkable example of austerity and loyalty of principle.

In the parallel that naturally results from a comparison of the conceptions and activities of the great chieftains who initiated the modern period of history, Washington emerges as greater in his democratic simplicity; more admirable in his altruism and more austere in his conduct than the other great geniuses who with equal or greater aptitude than his, with equal or greater glories and with victories perhaps more difficult to obtain, were unable to remain loyal to the straight line of pure idealism.

Washington, therefore, from a national hero soon reached the undisputed state of a hero of humanity, and two centuries from the time of his birth, humanity has no other prototype so complete, no other guide so worthy of leading it by his example.

WASHINGTON PRAISED BY PRESS

In the January-February issue of the magazine BOLIVIA published in New York appeared the following editorial:

GEORGE WASHINGTON—1732-1932

On February 22nd the American people render a tribute to George Washington which is to be the greatest ever paid to any man in the history of the United States. February 22nd has always been a day with deep and sacred meaning to all Americans, but in this year of 1932 it takes on a profound historical significance.

But on this anniversary of his own birth, our thoughts turn to him, not so much for what he did, as for what he was in himself, as a man and a human being. And now at last, in 1932, two hundred years after he entered the world, we believe we know George Washington, the man, for the first time. Up to this time he has held first rank among North Americans without dispute. He had been their most famous man—but the least known of all. For all these years we have had of him the false impression that he was cold and distant, a great figure but a marble statue, so far aloof that we could not draw near him. Now we know him at last for the warm and deep-hearted human being that he was.

BOLIVIA is happy to be able to pay its tribute to this great man, and in doing so our thoughts unconsciously turn to the other great emancipators of his time: Bolívar, Sucre, San Martín, and others, whose unparalleled deeds have in South America immortalized them as the greatest liberators of humanity. We should all pride ourselves in the men who have launched our nations, and one thought should possess us all—that this splendid group of men were Americans.

We have the feeling that we are no longer laying wreaths at the foot of a mere statue; we are calling across the years to a man who would, if he could, return our respect and affection in warm and living tones.

"Washington the Man" by Professor Abel Alarcón, formerly Under Secretary of Education of Bolivia, appeared in the same issue:

It is difficult to conceive a new form of praise for the figure of George Washington, the warrior, the statesman, and the lover of science. Nothing could be added to the admiring phrases which are dedicated to him by more than four hundred biographers, not including the recent contributions by the investigators of documents, who, in their negative eagerness to find imperfections in the private life of the hero, have brought out another positive quality to admire; which is that he was not the being whom legend deified, but a human and real one—flesh and bone as was Rodrigo Díaz de Vivar, like him prudent and skillful, like him simple and patriarchal.

Some become childishly indignant because it is stated that he sometimes enjoyed wine. If that statement is correct, would not the wine be as comforting and as inspiring as that which Jesus himself tasted? It should be from that good, seasonable, and measured cup about which the virtuous and wise Gonzalo de Berceo speaks; and joy in that wine in no manner diminishes the moral size of the patrician.

Some one, in order to terrify the prudens and hypocrites, infers, from the dust of a letter, that Washington was once in love with a married woman. Were that assertion true, would not his love be like that of the Hispalense poet for Doña Leonor de Milán Countess of Gelves? . . . And might not that platonic love have been the inspiration, a fire to his proclamation as it is the perfume of the stanzas of the divine Herrera? . . .

To think that such references—with or without foundation—could obscure the brilliancy of the warrior, is the same as thinking that a lady's handkerchief could cause a shadow on a colossal mountain.

From the perspective of history filled with the vivid color of his deeds, and from the half-tints that we have in his personal documents, Washington appears immense, dominating over a new creation of society and state. The only true fact is that Washington has been, is, and will always be a genius, because he foresaw a democracy as vast as America, and in this he is similar to the Libertador. He, like Bolívar, king of liberty, with his thought and sword converted to fact that which was theory in the transparent mind of the Athenian philosophers. The Libertador, inspired by the ideal that "the supremacy of the people in the only real authority of nations," created republics; Washington, inspired by the ideal of social and political equality, combined colonies and gave them the unity of a great republic.

When one remembers what is due to the virtues of the first President of the United States and ascertains that one of them was modesty, it evokes the figure of Sucre, to whom Bolívar, in the Palace of La Paz, gave his own laurel as if to the deliverer of Perú in the field of fire and glory of Ayacucho. Sucre, who, like Fray Luis de León, loved retirement, and hence like Washington was not fascinated by the possession of power, after having been "the warrior who appeared in the mountain as if he had descended from heaven, threw thunderbolts at the enemies of America," according to the magnificent hyperbole of the wonderful Juan Montalvo.

Thanks to this trinity of men, glory of the World of Colón, democracy is a fact in the sense that all men are equal. Now what is the task reserved to the intellectual youth of America? The task is to interpret with uprightness the other side of democracy, that is to say, mainly the democracy of selection. Crude collective passion—erroneously called politics—which enthrones only despicable and mediocre persons can not bring into action this kind of democracy; it must be done by means of a high culture, by which one is able to judge those who are the fittest men to enact the rule of the best ones. The new democracy must consist in the predominance of the aristocracy of thought, concerning which Bolívar dreamed "to lead free men with the principles embraced by cultured nations."

Today there is more than patriotic homage with flags around the creator of the United States of America; there is a peculiar coincidence, and that is that while the investigators are searching out from the dusty manuscripts the true moral figure of Washington, the sculptor brings out from the flank of a mountain the dominant face of the hero. He is immortalized in rock as well as in books. . . .

CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES HONORS WASHINGTON

A unique Bicentennial ceremony was held in the Hall of the Chamber of Deputies of Bolivia on February 22nd. Due homage was rendered George Washington in an address by the President of the Chamber, the Honorable G. Rios Bridoux. A translation of this memorable speech follows:

To dare to bring to life once more men of the past, bringing them into the recollection of our generation, and to trace the history of their struggles and their triumphs, as a sublime example to imitate, is the labor of an investigator and an artist.

For those upon whom, without any personal merit, falls the duty demanded by circumstances, we can only request the benevolence of those who listen to us. George Washington was the man of Plutarch, the great warrior of the American epic, and as Bolivians we must consider him our brother and the father of the new generation of the American Continent.

A warrior, an eminent statesman, a politician of singular brilliance, he was outstanding in the capacity of his thought and the power of his action; in his sagacity and prudence in affairs of state, as well as in the insignificant and routine matters of daily life; in his training in the science of war, as well as in problems of a social order. His spirit floated in a diaphanous atmosphere, impelling him to live and to die for the new American fatherland.

Iron-willed and unconquerable, his glory culminated in his Jersey campaign and with the victorious laurels of Yorktown. Judging that his work had finished, he thought of retiring to his home and fireside, after having offered his blood and his life in the interests of the sacred fatherland. A man of superior intelligence, he showed unlimited detachment in the midst of ambitious passions; and for this reason the justice of his fellow-citizens rendered him honors as to no other person, exercising great influence on the destinies of his country.

He refused to declare himself dictator of the Colonies. He did not, however, shrink in fear from the difficulties which confronted them, but assumed the Presidency of the Confederation, elected by a unique and rare unanimity. In such a way lived this extraordinary man, to whom history does all honor and justice. Today all men in all latitudes bare their heads before his effigy in bronze. He is presented as the model of a gentleman, to be admired for his shining intelligence, his heroic valor, his abnegation and unselfishness which have never been belied.

Honorable Deputies:

With our reverent remembrance let us honor today one of the greatest paladins in the history of the world.

Let honor and glory forever be given to George Washington.

PAN AMERICAN DAY TRIBUTE

On Pan American Day, April 14, 1932, the Pan American Union in Washington, D. C., received the following Bicentennial testimonial from the Republic of Bolivia which was read at the tomb of George Washington at Mount Vernon, on that day:

THE PEOPLE AND THE GOVERNMENT OF BOLIVIA JOIN IN THIS CELEBRATION AND ARE PROUD TO PAY A TRIBUTE OF LOVING RESPECT AND ADMIRATION TO GEORGE WASHINGTON, THE FATHER OF AMERICAN DEMOCRACY.

DANIEL SALAMANCA,
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC.

Plans which were made in Bolivia for the latter part of the Bicentennial period, because of difficulties which arose between Paraguay and Bolivia in the middle of June, could not be carried out. On July 4 and on November 24, the closing day of the Bicentennial Celebration, Bicentennial gatherings were held at the United States Legation but only citizens of the United States attended these quiet and intimate meetings. Out of courtesy to the Bolivian people all social events and celebrations were suspended by the various legations in La Paz.

ECUADOR

ECUADOR, the republic which prides itself on being "the cradle of South American independence," celebrated the Bicentennial of George Washington's birth in a fitting and inspiring manner.

In numerous Bicentennial programs and exercises, the name of George Washington was hailed and praised. The eulogy of Bolivar on Washington, "the first-born son of the New World," was declared with sincerity and fervor in ardent speeches by Ecuadorians. Everywhere there was enthusiasm. To judge by the reverence and respect in which the name of George Washington is held in Ecuador, to judge by the unstinting praise of his life and deeds sounded during the Bicentennial Celebration, one would think that George Washington was born in Ecuador rather than in the United States.

All people and organizations in Ecuador joined in honoring the memory of George Washington on the two hundredth anniversary of his birth: public officials, the churches, learned societies, resident Americans, the schools, the press, libraries, and the man in the street—all joined in tribute to George Washington.

CAPITAL CITY TAKES LEAD IN CELEBRATION

Quito, the capital of Ecuador, took the lead in the Bicentennial Celebration. Here, we can merely record the highlights of the events honoring George Washington which were held in that city.

On the morning of Sunday, February 21, a brief Bicentennial service, in English, was conducted at the Mission Chapel which is maintained in Quito by the Christian and Missionary Alliance of the Ecuadorian and Southern Colombian Mission. The services were conducted by the Reverend Stuart Clark. The American Minister to Ecuador, Mr. William Dawson, in his report to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, stated: "It should be noted that, although the occasion was not official and no individual invitations were issued, the Minister for Foreign Affairs and his wife, made a point of being present."

On Sunday afternoon, Minister and Mrs. Dawson received the small American Colony at the American Legation. Some thirty Americans attended the reception. Sunday evening was featured by a radio broadcast. In addition to several musical numbers there was an address by Señor Carlos Manuel Larrea, Minister for Foreign Affairs, which was followed by a brief address by Minister Dawson.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS MINISTER DELIVERS EULOGY

The address by Señor Carlos Manuel Larrea, was both learned and inspiring. The speech, in translation, was as follows:

Two centuries ago, in the State of Virginia, was born a man who with the passage of time was to be one of the founders of the great Republic of the United States and its first President.

Ecuador desires to take part in the homage which all the free nations of the earth are paying to the memory of the great American who was destined by Providence to be the liberator of a great Nation. Naturally my country could not remain indifferent to the celebration of the Bicentennial of the birth of George Washington. Could Ecuador, which boasts the glorious distinction of having been the cradle of Spanish American independence, remain unaffected by an event like this? Land of liberty, home of democracy, Ecuador thrills to the memory of the deeds of heroes who everywhere fought to gain that divine gift. Ecuador therefore desires to add its voice to the concert of nations celebrating the birth of the "first-born son of the New World," as Bolivar called him.

But my words cannot add one leaf of laurel to the crown which immortality has placed on the brow of the great Washington. This is not the occasion to enter into an analysis of the great deeds of history in which the figure of Washington appears in the front rank. Nor do I seek to recapitulate the exemplary life which in its general outlines the whole world knows.

The lives of great men present so many aspects that they are an inexhaustible fount for the historian and the philosopher.

Hundreds of volumes have been written about Washington, and in this immense reservoir humanity for centuries will continue to see reflected in purest colors virtue and heroism, valor and prudence, energy and constancy, moderation and simplicity, dignity and greatness.

As the centuries pass, man will ever penetrate deeper into the wonderful web of events and the qualities of the man who took part in them, seeing ever more exactly the concatenation of events with their consequences in history; and the influence of the man on the fate of the Nation and on the destiny of the people will be ever more clearly understood. The echoes still resound of the letter of farewell in which the illustrious citizen upon relinquishing power, sought to leave to the nation the final counsel of his wisdom and experience. And the policy of the great Republic of the North has not relegated this counsel to oblivion.

In the light of criticism and the philosophy of history, the fame of great personages, which stand like milestones along the pathway of the centuries, is purified day by day; and the judgment of the generations which view them from afar approaches ever nearer to the truth. With the details lost, only the general outlines remain; but the maxim of Bossuet holds always true, that "true glory accords only with merit." Only the memory of the truly great survives.

But the historian cannot be content with the vision of an epoch or a human life as a whole. As the naturalist examines with powerful lens the tissues which hold the sap of the plant, so the historian gathers together the small facts, the seemingly insignificant events, which not infrequently bear in them the seeds of great accomplishments.

The astronomer is not content merely to contemplate the spectacle of a clear night with thousands of stars studding the firmament. He must calculate their distances, seek the laws which rule their movement, their orbits, and their course in space. In the same way the historian cannot be content with the luminous vision which great men have left in the firmament of history; but must try to discover the many influences they exercised with their ideas and their deeds and seek to view them against the background of their times, to form a just opinion of their true value and importance.

The name of Washington is engraved in letters of gold on the pages of history. His life offers as many admirable aspects as the light which breaks into all the marvelous colors of the rainbow when reflected by the multiple facets of a jewel.

Briefly I wish to speak of one aspect of the great figure of Washington: the statesman, the leader who, without losing contact with reality for one moment, lived all his life under the inspiration of an ideal.

To lead requires always and everywhere the employment of the highest human faculties. But he is not a leader who has been elevated momentarily by the whims of politics like the foam which appears on the crest of the wave only to vanish and be destroyed. He is not a leader who has reached the summit by the forbidden paths of intrigue and egotism only to satisfy his own vainglorious desire. He is not a leader to whom Destiny has entrusted power and in whose inexperienced hands it becomes an instrument of personal profit or of evil interests. The real leader is he who, endowed with the highest understanding and uniting in himself the multiple gifts required by his enormous responsibility, feels himself capable of fixing the course to be followed by the people and leading the nation to the attainment of an ideal. His mission is one of arduous labor, of sacrifice; his reward success. The goal of all his actions is the realization of an ideal.

Such was George Washington, a man with a great ideal which he pursued tenaciously from his earliest youth until, laden with years and with honors, he passed quietly away into the regions of eternity.

And what was Washington's ideal?

The Independence of his Country, the liberty of his fellow-citizens.

And what ideal is there more noble and exalted than that of achieving the felicity of one's country?

"If there was a cause that was just and deserving of success," says an historian, "it was that of the English colonies which rose in rebellion to become the United States of America. They made resistance precedent to rebellion; resistance based on historical right and facts, on reasonable right and ideas."

England herself had implanted in her colonies the germs of liberty by granting the charters which conferred on the colonists the same rights that the citizens of the mother country enjoyed. Those charters, which do honor to the English Government, were not a dead letter; they established institutions and customs based on right. The colonists by these charters were to supervise the government and participate in it. These were institutions and customs which could not fail to develop the sentiment of liberty within the spirit of respect for the law. These elements, which are to nations what air and sunlight are to plants, brought the former English colonies in the middle of the Eighteenth Century to a high level of progress. As the population grew, commerce too had grown and the well-being and culture of the colonists. The philosophical spirit which inspired the social and political movement that was to transform Europe in the Eighteenth Century and prepare the way for the great achievements of modern times, was, in America, joined to religious ideas. On the solid foundations of reason and faith developed the strong and powerful love of right and liberty. But in Europe the ambitions of the ruling houses, the jealousy of the old monarchies which aspired to extend their dominions were fomenting war. And to prosecute the war and provide for the huge expenditures required by the art of destruction England, availing herself of her right as the mother country, sought to dispose of the goods and the fate of the colonies without their consent. King George the Third and his Parliament, not only because of the necessities of war, but also because of his proud desire to make the force of the mother country's unlimited power felt on his distant dominions, sought to impose taxes on the colonies without consulting their wishes. Immediately the spirit of Right surged up, ardent and powerful. A national party was formed to resist the imposition. The ideal of fighting for the honor of the country arose, and the figure of Washington appears as the incarnation of this principle. The honor of the country, right, liberty; here are the noble postulates which the great man was to pursue during his whole life. With iron will, with unshakable constancy, with calm and firm decision, he consecrated his life to the service of this sublime cause, and for a space of more than eight years, while the great struggle for the independence of the United States of America was going on, he kept this ideal like a flaming torch before the eyes of the men of the national party, men of widely different ideas, young and old, radicals and conservatives.

"By rare good fortune," says the historian Cantu, "everything conspired to favor the insurgent colonies. Their cause was just, their power great, their purpose moral and prudent; local laws and customs, ancient deeds and modern ideas, all were in harmony to sustain them and inspire them in their vast plan; in Europe great alliances were forming to support them: even in the counsels of the enemy mother country they counted on powerful allies; never in the history of human society had a new and disputed right ever obtained such favor, nor had a struggle ever begun with such probabilities of success. Nevertheless, what obstacles the enterprise encountered! What difficulties, what misfortunes it brought upon the generation destined to carry it out! How often it appeared to be, and really was, on the point of failure!"

But when a man has consecrated to the service of a cause all his energies, all his intelligence, all his desires, and when he has for his lodestar an ideal sublime but not impossible or Utopian guiding him like a powerful beacon, difficulties become a stimulus and obstacles an occasion for proving his genius.

George Washington was a man of realities; but he was always inspired by his ideal, and the new efforts and new sacrifices that he had to make at every step, instead of discouraging him, strengthened him and increased his stature. "I believe, or at least I hope," he wrote to Bryan Fairfax, "that there is public virtue enough left among us to deny ourselves everything except the bare necessities of life to accomplish this end." Thus, with great simplicity, did Washington outline the program of heroism necessary to achieve the ideal.

As happened in the case of the independence of Ecuador, the sacred fire of liberty burned more brightly in the breasts of the upper and aristocratic classes. Marius André calls the Quito revolution the "lace" revolution, because it was headed by the nobility. "In the United States, the magistrates, the rich planters, the great merchants, were constantly loyal and firm." And at the head of all stands George Washington, a man lacking in ambition, but with outstanding love for his country. "His fatherland needed him and to serve it," says Guizot, "he became great through duty rather than desire, and sometimes it required painful effort on his part." The trials of public life were bitter to him; he preferred the independence and tranquillity of private life to the exercise of power. But he accepted without vacillation the burdens which his country imposed upon him, never yielding to his desire to lose their weight. A spirit animated by a great ideal can overcome the most difficult trials. And later, when success crowned his efforts, he was able to conquer the ambitions which glory might have awakened in his soul. "It may truly be said," wrote Thomas Jefferson, "that never did nature and fortune combine more perfectly to make a man great, and to place him in the same constellation with whatever worthies have merited from man an everlasting remembrance. For his was the singular destiny and merit of leading the armies of his country successfully through an arduous war, for the establishment of its independence; of conducting its councils through the birth of a government, new in its forms and principles, until it had settled down into a quiet and orderly train."

"Washington presents himself to memory and imagination," says Montalvo, "as a great citizen rather than as a great warrior, as a philosopher rather than as a general. Washington would have done very well in the Roman Senate by the side of old Papirio Cursor, or as an ancient monarch; he might have been an Augustus, that calm and serene man who enjoyed sitting down with Horace and Virgil while the nations revolved reverently around his throne."

"He was not," says a writer, "one of those burning geniuses, eager for self-expression urged along by the greatness of his idea or his passion, who sheds around him the riches of his nature. Strong of character, exalted in purpose, he was a modest man. Capable of achieving the most illustrious destiny, he would willingly have remained unknown, finding satisfaction in the cultivation of his fields, though his faculties were great enough for the command of armies and the founding of a State."

Washington, as we have said, was not a Utopian and ambitious dreamer. He was the man of realities; but in his serene soul and well-balanced mind burned perennially the flame of an ideal; and with this powerful spur to action, capable of engendering the greatest deeds, he also possessed a strong will for facing responsibilities, an unshakable tenacity for overcoming obstacles.

Convinced that the independence of his country was necessary, Washington never doubted that success would crown his efforts. Years of armed combat were filled with glorious deeds, though disasters, defeat, envy, the treachery of his enemies, were not lacking; but discouragement is never visible in him. Then ten years of political labor he later gave to found the government, to give to the United States the Constitution most suitable to the people, to the historical antecedents of the nation, and to the necessities of its future development, constitute perhaps the most glorious period in this fruitful life.

The life of Washington seems to me to be synthesized in these two words: reality and ideal. His entire life was illumined by an ideal yet he never allowed himself to be carried away to the realms of chimera. To me, the monument which his fellow-citizens have erected to his memory in the heart of the beautiful Capital which bears his name is a perfect symbol of the citizen-hero who was the first President of the United States. Firm, immovable, its granite blocks rest on the earth just as Washington based all his actions on the reality of things. And as the straight sides of the obelisk rise to culminate in a point high above the earth, so the spirit of the great American rises from the earth in flight to the infinite. Washington's energy, valor, and constancy are symbolized in the solid rock of the monument; the moderation, simplicity, and equilibrium of his character, in the purity of lines in which the mass rises to the sky.

In responding to the address of Señor Larrea, Minister Dawson spoke briefly, confining himself in the main, to an expression of appreciation of Ecuador's participation in the Bicentennial Celebration. The remarks of Minister Dawson are here given:

I have reason to feel embarrassed in speaking after my excellent friend, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, whose elegant phrases merit a continuation very different from my unworthy contribution. Apparently, the organizers of this program wished to confirm the saying that "second parts are never good." Modesty, my natural desire, and the consideration due the distinguished audience which is listening to me should have compelled me to excuse myself, and this I should have done for the good of all, had it not been for my keen desire of taking advantage of this opportunity to express publicly to the Government and people of Ecuador my deep gratitude for the spontaneous and cordial way in which this hospitable country has joined in the Bicentennial of the great man to whom the United States so properly gives the beautiful name of "Father of his Country."

In my opinion there is no manifestation of culture more eloquent than the cult which a people renders to the memory of its heroes, and no demonstration of brotherhood more convincing than the homage paid to the great men of a friendly country.

A year ago the United States, joining the brethren to the south, celebrated with all pomp and solemnity the centenary of the death of the renowned Liberator who gave a fatherland to five Republics; and today, with the same solemnity, Ecuador joins the Republic of the North in celebrating the Bicentennial of the general and statesman to whom more than to any other the United States owe their independence. In somewhat more than twelve months the Americas have with religious fervor communed in an imposing homage to the two outstanding figures who embody the aspirations and greatness of the hemisphere. And in so doing, our people have not only exalted their heroes; more than this, we have elevated ourselves; and we have drawn nearer to each other, proclaiming once again our adherence to the ideals of justice, right, and peace which our liberators bequeathed to us and which in an ample spirit of mutual comprehension and respect we believe ourselves called upon to realize.

The tributes rendered in these days to the memory of George Washington by the Government and people of Ecuador, by their heroic Army, the Illustrious Municipal Council of Quito, the learned and venerable Central University and other educational institutions, and the generous national press—these tributes constitute a proof of brotherhood which will vibrate for many years in the hearts of all my countrymen who are fortunate enough to enjoy the hospitality of this noble country.

AVENUE NAMED FOR GEORGE WASHINGTON

The Municipal Council at Quito, on February 17, 1932, issued the following order:

WHEREAS it is the duty of Municipal Governments to keep alive the remembrance of men who by their actions have given new directions to the progress of society;

WHEREAS among the sons of America, General George Washington, one of the founders of the Great Republic of the North, distinguished himself in high degree;

WHEREAS on the 22nd of this month the world commemorates the Bicentennial of the birth of this eminent man;

THEREFORE, the Municipal Council of Quito DECREES:

Article 1. The Avenue now called "Avenue of the Republic," situated on the north of the Park de Mayo, shall henceforth be known as George Washington Avenue, in tribute to the first President of the United States of America.

Article 2. The present Order shall take effect on the day of its approval.

On the morning of February 22, the Avenue now officially known as the "Avenida Jorge Washington," located in the best residential section of the city two blocks from the American Legation, was inaugurated. Simple but impressive ceremonies marked the occasion. The ceremony was attended by the Minister and Under Secretary of Government, the President and members of the Municipal Council and the staff of the American Legation. In reply to a brief address by the President of the Municipal Council, Mr. Dawson made the following statement:

"The Illustrious Municipal Council of Quito has made a beautiful and touching gesture of confraternity in giving to this avenue the name of the great man to whose memory we render cult in these days. For this pleasing homage I have to express the most cordial thanks in the name of the Government and people of the United States who, as you know, harbor the most sincere sentiments of friendship and sympathy towards the Government and people of this hospitable country. Mr. President, I beg you to transmit to the noble people of Quito, so worthily represented by the Illustrious Council over which you preside, my profound gratitude and at the same time my cordial wishes for the prosperity and happiness of this beautiful capital, a birthplace of liberty in America."

Following the ceremony the party repaired to the American Legation where refreshments were served.

EXERCISES AT THE UNIVERSITY OF QUITO

At 4.30 p. m. on February 22, a formal Bicentennial gathering was held at the University of Quito. The meeting was presided over by Acting President Alfredo Baquerizo Moreno and attended by the entire Cabinet of Ecuador and most of the members of the Diplomatic Corps.

The main address of the occasion was delivered by Professor Carlos Salazar Flor, at the invitation of the University Council.

Professor Salazar Flor began his eloquent address by expressing his belief that it is the duty of learned institutions everywhere to keep alive the memory of the great deeds and inspired thought of those who fought for the liberty of mankind, and to emphasize the study of political developments, since institutions of government constitute the most important instrument of human progress.

The speaker then outlined the early history of the North American colonies and showed the growth of democratic ideals. He analyzed the conflicting conceptions of sovereignty and proceeded to trace the connection between events in England and the growth of the sentiments of freedom in America.

Professor Salazar Flor then presented, in detail, the life of George Washington, referring to Washington as the "interpreter of the aspirations of a great country, who was to achieve its independence, prepare the ground for national developments, lay the foundations of culture, and govern the free nation in accordance with democratic ideals as expressed in the law, and with respect for other countries."

In another part of his address Professor Salazar Flor said that in Washington we find a man "of perfect political sincerity, firm in his decision to direct all his actions for the common welfare, who could not be swerved from his course even by criticism and abuse."

George Washington, he pointed out, displayed those qualities of statesmanship which were needed in the critical period that followed the war for independence, when the foundations of the nation were being laid; and he emphasized the constructive side of his work for the industrial, cultural and commercial development of the country.

Professor Salazar Flor referred to Washington as "a man of calm and well considered judgment, who could analyze a situation without passion." On Washington devolved the task of reconciling the antagonistic purposes and desires of different parts of the new country where social organizations and local interests varied widely; and he had to deal with the two political parties which were formed to uphold two different schools of political thought.

"Washington's theories of government and the counsels he left to his country have served the nation well," said Professor Salazar Flor, "being based on the welfare of the people, rather than on political expedients. He established the way of moral and political progress and founded a great nation.

"The whole world will always remember," the speaker pointed out in closing his address, "that the greatness of the United States is a logical consequence of the foundation by its first president, the incomparable Washington, whose policy was that liberty, achieved through sacrifice, is sacred."

RECEPTION AT THE AMERICAN LEGATION

In the evening of February 22, Minister and Mrs. Dawson received formally at the American Legation. The reception was official and the invitation list, drawn up with the assistance of the Foreign Office, included only Ecuadorian officials and members of the Diplomatic Corps. Acting President Alfredo Baquerizo Moreno, honored the occasion with his presence, although it is not customary for the Chief of State to visit Legations. In addition to the Acting President, those in attendance included the entire Cabinet, the Diplomatic Corps, and a large number of prominent officials. A supper was served for one hundred guests and dancing followed. The Legation received flowers from the Acting President, the Minister for Foreign Affairs and some thirty other officials.

Thus ended the Bicentennial Celebration of February 22 in the capital city of Quito. The Ecuadorian government, through its various organs, showed more than a friendly interest in the Celebration of the Bicentennial of Washington's Birth. The Foreign Office, on February 22, sent to the American Legation a cordial note of felicitation expressing its adherence to the commemoration. The Foreign Office and the Municipality of Quito displayed their flags on Washington's birthday, as did, incidentally, most of the foreign Legations.

The press of Quito devoted a great deal of space to articles on George Washington and details of the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration, evidencing a distinct cordiality to the United States. The schools, the churches, the libraries, and the citizens of Ecuador—all showed a great interest in the ceremonies honoring the First President of the United States on the two hundredth anniversary of his birth.

BOLIVAR SOCIETY HONORS GEORGE WASHINGTON

One of the greatest tributes paid to the memory of George Washington during the Bicentennial Celebration occurred on July 4, 1932, under the auspices of the Bolívar Society of Ecuador. Desiring actively to participate in the Bicentennial Celebration, the Bolívar Society ordered some time previously an oil portrait of our First President to be hung in its rooms. This portrait was unveiled with appropriate ceremonies and before a very distinguished audience on July 4.

The ceremony was held in the large hall of the Quito Military Club and was attended by Acting President Baquerizo Moreno, President-Elect Bonifaz, four members of the Cabinet, practically the entire diplomatic corps, ranking military officers, members of the press and many prominent citizens.

Speaking of this occasion, Minister Dawson reports:

"The occasion, the setting, the distinguished gathering, and the very evident cordiality made the ceremony one of the most successful events of its kind held in Quito during the past two years."

General Angel Isaac Chiriboga N., President of the Bolivar Society, opened the meeting after which the "Star Spangled Banner" was played by a military band. The Washington portrait was unveiled by Acting President Baquerizo Moreno. He spoke briefly as follows:

Ladies and Gentlemen:

Not only with pleasure but also with a sincere and intimate feeling of reverence, do I discharge the duty with which the Bolivarian Society has honored me, of unveiling the portrait of George Washington, the immortal and well-beloved hero of his country.

Washington is the founder of a new kind of greatness; a greatness that commands our admiration; a greatness previously unknown; a greatness whose basis is his marvelous republican and democratic simplicity.

His life and character were and ever will be models of that greatness I speak of, and though you are all well acquainted with his life, the Minister of Public Education, Dr. Cabeza de Vaca, will soon recall its main outlines to you.

Ladies and Gentlemen: I unveil the portrait. Look, look once more, at the inspiring visage of one made great by war and—more remarkably—made greater by peace.

The principal address of the occasion was delivered by Dr. Manuel Cabeza de Vaca, Minister of Public Education and former Ecuadorian Consul General in San Francisco. Dr. Cabeza de Vaca delivered a remarkable address showing his intimate knowledge of American history, and particularly of the life and times of George Washington.

The following is a translation of Dr. Cabeza de Vaca's speech:

Mr. President of the Republic, Mr. Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary of the United States, Ladies and Gentlemen:

The Republic of the North, our older sister in liberty, today casts her glance from the splendor of her present greatness to the beginning of her existence as a nation; she evokes with patriotic pride the remembrance of her genuine heroes, those who laid the foundations of the powerful civilization at which we marvel as we review the panorama of history, as a proud example of what human effort can accomplish when it is able to struggle with circumstances, conquer them and enchain the uncertainties of destiny to its triumphal chariot, opening the way irresistibly to progress.

George Washington is the national hero par excellence; the unanimous devotion of the American people has honored him by calling him the Father of His Country, not only because of the brilliance of his almost legendary exploits, not only because of his many deeds of epic quality, but because of the wisdom and civic virtue he displayed in establishing on a firm foundation a great Nation.

February 22nd of the present year marks the Bicentennial of the birth of this illustrious statesman. To commemorate this significant fact in the history of the United States, a Commission established in the Federal Capital has prepared a program for securing the cooperation of all elements of the country, to revive the sentiment of profound reverence for this eminent man, an immortal among immortals, who imbued his fellow-citizens with unclouded faith in his high mission and guided them with a sure and firm hand toward the goal of his patriotic aspirations. To create a national faith, to strengthen it so that it will always survive the vicissitudes of the ages, that is what marks men as leaders of peoples and founders of states.

And we are taking part in this just and great homage; from this Andean height, we wish to make it clear that the influences of universal history ascend by the slopes of the steep mountains and enter into the fervent desire for justice which runs through the fabric of history. One in the spirit of revolt which made nations emerge from the colonial silence; we shall be one likewise—and this is our most consoling aspiration—in the beneficent contests of peace and labor, in the remodeling of the collective spirit to bring it into accord with the exigencies of contemporaneous life.

Perhaps some sound, indefinable and confused, is heard, the sound of voices worried by the enigmas of the civilization of which we are a part, complaining that we are doing reverence to the memory of the heroes and those who forged our present, though the evolution of ideas has gone far beyond them; today when every truth, every theory consecrated by time seems to be vanishing into absurdity; when the social order utters its own anathema and, emerging from darkness, withdraws again into darkness; when, iconoclasts of the present, we tend to become iconoclasts of the past. Are we not mistaken often in our evaluation of men and things? Do we not see too often false apostles steeped in egotism as good and just men? The past, it may be said, merely because it is the past, is no better than the present; and time becomes not only a witness but an accomplice, cold and insensible, of the saddest tragedy in history. But no; we must not surrender ourselves to this skepticism which will dry up our souls and instead of bringing improvement, destroy the idea of responsibility, the sentiment of universal justice, and the nobility of gratitude toward the benefactors of the human species; that is to say, it will finally destroy all the forces that have made possible our existence and the progress of society.

As there can be no drama without characters, so history would be but an unpeopled stage, sterile and silent, without the presence of great men; as if the skeleton of an organism, having within it all the potentialities of a higher life, should never find the vigor necessary to realize that life. The great of the species are those who animate the picture, converting it into a poem of ideas and emotions; they are the ones who make of every century a universe with its own rotation, with substantial configuration in the general harmony. The great of the species receive from their epoch the creative breath, the vital sap of their conception, and by virtue thereof appear like the luminous projection of the historic moment which nourishes them, themselves providing the field on which they act, illuminating it but at the same time receiving from it waves of a mysterious force which constitutes the indestructible bond between the hero and the medium which produces him.

George Washington comes from the State of Virginia. The family escutcheon bears the inscription: "Exitus acta probat," which might mean either the old aphorism that the end justifies the means, a motto that has been the despair of scholastics accustomed to seek in brief expressions eternal formulae of justice; or that life has a realistic meaning, constitutes a military deed, whose ends are an equation between the deed and the result. For those who like this point of view, the usefulness of deeds are measured by the results that they produce, so that in the analysis of conduct we must separate the chaff from the wheat, the unfruitful deed that is a dead weight, inert material; we must avoid this useless expenditure of energy, the ephemeral gesture that is but the caricature of great actions. This inscription seems to accord well with the family temperament, as indicated through a series of generations of the Washingtons. A family of rural vitality, consisting of wealthy landholders, they cultivated a normal sentiment of life, a kind of predetermined adaptation to the social background which they sought to improve by an idealized realism.

Augustine Washington, twice married, by his second marriage had George Washington and four other sons. We possess few concrete facts about his childhood, so few in fact that they could be given in one short paragraph. There is not a single letter from his mother, Mary Washington, describing his early infancy, nor recounting those anecdotes of the first years of his life which aid the future writer to clear up mysteries of individual character. Even that popularly repeated tale of the hatchet and the cherry tree is questioned by writers who attribute it to the fancy of his biographer rather than to actual fact. Indeed it is worthy of note that the writings of George Washington, detailed though they are, to the extent of relating the most minor incidents of his life, say nothing at all about his childhood, nor have those who knew him written anything of importance, in spite of the fact that even as a young man he became world-famous and it is natural to suppose that there were at that time many persons who had known him as a child and remembered his childhood.

His education was limited.

In primitive American society, in homes where there were many children, and in the rude surroundings that are natural in lands recently opened to colonization where the only cultural influences must come from the distant mother country, it was inevitable that education should be neglected. Furthermore, the current of colonial life, cast in the mould of English society, tended to favor the eldest son. The right of primogeniture was recognized in their institutions until Jefferson, many years later, abolished it. Under this rule, the first-born son received the greater part of the family inheritance, and great care was given his education, the idea being to maintain the brilliance of the privileged aristocracy. Lawrence Washington was the eldest son of Augustine by his first marriage and therefore was the favored son, the one who was sent to England to learn Latin and the fine manners of English society. In the career of Lawrence there is the sound of drums and the flashing of sabres, for he had served in the foreign wars of the Mother Country. Surely he must have been an inspiration to his younger brother, George, and it is natural to suppose that these first impressions left an indelible mark on his character.

The five younger brothers grew up together in the country house, the home which, although primitive, was in no sense plebeian. All but George are buried in the silence of history, blurred figures which were not to be distinguished in the future and are not illumined even by the vivid epic light which surrounds the American hero; none of them took part in public life.

The territory of Virginia in colonial times had a well defined aristocratic class; what it lacked and what constitutes the nerve of progress in modern society was a solidly constituted middle class; there was nothing between the lord and the slave. The aristocratic class was the governing class: the horizon of its aspirations was a horizon circumscribed by lands and slaves: its mentality did not go beyond these rudimentary ambitions. Manual labor, as always happens wherever slavery exists openly or secretly, was scorned, a fact which kept class antagonism alive. The upper strata, heirs of the privileges of the Mother Country, concentrated in their hands the territorial power which was upheld by converging forces of a different kind and guaranteed by the common interests of domination; the lower strata felt that they lacked something in the way of human rights, but they were never able to determine precisely what constituted this lack and whether responsibility for it should weigh on themselves or on the insuperable forces that conditioned historical fatality. Washington's father owned six plantations. In order to form an idea of this we must forget what a plantation means in modern language and visualize the forest primeval, wretched, marshy country, without roads and without houses.

The Washingtons fitted perfectly into this structure: brave, courteous, with fine manners and fine clothes, they also had class feeling and a passionate desire for lands. Historically these data are very important: they reveal the reason for the rise of George Washington and the causes of the American revolution.

To reconstruct the past let us seek in the present the law of contrasts. In our day man is at odds with civilization; we are the victims of our inventions, of the refinements of our desires and the wealth of ideas which, brilliant and seductive, invade the depths of our souls, rousing us from the easy repose and sweet tranquillity in which we seek to forget the world, forgetful of ourselves. Distant events, men whom we do not see, penetrate into our inmost being, filling us with intellectual or emotional anxiety; our fate is not in our own hands but is ordered by remote forces. Our vocations and our courses are distorted by the play of economic laws beyond our reach which, without consulting us, decide our destiny.

Entirely different was the world into which George Washington was born. Henry Adams, with his sure instinct for short and expressive sentences, calls it a "happy little world." In the simplicity of its customs, in the patriarchal and domestic set of tastes and ambitions, it was relatively happy. Life was bare of theories and free from dilemmas. Even in our day American intellect brings a new element to the elaboration of theories of government: pragmatism, the solution which faces the problem square not to dominate it but to compose it: not to silence the voices of protest but to control them and make them vehicles of knowledge of the social necessities, not destroyers of institutions: pragmatism is their contribution to the political thought of our day, precisely because of their disdain for general ideas and with the hypothesis that is founded on hypothesis. Pragmatism means a practical solution, a compromise of belligerency which makes possible escape from the deepest abysses, with the hope, conscious or semiconscious, but always optimistic, that the future with trembling hand will tear away the veil that conceals all mysteries. Pragmatism flees from definitive solutions which are almost always ephemeral and deceptive. Before the great enigmas which cloud the spirit and prick the conscience, who can say from the summit of a new Sinai, "I believe"? Who can say "I do not believe"? What nation or individual, sect or doctrine can claim to be infallible?

An august and solemn silence tends to take possession of sincere souls. Reason has wounded itself, and from this wound flows skepticism which must be cured by the new tendency revealed in the currents of contemporaneous thought.

In this "happy little" world we see that Washington obtained his first education. The realism of his tastes and opinions, of his methods of life, his plans of conduct are in accord with the times, with the temperament of the race, and with the surrounding conditions of the sociological atmosphere he breathed.

There was no school in the neighborhood, and therefore he was sent to receive the rudiments of learning from the chapel master of the neighboring parish. When this short period of culture came to an end he went to Westmoreland where there was a school under the direction of a professor who had specialized in mathematics. He proved to be an able scholar in this science: he learned to see things through the concept of numbers and measure, and this left a profound impression on his character.

The most important crisis of character and destiny are the results often of trivial circumstances. One of the decisive moments in the life of George Washington was his meeting with Lord Fairfax, a wealthy nobleman more than fifty years old, the owner of an enormous tract of land in Virginia. Washington contracted with him to help survey his land, and this threw him into the area of activity to struggle with hostile forces and with difficulties of many kinds, thus making him a man of action and courage.

In 1751 his brother Lawrence was so ill that he decided to make a trip to Barbados, a British island in the West Indies. His brother George accompanied him on this trip, the only trip he ever made outside the United States. The climate was not beneficial to Lawrence, who therefore returned very shortly to Mount Vernon, where he died on July 26, 1752. Lawrence left his possessions to his daughter and appointed his brother executor. Soon afterwards Lawrence's daughter died, her executor finding himself owner of the Mount Vernon estate with its feudal house, 25,000 acres of land, and a great number of slaves.

The old rivalry between America and France for the possession of the American continent served to develop the personality of Washington. On the map of North America as it appears in the year 1753, the English portion of the new continent is very small. On one side it is bounded by the Atlantic Ocean, on the other by the French and Spanish possessions; on the north by Canada, entirely French, or rather we might say aboriginal in its population with a slight French tinge; on the opposite side, to the south of Georgia, Spain was master of Florida. Then as now the gloved hands of diplomacy, at the conference desk, traced the distant frontiers of nations at their pleasure.

The conflict had to come sooner or later: one after another the mother countries claimed for themselves what in the language of the Great Powers is today called the white man's burden, that is, the right to impose their civilization on new lands without consulting the wishes of those concerned.

In addition to the differences of language and religion, the English and French colonists presented different types of character. The French were accustomed to receive orders, the administrative euphemism had not yet invented the word insinuation. Within a centralism which, though dextrous in unifying, can make all personal initiatives sterile, the hand of the Mother Country was ready to scatter generously beyond the seas the seeds which would fructify their fields. The English temperament, on the other hand, was marked by an excessive individualism, grafted on an accommodating spirit of enterprise and even of challenge. These colonists penetrated America with a definite intention. This was not an adventurous episode for them; they came to found a home for the generations to come of which they felt themselves the accidental representatives. Therefore, they brought their wives, to make a home sanctified by the ties of civilization. The Ohio valley and the entire Mississippi basin was claimed by Great Britain, on the basis of the Cabot expeditions of the sixteenth century and the charter or statute of Virginia granted by James the First, which described the territory of the colony as stretching from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific. The French alleged in their favor actual occupation and successive explorations. In 1747 Governor Dinwiddie of Virginia organized an agricultural company for the exploitation of the uncultivated regions over which he exercised administrative power. When the plan became known to the French they began to construct a chain of forts which indicated an uneasy feeling. The Governor resolved to send to the French Commander of the disputed territory a written demand for the evacuation of this territory, and he entrusted this commission to George Washington, then a Major in the Militia. Not through vanity, as a severe critic and biographer has stated, but through a sentiment of duty, a generous pride in facing the responsibilities placed upon his shoulders without discussion, Washington accepted the commission offered him. After two months and a half of a journey made in the depths of winter, overcoming difficulties and dangers of every kind, he reappeared to give a report on the accomplishment of his task, having kept a record of all the incidents of the expedition, a record which was widely distributed and served to increase the well-merited fame and renown of its author.

When General Braddock reached the colonies with his army during the war that the English waged against the French and Indian alliance, he chose Washington as one of his aides. A feeling of mutual respect and admiration sprang up between these two men. All agree on the heroism displayed by Washington when, yielding to the force of numbers, the English army had to retire.

After this martial episode he returned to private life and to his personal affairs.

Now we come to the most important moment in the life of the hero. The difficulties between the Mother Country and the colonies increased in number and in intensity day by day. The crisis was approaching, and this fact was understood by those who were alive to the course of events. It must be confessed that in the Government of the American colonies England was not partial to the use of force and in fact never thought of employing it until the very eve of the revolution. England trusted to the prestige of her constitutional authority and her belief that the colonies needed her economic protection.

The revolution, a double revolution, continued its march: it beat forcefully on the high points of the colonial structure, making its postulates the aspiration of the aristocratic and governing class and the political dilettantism of the times; at the same time it filtered through into the heart of the people, to the plain man of town and country, to the skilled artisan who failed to understand the reasons on which their brothers above them in the social scale were founding the right of rebellion. Reading the omens, the augurs might have learned that the colonies were already lost to England even though England and even America did not yet know it.

The English Cabinet, apparently freed from serious trouble for the moment, thought that the colonies should contribute to the military budget since they were benefited by the internal and external defense furnished by the government; and for the purpose of collecting this contribution they contrived a plan of taxation to produce the amount needed. Immediately great protests were heard and discussion arose about the right to collect taxes from those who were not represented in Parliament; hence the fermentation of the opposition which culminated in reprisals.

To reduce the insurgents, the English government closed the port of Boston, and thereupon Washington offered to raise an army of a thousand men at his own expense and go to the assistance of that unfortunate city. When the Second Continental Congress met at Philadelphia, Washington, true interpreter of the national sentiment, versed in the discipline of war, in the practices of statesmanship and with understanding of the desires of the citizens, received the highest honor and greatest responsibility in June, 1775. John Adams proposed that he be elected to command the continental armies in defense of independence. Thenceforth for eight long years military camps were his home. The patience, wisdom, and courage evidenced by him in this struggle earned for him the title of Father of his Country. The obstacles that he had to overcome in his arduous campaigns make his deeds seem fabulous. The crossing of the Delaware, the terrible winter at Valley Forge, the victory at Yorktown show his high gifts as a warrior and a leader of armies. He was offered a dictatorship after the surrender of Cornwallis, but he refused it unhesitatingly, having his eyes fixed firmly on the ideal of democracy to which he had consecrated himself in his privations and sacrifices.

The war ended, he retired from politics; but only until the meeting of the Constitutional Convention at Philadelphia, which was called to revise the Articles of Confederation. When this Convention met to dictate the Fundamental Charter which still governs the American Union, he was automatically elected President of the Convention and then President of the Republic.

A well-documented study of the Constitution shows that it was the fruit of a series of compromises and accommodations, the purpose being to maintain the union between the States and the concepts of popular sovereignty and social and political equality. The greatest democratic experiment which the century saw is owed to the wisdom of the founder of this great Nation. His object was to establish a strong government, but at the same time to respect individual rights; a government without a throne, without hereditary prestige; without military hierarchy, without castes, orders, or privileged classes, destined to exercise its action over a vast territory of unlimited possibilities. Democracy was his patriotic obsession.

How many and how difficult were the problems that had to be faced in the administration of the government. The evacuation of American ports by English troops; the difficulties with Spain; the central economic organization, liquidating the debts of the States, etc. In 1793 Washington published his famous proclamation of neutrality, defying public opinion which was inclined to favor France against England for many reasons, namely the help received from France in the struggle for Independence; and the treaty signed in 1778 which gave France the right to occupy American ports. Nevertheless a clear vision of the interests of the new born State and its international rôle in the future, strengthened him in his position of neutrality in spite of all the campaigns of his enemies.

Oh, mockery of justice! Washington had enemies, even though only for a short time, men who sought to vilify him with unjust accusations and perfidiously opprobrious letters; he never paid any attention to the lies in the venomous diatribes directed against him because he knew that they were the inevitable result of the exercise of power; his revenge was his greatness, a splendid greatness, praised through the centuries which have raised him up and magnified his sincere work.

Having refused to accept a third term as President of the United States, he retired to live a tranquil life in the bosom of his family, venerated by his fellow-citizens and the voices of injustice that had been raised about him silenced forever. In his farewell address he gave the nation in solemn accents the counsels of the experience and wisdom of a statesman, well conceived and profound admonitions which, inscribed on the memory of his compatriots, constitute the code by which their political decisions are guided in uncertain and difficult hours.

It is fitting that we should admire and reverence the memory of Washington as one of the forerunners of continental democracy. The great thoughts and great actions of men are intertwined in the bosom of eternity even before the dawn of their realizations. Washington, Bolivar and other heroes of the emancipation bear on their shoulders the destiny of the New World; they are the founders of our liberty, with the differences that result from the various stages on which they have made their appearance; they are one in the comprehension of human destiny, raising it up and dignifying it in the nations to whose service they consecrate their talents and their virtues. And if our nationalities in the South seem still to be an amphitheatre of cultures, simulating the amphitheatre which nature has erected on the slopes of the cordilleras; if the gospel of love and brotherhood is still a promise which escapes fulfillment in institutions, let this not be a venomous pessimism to discourage our constructive efforts, but rather a spur and stimulus which constantly keeps us awake to the possibilities of a higher life to the struggle to translate love and brotherhood into realities, entombing in dramatic symphony the hymn of justice and progress. It is sad for a country to fall into political scepticism and insincerity. "For the love of God," cried Carlyle, "discover the imposters, but discover at the same time the men of worth, the men in whom you can place your confidence."

Honorable Mr. Minister, worthy representative of the Government of the United States:

On this day of epic remembrance, take to your nation the proof of our affection, the sanctity of our respect, which reflects the continental harmony in the shelter of the effective consecration of right, of reciprocal aid, and the sincerity of relations between States.

The American Minister was the last speaker, expressing his gratitude to the Bolivar Society for its splendid cooperation in the Bicentennial Celebration. Minister Dawson spoke as follows:

I regret keenly my lack of oratorical ability and particularly at this moment when I desire to express in phrases worthy of so solemn an occasion my deep gratitude to my good friend and Minister of Public Education and to the Bolivar Society of Ecuador. Of course, it would be superfluous and even presumptuous to undertake the praise of the magnificent conference which has just been offered us by Dr. Cabeza de Vaca, who has demonstrated once again to what extent Ecuador understands the achievements and renders tribute to the character of the great man to whom the Americans of the North so rightly give the beautiful name of "Father of His Country."

In organizing this spontaneous and sincere homage to the memory of George Washington, the Bolivar Society has been inspired by the fertile ideals of the Great Liberator, whose memory is no less sacred in the United States than in Ecuador. For who, if not Bolivar, conceived in its most ample form the great ideal of the brotherhood of the free people of a hemisphere recently called to liberty? And who, if not the Father of Five Countries, was the most illustrious forerunner of the generous movement which nearly a century later united our Republics in the common aspiration of justice, right and peace which he so often proclaimed?

In participating in the Bicentennial of George Washington, the Bolivar Society follows therefore in the path showed it by the Liberator himself. And this ceremony is doubly pleasing by reason of the affectionate character which it has taken and the date chosen to carry it out. In the name of the Government and the people of the United States, I express my whole-hearted appreciation of this new proof of sympathy towards my country and this tribute to its hero—an homage which honors Ecuadorans, as much as it touches every American present today.

The Acting President, Dr. Baquerizo Moreno, then adjourned the meeting, bringing to the close, as one newspaper termed the gathering, "the solemn ceremony highly expressive of the admiration of the citizens of Ecuador for the illustrious Founder and First President of the United States of America."

WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY CELEBRATION IN GUAYAQUIL

Municipal officials and private citizens of Guayaquil, joined with Americans residing in that city to honor George Washington's memory on February 22. Arrangements for the celebration of the Bicentennial of George Washington's birth were placed in the hands of a committee of ten Americans, representing the American colony of Guayaquil.

The members of this committee were as follows: Dr. Herman B. Parker, chairman; Mr. Harold D. Clum, honorary chairman; Mr. Henry L. Gildred, secretary-treasurer; Mr. Lester W. Parsons (Manager of the Empresa Electrica del Ecuador, Inc.); Mr. Victor E. Henriques; Mr. James O'Neil (local manager of West India Oil Company); Mr. Taylor W. Gannett; Mr. Jesse Smith (of All America Cables, Inc.); Mrs. Victor E. Henriques; Mrs. L. W. Parsons.

This committee drew up the following resolution and program for February 22:

To commemorate the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, which is being celebrated throughout the world, the American Colony has deemed the following activities as fitting for the occasion:

1. It has been decided to hold a reception at the Grand Hotel, on Monday, February 22nd from 5 to 7 P. M. The British Colony at large will be invited as well as the prominent officials of the city and the officers of the Bolívar Society.

2. Five large colored portraits of George Washington are to be artistically framed for the purpose of donating them to the following institutions:

- (1) La Escuela Modelo.
- (2) La Biblioteca Municipal.
- (3) La Gran Logia del Ecuador (Masonic).
- (4) La Sociedad Bolivariana.
- (5) The American Consulate General.

3. An American flag shall be donated by the American Colony to the Gobernacion of Guayaquil.

4. A committee to be appointed to interview the local press in an effort to have as much space as possible devoted to commemorative articles and pictures of George Washington.

5. Efforts will be made to secure a tree from the United States which will be planted in the "Paseo de las Colonias" with the consent of the city authorities and dedicated to the memory of George Washington.

6. A wreath will be placed at the statue of Bolívar in the Parque Seminario, as an act of Pan American solidarity and a recognition of the unity of the purposes of Washington and Bolívar.

On the morning of February 22 a framed portrait of George Washington was presented to the Biblioteca Municipal, where the American Consul General, Harold D. Clum, delivered the following brief address:

Mr. Director, Gentlemen:

The two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington is being celebrated this year, and especially today, on an entirely unprecedented scale, not only in the national capital of the United States, but in every city and village in that country and by groups of Americans in many parts of the world, as well as by lovers of liberty in many foreign countries. The American colony in Guayaquil is endeavoring to do its small share in this general celebration, and we have thought it appropriate, as a part of our commemoration of the Father of our country, to present this picture to the Municipal Library of Guayaquil.

It is appropriate that a picture of Washington should hang in an institution of learning, such as a library, for the great purpose of education is the development of character, and Washington is a great example of character developed by instruction and discipline. Calvin Coolidge has said of Washington that "we shall fail in our estimation and understanding of him unless we remember that during his lifetime he helped to build a place of worship, that in his will he provided for institutions of learning, and that in his farewell address he emphasized the spiritual values of life. He was a soldier, a patriot, a statesman, but in addition to all these he was a great teacher."

We thank you, Mr. Director, for your offer to give this picture a prominent place in the hall destined to honor the likenesses of your great Liberators, and we hope that the many visitors and readers who frequent this library will be reminded of the qualities which I have mentioned, as well as of the ideals of liberty with order which inspired Washington and the other great liberators, and which is the common ideal of our nations.

The address of our Consul General was followed by remarks of appreciation by the Director of the Library, Señor Carlos Matamoros Jara.

"I have listened to your words with vivid and patriotic emotion," began Señor Matamoros Jara, "and in order that I may reply worthily to them, allow me to evoke the glorious deeds of George Washington—the liberator of the North American Confederation and first president of that great nation, first in independence in the new world—that noted man who possessed every virtue and who was always 'first in peace, first in war, and first in the hearts of his countrymen.'"

"The grand figure of this immortal man can only be compared with the eminence of Bolívar and San Martín, the liberators of South America, and the three symbolize in history, the great epic of the continents of America.

"Thank you, Señor Consul, for your inestimable gift, the beautiful portrait of Washington, which you dedicate in the name of your great people, on the anniversary of the bicentenary of his birth. We shall preserve it in this institution, with all the veneration which the memory of that great American merits, the pride of your country and of humanity."

Following the ceremony at the Municipal Library, a similar portrait was presented to the Bolívar Society before a gathering of government and municipal officials, members of the Society, representatives of the press, and members of the American Colony. In a brief address of presentation, Consul General Clum stressed the similarity of aims and purposes of Washington and Bolívar and their common desire for order and liberty. The President of the Society, Dr. Alberto Guerrero Martinez, accepted the picture on behalf of the Society and delivered an eloquent address which is here partly quoted in translated form:

Governor of the Province, Consul of the United States of North America and distinguished members of the Colony, Ladies and Gentlemen:

Propitious is the moment that fortune presents me in presiding, ad interim, over the Bolívar Society of Guayaquil and receiving from the Honorable Consul Harold D. Clum and the Colony of his native land resident in this city, upon the commemoration of the Bicentennial of the birth of George Washington, the valuable gift of the picture of this lofty and great man, liberator and founder of the first-born republic of the American family.

The Bolívar Society of Guayaquil, constituted in order to maintain forever glowing in the national soul, as in a sacred shrine, the votive lamp which expresses the eternal cult of liberty, in whose supreme religion and instinctive rituals are raised the altars where we venerate with love, with tenderness and with gratitude the one who, with the breath of his genial spirit, like the Biblical Omnipotent, made nations upon nations, autonomous and independent, spring to human life and consciousness and contemplation—Simon Bolívar—highly appreciates the manifestation of comprehensive Americanism which inspires the North American Colony, taking to its heart, in like sentiments and idealisms, the venerable and lofty image of the citizen exemplary for his virtues, of the irreproachable statesman, of the word, sacrificing, and just, to whose constancy the horizon reveals itself for Liberty, ever ingenerate and native to the soil of the Great Republic, and defends and protects Law, as the fundamental attribute of human societies. . . .

. . . Washington and Bolívar, august personalities, glory of the new world, honor of the human race, among the most outstanding men of all peoples and of all times. . . .

. . . And when the Motherland denies and abuses the rights of the colonies, Washington becomes the center of all patriotic aspirations, unites the multiple tendencies of the states, organizes and establishes an army, orderly and patiently, as when scarcely out of boyhood he had to bind himself to methodical work as an engineer and a surveyor on the lands of Lord Fairfax; he inspires Congress, persuades it with his deeds and convinces it with accurate suggestions, forces the diminution of the anti-military resistance, and although, as on Long Island, the 26th of August 1778, he feels the bitterness of failure, though in the campaign of Philadelphia he required intelligence and self possession to maintain the integrity of his naked army tortured by hunger and by lack of shelter, with only the consolation that was afforded him by the sweet company of his wife, the incomparable Martha Dandridge, active as well as industrious, enduring as well as indefatigable, then, with the noble Lafayette, the knight of Versailles, he initiated the victorious march at Monmouth Court House, then to continue on Stony Point the 16th of July of '79, and to advance, in spite of the treason of Arnold, upon the insurrections of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, upon the corruption of the surroundings which became deep and immoral economic speculations, to the siege of Yorktown and the surrender of Lord Cornwallis, with the handing over and rendition of York and Gloucester, where the legions of liberty draw glory upon themselves and the United States and remain, forever, established as a free and independent nation. . . .

. . . But for Washington, separation from the political movement of his country could not be complete, and still less in moments when, his friends in the struggle and hard and endless task which the Nation imposed upon them being separated from the Congress, anarchy and discord aspired to open a way exactly when the opportunity for the fundamental organization of the Republic offered itself.

For Washington there also came calumny and incomprehension which sank their venomous fangs into his soul filled with love of his country, and at the same time intentionally letters were forged in his name contrary to his sentiments and plans, and to those which he had put into effect; an ignoble proposal, and contrary to his very ideals, was presented. . . .

. . . No one has ascended to power by a more straight path, nor by a more unanimous vote than George Washington upon his being elected by his fellow citizens as the first constitutional President of the American Union, nor was anyone better prepared than he to clear the obscure and difficult horizon which faced his country at the opening moment of its republican life, for if all the states sympathized with the new political organization, they differed in their social bases, and if in some property was the patrimony of the great landholders and the Church and slavery predominated, in others existed the law of primogeniture and the feudal English law was firm on strong aristocratic bases, while a totally different practice was shown in those which were favored by the Puritans of Holland and France, in which land, man expected everything from his activities, his work and his independence, and the social status was absolutely democratic. . . .

. . . Consul, and members of the North American colony: The Bolívar Society of Guayaquil, on thanking you for the estimable gift with which you have favored us, affectionately greets your country on the day which recalls the birth of Washington, the virtuous and the patriotic, and offers its prayers that the spirit of the great man will continue protecting and defending the destinies and the growth in greatness of the North American nation.

Upon the same occasion, the Governor of the Province being present, our Consul General presented him with an American flag to be used on appropriate occasions.

WREATH PLACED AT BOLIVAR MONUMENT

All those present then proceeded to the statue of Bolívar, where a wreath was placed at the base of the monument. Our Consul General presented the wreath and paid the following tribute to the South American patriot and hero, Simon Bolívar:

The American Colony in Guayaquil, commemorating today the Bicentenary of the birth of George Washington, the Liberator and Father of Our Country, wishes to pay tribute to Simon Bolívar by placing this floral offering at the foot of the monument, with its sincere admiration and respect, and to render full homage to the great hero and Liberator of South America.

AMERICAN COLONY HOLDS RECEPTION

The climax of the Bicentennial Celebration in Guayaquil on February 22, was reached with the reception held in the early evening at the Grand Hotel. The reception was tendered by the American Colony of the city and was attended by the leading Ecuadorian officials, both national and municipal, the Dean of the Consular Corps, and members of the British and American Colonies. Some hundred people attended this event. A Military band was furnished by the municipal authorities. It was stationed in the hallway outside the reception room, and played, among other pieces, the Bicentennial song entitled, "Father of the Land We Love." The reception closed with the band playing the "Star Spangled Banner," the Ecuadorian national anthem, and "America." One address was made at this reception by Consul General Clum, and it is herewith quoted in full:

We are gathered here to render our homage to the memory of George Washington, the Liberator and Father of our country, on the two hundredth anniversary of his birth. As you know, the celebration of this two hundredth anniversary has been specially authorized by Congress, which appointed a commission to prepare for and organize it, and it will be entirely unprecedented in scope and importance, extending to every community in the United States and to very many in foreign countries. The commission is not centering its efforts in the City of Washington, nor in any other place. It is taking the celebration to the people. In every city and town the people are to organize their own celebrations, which begin today and are to continue until after Thanksgiving Day, November 24th. The main purpose of the commemoration, as expressed by Congress, is "that future generations of American citizens may live according to the example and precepts of Washington's exalted life and character, and thus perpetuate the American Republic."

It is a great pleasure to us to have with us today the Ecuadorian authorities and our friends of the Bolívar Society, to whose great hero, Simon Bolívar, the Liberator of South America, our colony paid its homage this morning. In presenting a picture of Washington to the Bolívar Society, I spoke of the similarity between these two great men. Both were gentlemen of great fortunes who risked all to fight for the independence of their respective countries. Both displayed the utmost fortitude and perseverance in the face of many defeats and discouragements, and by that fortitude and perseverance won victory for their cause, which was the same in both cases. Both proved themselves to be utterly free of all desire for private gain. And both were devoted to the ideal of Liberty with order. The memory of these two great men will live for ever, and although they never met they will be thought of together.

It is also a great pleasure to the American colony to have with us today our British friends. We do not forget that Washington was of English origin, nor do we forget that England was the first cradle of human liberties reborn after the middle ages.

As in keeping with our purpose to commemorate the life and character of Washington, I wish to read a few tributes to him from distinguished statesmen, most of whom were his contemporaries.

JOHN ADAMS (Delegate to the Continental Congress, 1775-1776):

PATRICK HENRY (1774):

"When Patrick Henry was asked whom he thought the greatest man in Congress, he replied: 'If you speak of eloquence, Mr. Rutledge of South Carolina is by far the greatest orator, but if you speak of solid information and sound judgment, Colonel Washington is unquestionably the greatest man on that floor.'"

THOMAS JEFFERSON (1814):

"On the whole, his character was, in its mass, perfect, in nothing bad, in few points indifferent; and it may truly be said that never did nature and fortune combine more perfectly to make a man great, and to place him in the same constellation with whatever worthies have merited from man an everlasting remembrance. For his was the singular destiny and merit of leading the armies of his country successfully through an arduous war, for the establishment of its independence; of conducting its councils through the birth of a government, new in its forms and principles, until it had settled down into a quiet and orderly train; and of scrupulously obeying the laws through the whole of his career, civil and military, of which the history of the world furnishes no other example."

JOHN MARSHALL (Chief Justice, 1801-1835):

"No man has ever appeared upon the theatre of public action, whose integrity was more incorruptible, or whose principles were more perfectly free from the contamination of those selfish and unworthy passions, which find their nourishment in the conflicts of party. Having no views which required concealment, his real and avowed motives were the same; and his whole correspondence does not furnish a single case from which even an enemy would infer that he was capable under any circumstances, of stooping to the employment of duplicity. No truth can be uttered with more confidence than that his ends were always upright, and his means always pure."

COUNT LOUIS DE FONTANES (1800):

"The people who so lately stigmatized Washington as a rebel, regard even the enfranchisement of America, as one of the events consecrated by history and past ages. Such is the veneration excited by great characters. He seems so little to belong to modern times, that he imparts to us the same vivid impressions as the most august examples of antiquity with all that they accomplish. His work is scarcely finished when it at once attracts the veneration which we freely accord to those achievements only that are consecrated by time. The American country, the contemporary of our own, is fixed forever. Washington began it with energy and finished it with moderation. He knew how to maintain it, pursuing always the prosperity of his country; and this aim alone can justify at the tribunal of the Most High, enterprises so extraordinary."

CALVIN COOLIDGE (President of the United States, 1924):

"Through and through Washington is the great example of character. He sought to bestow that heritage upon his country. We shall fail in our estimate and understanding of him unless we remember that during his lifetime he helped to build a place of religious worship; in his will be provided for institutions of learning and in his farewell address he emphasized the spiritual values of life. But what he did was even more eloquent than what he said. He was a soldier, a patriot, a statesman, but in addition to all these he was a great teacher." "His ways were the ways of truth. He built for eternity. His influence grows. His stature increases with the increasing years. In wisdom of action, in purity of character, he stands alone. We can not estimate him. We can only indicate our reverence for him and thank the Divine Providence which sent him to serve and inspire his fellow men." And in addressing Congress on the subject of the Washington Bicentennial Celebration, President Coolidge said: "Wherever there are those who love ordered liberty, they may well join in the observance of that event."

We must not only commemorate the greatness of Washington. We must emphasize in our minds and take seriously to heart those features of his life and ideals which the world has greatest need to follow today. I think that, besides his unselfish devotion to duty, we should emphasize in these days the quality of self discipline and the ideal of LIBERTY WITH ORDER. Washington's great character was not all due to natural inherited traits and good parental training (though it is true that it had those excellent foundations). One of the things that we know about him with greatest certainty is that his whole life was characterized by self discipline. His was an ordered life.

In these days the idea seems to be gaining ground that Liberty means that each one shall be free to do as he pleases, without much regard for the rights or even the safety of others. I believe that when we think of it we realize that if this idea gains ascendancy real liberty can not endure. But we do not think about it enough. We feel so secure in our liberties that we think that they can not be lost, but we may find out too late that this feeling of security was unwarranted. Let us study this year the life of Washington, and it will bring to us the realization that the only real liberty, the only liberty that is enduring, is that for which he stood—LIBERTY that accords full consideration to the interests and rights of all, LIBERTY WITH ORDER AND SELF DISCIPLINE.

PAN AMERICAN DAY MESSAGE

On Pan American Day, April 14, 1932, the Acting President of Ecuador again paid tribute to George Washington in the message which he sent to be read during the exercises that day at the Tomb of Washington at Mount Vernon. Dr. Baquerizo Moreno's message follows:

THE PAN AMERICAN UNION, BY TAKING AN ACTIVE AND LEADING PART IN THE COMMEMORATION OF THE SECOND CENTENARY OF WASHINGTON'S BIRTH, IS PERFORMING A SERVICE WORTHY OF THE HIGHEST PRAISE AND ONE THAT WILL BE A STIMULUS TO TRUE CONTINENTAL SOLIDARITY.

NOBILITY OF CHARACTER, A SERENE SPIRIT, VIRILE ENERGY, AND A HEART FULL OF SYMPATHY, LOVE, AND HUMANITY—THESE QUALITIES WHICH WASHINGTON POSSESSED OFFER A MAGNIFICENT EXEMPLAR FOR THE READY ADMIRATION OF AMERICA AND THE WORLD.

MAY IT BE OUR GOOD FORTUNE THAT HE WHO WAS FIRST IN SO MANY PATHS OF GREATNESS, IN WAR, IN PEACE, AND IN THE HEARTS OF HIS COUNTRYMEN, MAY SINCERELY AND LOYALLY UNITE THE NATIONS OF AMERICA IN A LASTING UNION OF PEACE, PROSPERITY, AND PROGRESS.

ALFREDO BAQUERIZO MORENO,
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC.

SIAM

ROYALTY of the Kingdom of Siam joined the American colony in Bangkok, the capital city, in inaugurating the Bicentennial Celebration in that Asiatic country. The premier celebration was a "George Washington Reception," held at the American Legation on February 22, 1932, with the American Minister to Siam, Hon. David E. Kaufman, as host.

The Royal House of Siam was represented at this event by Their Royal Highnesses Prince and Princess Svasti, father and mother of Queen Rambabarni; Their Royal Highnesses Prince and Princess Chumbot, the private secretariat of His Majesty King Prajadhipok, and the Siamese Government paid its respects through Phya Vijitavongs, former Siamese Minister to Washington, and several members of the Siamese diplomatic corps. Following the reception, a supper dance was held for the American colonists, the diplomatic corps and the younger Siamese Serene Highnesses.

Mr. Kaufman in an official dispatch to the Department of State, March 2, 1932, stated that the

"Washington Anniversary was celebrated by the Legation with unusual enthusiasm manifested by the American colony and with a marked expression of good will on the part of the Siamese Government and its people."

In addition to the presence of the above mentioned Royalty and Governmental dignitaries of Siam, members of the British, French, and German diplomatic corps and colonies came to offer their felicitations on the day and hundreds of resident Americans gathered at the Legation.

THE BANGKOK DAILY MAIL, an English-language newspaper printed in Bangkok, in describing the setting of the event said:

The lawn at the Legation was gaily decorated with flags and lanterns and in the arched doorway through which the guests passed as they arrived was hung an enlarged framed photograph of George Washington, about which were draped two American flags.

Pavilions had been erected for serving refreshments and from a loudspeaker hidden in one of the trees of the compound, incidental music was broadcast during the reception. Two hundred copies of the American National Anthem were distributed among the guests. At about six o'clock a chorus of forty Americans sang the first verse and many of the other guests joined in.

ADDRESS OF AMERICAN MINISTER

Following the singing, the American Minister asked the guests to group themselves in seats around him while he delivered the following address:

Your Royal Highnesses, Your Highnesses, Friends and Fellow Citizens:

On this day Americans everywhere, whether at home or abroad, are coming together to celebrate the memory of one of the greatest, if not the greatest, man who ever lived in the tide of time—the Father of our Country, George Washington. I know of no better way that I can express his greatness and his achievements in a short and concise way than to quote the beautiful language of our former President Calvin Coolidge, when he said:

"He was the directing spirit, without which there would have been no independence, no union, no constitution and no republic. His influence grows—his stature increases with the increasing years. In wisdom of action, in purity of character, he stands alone."

My friends, turn back with me the pages of our history, and once again endure the hardship of those early colonists struggling for freedom.

Their telephone was a trail blazed through the wilderness, their airship a stage coach, their radio a pulpit and town hall, and their telegraph a Paul Revere. But in that soil was nurtured the stripping of a mighty virtue. In that cradle was fostered the spirit of a glorious freedom that penned the Declaration of Independence and lighted the fires of the Revolution from whose dying embers rose that fabled phoenix, one of the greatest contributions to government the world has ever known—the constitution of the United States.

Our whole nation today is aflame with patriotic fervor and grateful remembrance of him who was first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen.

I wish that every statesman and law-giver, great or small, might on the 22nd day of February be obliged to prepare a speech on Washington—and so be led to read a few chapters of his life even were it at the expense of omitting the reading of the scriptures for that day only.

For it is forever useful to get a little closer to this great figure; to examine the problems which he had to solve; to study the way he had of meeting them and to rub up, as it were, against his character. I find his life replete with suggestions for the every-day conduct of public affairs, whether these be concerned with mighty principles or petty annoyances. What he did, and why he did it, was in every case perfectly understandable to the average intellect. There was no seeming play or the miraculous, carrying us . . . into those uncharted regions of political speculation which Washington so sanely avoided. That mighty brain of his seethed with no unfathomable imaginings—I doubt if it seethed at all—his head was never in the clouds, but we can feel across the century the warm beat of his great and steadfast human heart.

No matter at what point we pick up his life, no matter to what minute scrutiny we subject it, we come away refreshed, informed, strengthened. Look at his boyhood; was he not just such a boy as any of us would be proud and happy to have this day? A few years later appears a youth who at twenty can carry himself faultlessly through high adventure, listening, as he wrote in boyish ecstasy, to the sweet music of the first bullets that whistled round his ears, yet never for one second distracted from the grave business entrusted to him by his Governor. A young hero—yes, a young hero if you like—but so much more than that; even then, as always after.

If I dwell upon these days when Washington was under twenty-five, it is because the story has such charm as well as high significance. What a wholesome, happy record! This brave and conscientious boy, this ardent youth, this impetuous lover, this hot-blooded sportsman, this honest, gallant young gentleman! Do we know him as we should, do we love him as we might? And yet he speaks to us out of a past no more distant than our own departed youth and in accents whose one sad note is that these sweet days of mounting hope and passionate endeavor are over for us as well as for him.

All that follows in his maturer life seems but a continuation of a vaster scale of what had long preceded and prepared for it. Indeed his letters to the Continental Congress are almost a repetition of those of Dinwiddie, and when he cursed Charles Lee at Monmouth, it sounded like only an echo of what he hurled at Braddock's troops in 1755. Valley Forge itself was not a new trial for Washington the soldier, but rather a heart-breaking experience for Washington the patriot; it was not so much that his army suffered and dwindled as that his faith in democracy was assailed.

His men were hungry, yet there was abundant food throughout the colonies; they froze from want of blankets and clothing when the civil population was snug and warm. Why? Because the politicians in Congress were now busy wrangling as to what class or section would wield the power, what favorites should be given command, upon what category of citizens the sacrifices should fall. The best men were fighting, the worst were rattling about in statesmen's shoes they could not fill. Local selfishness had overmastered national feeling and only Washington and a few others of his stamp kept the shattered structure of liberty from falling. There was bickering instead of action—talk and intrigue when ringing measures of authority alone could save the country.

Washington's letters now seem tinged with the bloody sweat of agony, but he did not lose his calmness or his courage, and never was his skill more manifest. While commanding his soldiers with an iron hand, he wrote to governors, he pleaded with congressmen, he argued with the influential; he as the sole, unrelenting, cohesive force in a disintegrating continent.

If the winter of 1777-1778 had filled the cup of political inefficiency and selfishness, the years following 1781 caused it to run over. Independence had been achieved, but the country was falling to pieces, and birds of prey already hovered about for easy pickings. The army was unpaid and neglected; private gain and political advantage alone seemed worthy of attention. The men who so readily had borrowed vast sums in every market, the political financiers who drew their sole resources from the printing press, now left to others, or to no one, the task of meeting these honest obligations. The sole authority in the land was Washington's, and had he not held the army—firmly but with infinite tact—to its duty, the victory of Yorktown might never have been followed by independence.

You will remember that, utterly disgusted with the Continental Congress, its selfishness, its ingratitude, its incompetence, the army with calm deliberation and through its officers, asked Washington to allow them to proclaim him dictator, make him king. You know with what indignation he refused. Finally, when his forces were disbanded and Washington returned to his farm at Mount Vernon, men plainly saw that his word was the only credit the country now enjoyed, his personality its greatest asset, his influence its only crystallizing force.

Chiefly due to his efforts, the Constitutional Convention was finally devised and brought together. He did not wish to go; he had to. He did not wish to be its president; he was obliged to accept. As the work went on and our present Constitution began to take shape, it can be plainly seen that the powers outlined for the coming President of the United States were framed to fit his measure. Had Washington been other than what he was, had any act of all his life shown him eager or anxious for his personal fortune, our Constitution would never have been constructed upon its present powerful lines, the attributes of the presidency would have been weakly insufficient, and helpless before the assaults of some jealous or discordant legislature.

PRINCE SVASTI SPEAKS

At the suggestion of His Majesty, King Prajadhipok, who, according to the American Minister, is a great admirer of George Washington, Mr. Kaufman called upon Prince Svasti, father-in-law of the King, to make a few extempore remarks at the reception.

To the great delight of the audience, the Prince in faultless English proclaimed his high regard for the American hero, declaring that George Washington had exerted a profound influence on Siam and its people. The full text of Prince Svasti's remarks follow:

His Excellency, the American Minister, has taken me unawares, but since he has asked me to speak on this occasion—the 200th anniversary of the birth of George Washington—I really cannot refuse him, for all my life I have been keenly interested in this great American, the First President of the United States, and I have come to be a great admirer of him.

It happens that I have recently been able to gratify an early ambition of mine—to visit the United States, the country of George Washington. Unfortunately, perhaps, this opportunity came at a date rather late in life. I should have gone over there thirty years ago; then I should have been able to move about more than I did on this recent visit. For, ladies and gentlemen, in a few months I will be as old as George Washington was when he died. George Washington died at the age of sixty-seven and in a few months I will reach that age myself.

I want to tell you about an incident that occurred on this visit of mine—about my feelings when I saw for the first time Mount Vernon, where George Washington is buried. I went to Mount Vernon during our stay in Washington, D. C., representing His Majesty the King, who happened to be indisposed on that day. Of course I had read about Mount Vernon, had seen pictures of it, and all that, but the thrill I experienced when I actually saw the very place where he had lived and died—the beautiful yet simple home, overlooking the river, the plain and unostentatious burial place—was in every way unique. It was a thrill greater and more keenly felt than any of you begin to experience when you see our famous wats, our temples. For there at Mount Vernon I saw the reflection of the whole life of the great man we honor here today. The simplicity and the beauty of that old house, with its rolling lawns and shady trees, is a living monument to the simplicity and the beauty of the character of the man who lived and died there.

Many of you Americans, of course, have been to Mount Vernon and you know the peculiar thrill that the place holds for all who have read of the life of George Washington, but few of us Siamese have had the opportunity. When I went back to Washington I told the King that he simply must go and see Mount Vernon, but His Majesty's physicians urged him to rest and it was impossible for him to go, much as he desired to. However, on the following day Her Majesty the Queen expressed a desire to go and she went with Mrs. Hoover herself to show her about Mount Vernon!

President Washington, it happens, was just five years and one month older than my great-grandfather. In that part of the Eighteenth Century, between 1732 and, say, 1737, it seems that many great men were being born, men who were to mould the destinies of nations, who were to contribute much to the lives of the people of their countries and to posterity. At forty-four, Washington was called upon to command the army of the American colonies and to fight for independence and freedom. And it so happens that my great-grandfather was called upon to rule this country just five years before Washington was called upon to be President of the Convention that drew up the Constitution of the United States. But the most remarkable coincidence is that it was on April 6 that my great-grandfather entered the city of Bangkok from Cambodia with his army and was proclaimed King. For it was on April 6, as many of you know, that George Washington was made President of the United States.

In Washington's character I have always admired his forbearance, his wisdom, his political genius and his tolerance—but perhaps most of all his forbearance and his tolerance. He was able, ever, to forbear, to tolerate the annoyances that faced him after he assumed the presidency. I am glad to say that the same spirit of forbearance, of tolerance has been proclaimed by the Kings of Siam from the first King down to His Present Majesty.

George Washington had a profound influence, in fact, on Siam and on the Siamese people. The first American missionaries brought us the first word of his life, of his career, of his ideals. They told us about him. And they brought pictures of him. We had many other missionaries, but I think it can be said that the American missionaries, through the reflection which they gave of the personality and the character of George Washington, carried more weight at that time, in the early days, than any others. George Washington's picture was in many Siamese homes and there were few among the educated classes who did not admire him as a great man, the leader of a great, new country.

There was such a picture, for instance, in the house of my uncle, who was a Second King, as they called them then. In the house was a large picture of George Washington, hung on the wall—the familiar picture which is famous all over the world, much the same as the one that hangs here today. My uncle's son, a little boy, saw this picture one day and he asked his father, "Who's that?" "Why, that's George Washington," his father said, "the great American who was father of his country." Several times the boy asked his father about that picture, and about the man it represented, and one day, after hearing the name repeated once more, the boy said: "Father, I want to be named like that!" So my uncle said, "Very well, then you shall be named like that." And he was. He was known as George Washington, this little boy, until later in life, when it was necessary to change his name, after the Siamese custom. But even then he kept the first name, and his name began with "George." And right here we have a descendant of this man, of our Prince George Washington, in the person of Prince Bidyalankarana, for this man was one of his direct ancestors.

The influence of George Washington was felt in Siam long after his death and among the many men of the West who have stirred the imaginations of the people of Siam, George Washington undoubtedly stands foremost as a personality worthy of our admiration and respect.

Following the address by Prince Svasti refreshments were served while the guests indulged in conversation devoted to the themes of the two addresses. At eight o'clock the loudspeaker carried the strains of the Siamese National Anthem to all present—a tribute which Mr. Kaufman states "was greatly appreciated by the Siamese."

The supper-dance following the reception was held under the beautiful full moon of the Orient on an out-of-doors pavilion. The Minister remarks "that out of respect of the Father of our Country the mosquitoes did not bother us. Everyone seemed to be happy and enjoying himself." The dispatch is concluded with the information that the Minister was the recipient of many letters of felicitation regarding the day from persons in the remote provinces of the country whose acquaintance he had made during a trip into the provincial parts of Siam.

The newspapers of Bangkok, prior to the 22nd of February, carried long biographical sketches of George Washington. The same papers printed complete accounts of the celebration at the Legation.

THE SRI KRUNG DAILY NEWS, a vernacular newspaper, said editorially, on February 21, according to a translation supplied by the American Legation in Bangkok, that "Washington was a great statesman, endowed with extreme goodness, faithfulness and gallantry in the highest degree of superiority."

At the Bangkok Christian College on February 22, 1932, a special Washington program was arranged to demonstrate the high regard of the students for the Great American. Nei Heng, of the Matayome class, read an essay in Siamese on the life and work of Washington. Kroo Bahnchoed delivered an address choosing as his subject "Siam in the Time of Washington."

Mrs. Allen Basset sang the "Star Spangled Banner" to the assembled students. The American Minister lent a large portrait of George Washington to the college, which was placed beside the pictures of their Majesties, the King and Queen of Siam and adorned with the Stars and Stripes to match the Siamese emblems draping the royal pictures.

PANAMA AND THE CANAL ZONE

HE Bicentennial Celebration in the Republic of Panama and the Canal Zone was marked by the active participation of the President of the Republic, the American Minister to Panama, the American Society of the Republic of Panama, government musical organizations, and American and Panamanian school children.

In writing to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission concerning the celebrations in Panama and the Canal Zone, the American Minister, Hon. Roy T. Davis, said: "The literature issued by the Commission was most useful in preparing plans for the local celebration of Washington's Birthday."

Minister Davis initiated the observance of the anniversary on the Isthmus of Panama by inviting the newly organized American Society of the Republic of Panama, and officials of the Army, Navy, and Panama Canal to meet with him at the Legation to draw up plans for appropriate celebrations.

The success of their efforts made the commemorative events of the Bicentennial outstanding.

OPENING CONCERT IN PANAMA CITY

In the capital of the Republic of Panama, Panama City, the celebration opened with a concert and a patriotic mass meeting, at which the President of Panama was the principal speaker.

The first event was the George Washington Bicentennial Concert the evening of February 21 in Cathedral Plaza.

One hundred and ten musicians formed the huge band, which was a joint organization of the Panamanian Government Band and the drum and bugle corps of the Thirty-third Infantry, United States Army, sent from Fort Clayton to participate in the celebration.

During the concert the city of Panama and the Cathedral Plaza were brilliantly lighted by searchlights from Army stations in the Canal Zone, from Fort Amador and Ancon Hill in particular. Thousands of persons attended the concert, and so many automobiles were parked around and near the Plaza that it was necessary to suspend traffic while the concert was being given.

A special program of musical numbers appropriate for the occasion had been arranged, a feature being the "George Washington Bicentennial March," by Sousa, played for the first time publicly on the Isthmus of Panama. A special note of interest was the directing of the band, which was divided between Prof. Alberto Galimany, of Panama, and Warrant Officer John Fisher, of Fort Clayton. When the national anthem of the United States was played, Prof. Galimany directed. When the national anthem of Panama was played, it was directed by Warrant Officer Fisher.

The event was called "one of the most colorful ever held in Panama," and from the daily press is taken the following vivid description of the scene:

The powerful searchlights (at the concert) illuminated the pearl-studded spires of the Cathedral and tinted the rich verdure of the trees in the plaza an unnatural Nile green. The swallows which make their home in the square, long since gone to sleep, were startled by the prying beams and fled for safety into the darkness.

Every inch of available parking space was utilized long before the concert got under way. Hundreds stood patiently in the area surrounding the bandstand, which was scarcely large enough to accommodate the 110 musicians who composed the twin bands. There was, in fact, an overflow onto the steps.

CELEBRATION OF AMERICAN SOCIETY

On the evening of February 22 a patriotic meeting was held at the Auditorium of the National Institute in Panama City in honor of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, which was attended by the President of the Republic, members of the Cabinet and Diplomatic Corps, high ranking officials from the Panama Canal, and many other local dignitaries.

The meeting was the first public program under the auspices of the American Society of the Republic of Panama, and the audience numbered more than 400.

His Excellency Dr. Ricardo J. Alfaro, President of Panama, was the principal speaker. American Minister Roy T. Davis, Major General Preston Brown, Lieut. Colonel Julian L. Schley, Vice Admiral Arthur L. Willard, and Dr. William McCulley James also spoke. The presentation to the National Institute of a portrait of Washington was a feature of the evening.

As the guests assembled, selected music was played by the orchestra of the U. S. S. Rochester, by courtesy of Admiral Arthur St. Clair Smith and under the direction of Bandmaster Enrico Ricarte.

Rev. Alfred Carpenter pronounced the invocation, after which students of the "Escuela de los Estados Unidos" sang in English. The president of the Society, Mr. Theodore McGinnis, then explained the purpose of the Society and of the evening's program in a brief introduction.

The first speaker was the young son of Minister Davis, Roy Tasco Davis, Jr., who spoke on "Washington as a Youth." He told of the birth and early life of Washington and of his education. During his talk the youthful speaker said, "Washington intended to join the Navy, but was prevailed upon not to go. Gee, that was tough!" He also told of Washington's school life, and of his 110 rules of conduct. "This shows he was an unusual boy—or else sick at the time," he said. His brief talk, interspersed with such bits of humor, delighted the audience.

Dr. Wm. McCulley James, the next speaker, spoke on "Washington as a Leader." He pointed out that it is the custom for a professional man to render a "considered opinion," and that ability to do this depends upon ratiocination, or the process of reasoning. It is a quality which all true leaders of mankind must possess to a great degree, he said. "With him power was but a means to an end, a working tool to be laid aside when its purpose should be accomplished, not a weapon for the continuance of personal aggrandizement, nor the instrument for exaltation of personal honor or rank. He is a great leader who brings his people from the abyss of defeat to the heights of victory . . . but the greatest leader of all is he who, like Cincinnatus the Roman, having led his people safely through the war to peace, can himself lay aside his armor and his trophies, that in his conduct we may see truly manifested the spirit of abnegation which sows that others may reap."

Lieut. Col. J. L. Schley, next on the program, spoke on "Characteristics of Washington." He read extracts from the writings of Washington to describe characteristic traits. These letters, he said, bespoke Washington's prudence, wisdom, and modesty.

"That Washington was a devoutly religious man appears from his regular attendance at Divine services and from his demonstration of his faith," Col. Schley continued. "He many times placed his faith in the guidance and protection of the Supreme Being and declared his belief that God, in His great goodness, would direct a course of action." Washington's loyalty to the people was also pointed out by Col. Schley.

"In Washington," he concluded, "we find the man of great action explained by the man of great thoughts. The more we examine his thoughts, the more clearly they reveal to us the characteristics of the man whose life was so full of achievement and service."

A group of Balboa high school students, under the direction of Mrs. Helen Currier Baker, then sang two selections, after which Major General Preston Brown spoke on "Washington as a Soldier." General Brown's address, as summarized in the PANAMA AMERICAN of February 23, follows:

General Brown described how Washington inherited the traditions of the foot soldier at that time, and traced the development of a militia system first in New Jersey and then in other states, a system which grew as the colonies grew. The defeat of Braddock, General Brown said, revolutionized military thought in Europe as well as in the United States, and a new doctrine of infantry fighting came into being.

The General then told how Washington entered the Revolution with only such militiamen to call upon, undisciplined and poorly armed, all dominated by the local influences of their section of the country. Washington's greatest trial, he said, was Valley Forge, and that marked the beginning of our present Army.

Washington knew, the General continued, that an Army is not all a material thing, that it is the spirit of the Army that wins out, and that unless an Army has such spirit it is bound to fail. Washington drilled discipline and training into his men, and thus had an army that was unconquerable.

The next speaker on the program was Vice Admiral Arthur L. Willard, whose "Remarks on Washington" comprised glowing tributes to Washington, particularly as related to Washington's interest in the sea and an American Navy.

He, more than his compatriots, realized the far-reaching influence of sea power and the importance of having control of the sea. He fully recognized and appreciated the value of the aid rendered by the French fleet under Count de Grasse, which, through its control of the Western Atlantic in the theater of operations, made possible the victory at Yorktown which brought the War of Independence to a successful conclusion.

PRESIDENT OF PANAMA DELIVERS ADDRESS

The highlight of the program was the speech of President Alfaro. The President spoke in English, in courtesy to the many Americans present, who received the speech honoring their First President, by the President of another Republic, with enthusiastic applause and sincere appreciation.

President Alfaro's speech follows in full:

It is with a feeling of genuine satisfaction that I have attended this celebration in honor of the great hero whose memory is revered not only by the people of the United States but by the lovers of democracy all over the world.

In the two hundred years which have elapsed since the birth of George Washington the world has witnessed a great many transformations. When Washington was born on the shores of the Potomac there was little difference between the simple, patriarchal, homogeneous life then known to humanity and the life through which it had gone for centuries and centuries. There was no steam, no electricity, no machinery, no great industries and a very limited commerce, restricted on one hand by national monopolies and on the other hand by the ravages of piracy and privateering. Transportation was only that which could be afforded by beasts of burden on land, by the winds on the sea. Communication between man and man, between people and people, necessarily had to be as difficult and slow as transportation.

In political life the doctrine of the divine right of kings was tranquilly accepted everywhere; and emperors, kings and princes exercised a generally absolute power over all lands within the reach of their military forces. Africa and Asia, unknown in their greater part, remained extraneous to western civilization. Europe was the domain of century-old dynasties which decided over the destinies of peoples either by war or by family covenants. America was the property of four European crowns. The English ruled over the New England colonies; the French over Canada; the Portuguese over Brazil, and the Spaniards over the vast Empire which extended from Florida and California to the Straits of Magellan.

Humanity was apparently sunken in a lethargy which could not allow any belief in the proximity of great changes. Yet, in the second half of that quiet century in which Washington was born, events took place which showed that the human spirit was ripe for the advent of a new era of emancipation and progress. The political ideas which had lighted the brains of a few French thinkers found a concrete expression in the western hemisphere when the New England colonies revolted against the Crown. The dream of the writers of the Encyclopedia became a reality when the American Republic emerged from the revolutionary war as a promise of freedom for the oppressed peoples, of democracy for the whole world. And from the establishment of that great commonwealth in which Washington was the guiding spirit in war and in peace, what great changes have taken place in history! We have seen the spirit of liberty return from America to France and start that enormous conflagration in which the horrors of feudalism and the extortions of the ancient regime disappeared forever. From the orgy of blood a man rose who gathered in his potent hand the unchained forces of the Revolution, drove them over an astonished Europe and erected an Empire over the ruins of the fallen monarchy and upon the foundations of the first Republic. The new Caesar humiliated the old dynasties, wiped out frontiers, created new kingdoms, which he distributed among his family and thus a Bonaparte sat upon the Spanish throne. This usurpation in turn marked the beginning of political convulsions in the Spanish colonies, which after a long and bloody struggle, finally conquered their independence and established Republics whose model was the prosperous and great commonwealth of the North.

Bitter and tenacious has been the struggle between the old regimes and the new spirit of nationalism, democracy and freedom. Through a number of wars and revolutions we see absolutism alternately rise and fall, hold sway here and there. The Napoleonic Empire crumbles down and France changes four times her form of government. Something similar occurs in Spain; and in Latin America the monarchical reaction is crushed forever in Mexico and in Brazil. Where mere geographical expressions existed, as in the case of Italy and Germany, new strong and unified nationalities come to the front. England becomes the mistress of the seas and Russia stands out as the abode of serfdom and the impregnable bulwark of autocracy. New nationalities spring out of the old Ottoman empire while old nationalities remain engulfed by the apparently irresistible strength of the Austrian colossus. Mighty powers become enfeebled while other nations in turn, whose beginnings were quite modest, increase their wealth and strength in an astonishing measure. And these changes, which lasted through the whole of the nineteenth century, are succeeded by new, more radical, more profound transformations in our twentieth century when the last war disrupts the economic and social structure of most nations and causes the map of Europe to be made anew.

In this changing panorama of the political world we can observe the fall and rise of nations and peoples, we can follow the ups and downs in their wealth and power. But the curve that we never see go down is the one marking the ascent of those principles for which George Washington fought and stood. As time goes on, the number of Republics has been constantly on the increase and notwithstanding the many shortcomings of the democratic system, no better, or even equal substitute has yet been found.

The historical figure of George Washington is characterized by a moral equilibrium, by a serenity of mind, which constitute the greatest gifts of a truly republican ruler. Great as were his merits as a military leader, as a man of action, as an indefatigable organizer and a valiant fighter, the most admirable feature of his career is that judicious way in which he avoided letting his country and his countrymen feel the weight of the superior qualities and advantages with which it would have been easy for him to wield power as long as he desired.

For that reason I venture to say that from the Latin American point of view the greatest glory of George Washington consists in his having been the successful head of the first republican state established in modern times and in having set examples and standards that will last as long as justice and righteousness, honesty and wisdom, disinterestedness and patriotism will preside over the destinies of free and civilized peoples.

The last event on the program was the presentation of the portrait of Washington to the National Institute by American Minister Davis. In presenting the portrait, Mr. Davis spoke briefly in Spanish on the significance of this anniversary in the history of the United States and all the Americas. Dr. Manuel Roy, rector of the Institute, received the portrait in the name of the Institute and thanked the Minister on its behalf in the warmest terms.

PAN AMERICAN DAY MESSAGE

The President of Panama was again a participant in the celebrations of the Bicentennial year, when, on Pan American Day, April 14, 1932, the following message from him was read at the tomb of Washington at Mount Vernon:

THE WORK OF FREEDOM ACCOMPLISHED BY GEORGE WASHINGTON PRECEDES BY ALMOST HALF A CENTURY THE EMANCIPATION OF THE LATIN AMERICAN COLONIES. BOLIVAR WAS BORN IN CARACAS THE SAME YEAR IN WHICH WASHINGTON ENTERED NEW YORK AT THE HEAD OF HIS TROOPS AFTER BEING VICTORIOUS IN THE REVOLUTIONARY WAR AND MAKING PEACE WITH ENGLAND; AND THE AMERICAN CINCINNATUS WENT TO HIS TOMB AT MOUNT VERNON 10 YEARS BEFORE THE MOVEMENTS TO REGAIN LIBERTY BROKE OUT IN HISPANIC AMERICA. THERE COULD, THEN, BE NO DIRECT RELATION BETWEEN WASHINGTON AND THE REPUBLICS OF IBERIAN ORIGIN WHICH TODAY SHARE WITH THE UNITED STATES THE HIGH IDEALS OF PAN AMERICANISM, BUT TO AMERICA AND TO THE WHOLE WORLD GEORGE WASHINGTON WAS THE VALIANT PALADIN OF LIBERTY AND THE PUREST INCARNATION OF DEMOCRACY. FOR THIS REASON ON THE BICENTENNIAL OF HIS BIRTH IT IS FITTING TO REMEMBER THAT IN THE HISTORY OF REPUBLICS IT WAS WASHINGTON WHO POINTED OUT THE WAY, WHO CLEARED THE PATH, AND WHO BEQUEATHED TO FUTURE GENERATIONS IMPERISHABLE EXAMPLES OF RECTITUDE, UNSELFISHNESS, WISDOM, AND TRUE REPUBLICANISM; AND THEREFORE, IN THE NAME OF THE REPUBLIC OF PANAMA, OF WHICH I HAVE THE HONOR TO BE PRESIDENT, I SEND TODAY TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES, THROUGH THE GOVERNING BOARD OF THE PAN AMERICAN UNION, A MESSAGE OF CORDIAL SYMPATHY WITH THE UNIVERSAL TRIBUTE

WHICH THE FREE NATIONS OF THE EARTH ARE RENDERING TO THE ILLUSTRIOUS MEMORY OF THE LIBERATOR OF THE UNITED STATES.

RICARDO J. ALFARO,
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC.

CELEBRATIONS IN COLON

Observance of the Bicentennial in Colon, Panama, took the form of a band concert and a banquet.

The concert was given by the "Bomberos' Band" the evening of Washington's Birthday, and featured patriotic airs and American music. A large audience, composed of Americans and their Panamanian friends attended.

The banquet was held the evening of February 22 at the Strangers' Club under the auspices of the Colon Division of the American Society of the Republic of Panama. Messrs. R. C. Jones, J. J. Major and J. S. Gladwell formed the executive committee and spared no pains to make the dinner a banner occasion and an outstanding celebration of this great anniversary.

The Governor of the Province of Colon, His Excellency José María Fernández, had intended to be present, but was prevented by official business. His Honor L. J. A. Ducruet, Mayor of Colon, was guest of honor, as was also Captain C. S. Kerrick, of the United States Navy.

The president of the local branch of the American Society of the Republic of Panama, Dr. Harry Eno, spoke on the purpose of the society and of the evening's celebration. Mayor Ducruet and Captain Kerrick also spoke briefly on the significance of the day. An account of the banquet, taken from THE STAR AND HERALD of Panama City, follows:

"The American Society of the Republic of Panama has for its object the promotion of good fellowship between Americans and Panamanians as much as between Americans themselves who are residents of the Isthmus," said Dr. Harry Eno, president of the Colon Branch of the newly organized association and toastmaster at the banquet held last evening at the Strangers' Club in honor of the bicentennial of George Washington's birth.

Dr. Eno stressed the friendly relations that have ever maintained between the two nationalities since the day upon which Panama obtained her independence from Colombia, giving a brief resumé of Panama's history from the period in which she first threw off the yoke of Spanish rule over a hundred years ago.

Alcalde L. J. A. Ducruet was the guest of honor and said a few words of congratulation to the assembled group, regretting the inability of Governor José María Fernández to attend.

Captain C. S. Kerrick, commandant of the U. S. Navy Submarine Base at Coco Solo, one of the evening's guests of honor, spoke of the commercial preeminence of the United States throughout the world and the dominating influence held by that country in the commercial life of South America. He congratulated the society upon its splendid organization on the Atlantic Side and said that its activities would undoubtedly have a far-reaching influence on the commercial relations between the two countries.

Those attending the dinner, in addition to the guests of honor, were Leonard G. Huff, Franck G. Judd, H. J. Quigley, O. F. Thomas, Dr. Wendell S. Dove, J. McGann, Walter Gould, Lee W. Kelso, B. Moran, Samuel Gorin, I. L. Greene, David Goldsmith, Carl Oldstein, L. Thompson, I. Bennett, James R. Powell, Howard Finnegan, R. C. Jones, W. H. Fredericks, Dr. George Dorand, H. H. Lewis, Dr. Carl E. Safford and James J. Major.

The Bicentennial Celebration on the Isthmus of Panama closed with special Thanksgiving services in all the churches. Minister Davis had supplied the various ministers with copies of Washington's first Thanksgiving Proclamation for use in connection with these services, which brought out the importance of this doubly American celebration.

NEWSPAPERS PAY TRIBUTE TO WASHINGTON

The newspapers of the Republic all entered into the observance of the Bicentennial throughout the year and especially on Washington's Birthday, when they all published special commemorative sections.

An editorial published in the Spanish language newspaper, LA ESTRELLA DE PANAMA on February 22, 1932, and a eulogy on the First President of the United States which appeared the same day in the English language newspaper of the republic, THE STAR AND HERALD, follow:

(FROM LA ESTRELLA DE PANAMA)

There were two notable, two outstanding characteristics in George Washington, that personality which is the symbol of American greatness, the pride of America and the admiration of the whole world: a vigor, an indomitable energy, a faith in ultimate triumph, the ability to fight unremittingly to obtain his end, to overcome all obstacles—even the seemingly insuperable—which carried him to triumph against the colossal power of England; and the other, strictly moral, of a love of justice, of belief in order and democracy, of religious respect for human dignity, for human equality, for the liberty of all men and all people, which enabled him to establish a nation that was calm, laboring and methodical even immediately after that post-war period when spirits were exalted and the people were inclined to be idealistic rather than yield to practical law.

George Washington, as we have already said, is a symbol of North American greatness; and we, the sincere friends of the United States, wish, on this day which is the bicentenary of the birth of the illustrious warrior and statesman, that the symbolism be always perfect, that the nation of the North never cease to exhibit proudly those two admirable attributes: love of work, of struggle, of gigantic conquest of all obstacles in order to create and promote progress; and love of that justice which brings peace among nations and makes more possible the happiness of the human race.

We do not refer only to the North American nation of the present. Our compass is broader: our wish covers all the centuries, all the ages. And for that reason we wish that within 100 or 200 or 300 years, when this generation is gone, when other men and other pens are charged with recording the deeds of history, and when other anniversaries of the hero of American independence are celebrated, that, on seeing that the United States, with all the wealth of its natural resources, with all the force of its ideals, with the almost monstrous power of its strength, has not lost, nevertheless, any of its veneration for the right, any of its respect for the weak, any of its sympathy and support of weaker nations, one may say again from the heart: "undoubtedly the immortal nation of the United States has had, throughout the years, its perfect symbol in the immortal George Washington."

(FROM STAR AND HERALD)

George Washington's prestige and influence in South America must be and is based more upon the moral projections of his personality and his qualities as a far-sighted and sincere statesman than upon his military or strategic gifts or his services as such in the campaign for the independence of his fatherland.

As a leader of revolting masses, as a general who organized voluntary armies and vanquished crack European soldiers in the field of battle, Washington has many rivals on the continent. As a statesman who was able to solve the difficult problems of establishing a stable and well conducted government: as the leader of a state which because of its sound foundation and beginning was destined to become one of the greatest and most prosperous democracies of the earth; as a man who could always place principles before passions; conscious will before blind impulses; duty, courage and faith before the flattering appeal of vanity, of pleasure or caprice, even our genial Simon Bolívar can hardly be compared with George Washington.

The Father of North America achieved the greatest work which can be attempted by a public man: To found a free government upon order and peace and lay the foundations of a genuine democracy upon social equality and justice. Not seeking personal advantage, without prejudice and without partiality, having as his sole desire to serve his people according to the promptings of his conscience and his judgment, this great man knew how to place himself above "the baneful influence of the spirit of party" and left us as a precious legacy, at the end of his administration, the example of political probity which, unfortunately, our leaders have most needed. When his fellow citizens wanted to re-elect him for a third term, he flatly refused, holding that to place public power too long in the hands of one man was a danger and a contagious influence for democracy. And his decision to retire definitely to private life was unalterable.

The address which on this occasion he made to the country, six months before the expiration of this last presidential term, is a document which should be used as a primer in Civics by the rulers of our Latin-American pseudo-democracies.

There is concentrated there, in fact, the results of the long political experience of the First President of the United States and there it is shown in the form of solid maxims and wise and elevated advice the system of government which, in his opinion, was best suited to secure the benefits of national unity, peace and prosperity. . . .

The address with which Washington relinquished forever the exercise of a government which he initiated and ennobled for his country, seems to us the purest and most sincere political testament of a man who had deeply rooted in his soul, as invariable moral standards, justice, truth and integrity—and the serenity of one who was sure that he always acted in strict accordance with his conscience and walked along the straight and narrow path of virtue.

The rulers of our pseudo-democracies—we repeat once more—should use that address as a primer in Civics.

PARTICIPATION IN THE CANAL ZONE

Dividing the Republic of Panama is that ten-mile-wide strip of land and water that is a part of the United States—the Canal Zone—and in that doubly American portion of the Isthmus of Panama, the bicentenary of the birth of the "first American" was observed with special enthusiasm.

The celebration opened with memorial services in all the churches; every Army Post in the Zone held a "review of the troops" on Washington's Birthday; there were George Washington essay contests among the children; the various towns had community bicentennial celebrations, and there were impressive memorial tree plants.

From the February 22, 1932 issue of the STAR AND HERALD, English language newspaper of the Isthmus is taken the following description of the opening of the Bicentennial Celebration in the Canal Zone:

All Army posts on the Isthmus observed a special program on February 22, ordered by headquarters at Quarry Heights. Throughout the day the garrison flag was flown at all posts and all troops paraded under arms a short time before noon, including the guard and all prisoners.

Washington's Farewell Address was then read by post commanders to the assembled troops, so timed that it was finished at twelve o'clock noon, when the national salute of 21 guns was given. Then the troops presented arms and the bands played the "Star Spangled Banner." Following this, the soldiers marched in review before regimental commanders to the stirring strains of the "Battle Hymn of the Republic." The men were then dismissed, and a special holiday dinner was served at all messes.

The visiting cruisers of the Navy joined in the observance of the day, with special services aboard every ship that happened to be at the various Naval bases. Special holiday dinners were also served.

CELEBRATIONS AT PEDRO MIGUEL AND CRISTOBAL

A community gathering featured the observance of George Washington's Birthday in Pedro Miguel. The celebration was held in the Pedro Miguel Clubhouse, with Chaplain C. F. Groeser as the principal speaker.

The program opened with the playing of reveille, and the singing of "America" by the audience. A playlet, "Making the Flag" was then given, followed by patriotic songs rendered by a double quartet. The poem, "The Flag" and the song, "Father of the Land we Love" were the next numbers on the program, and then Chaplain Groeser gave his talk, taking as his subject the civic virtues exhibited by Washington. The salute to the flag and the singing of the "Star Spangled Banner" by the entire assembly concluded the formal program of the evening, after which there was an "old-time dance," featuring dances known to the colonial days.

The entire event had been made as reminiscent of the days of George Washington as possible. The decorations were colonial and patriotic and this theme was carried out even in the refreshments, which featured "Washington pie" and "Revolutionary punch."

In Cristobal, there were three separate observances of the opening of the Bicentennial Celebration, an essay contest, a dance pageant, and a "George Washington program" of the Woman's Club.

A month or two before the Bicentennial officially opened, the American Legion Auxiliary of the Elbert S. Waid Unit organized an essay contest for Boy Scouts and Girl Reserves to commemorate the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington. The topic for the boys was "The Youth and Manhood of George Washington." The girls' topic was "The Mother of George Washington." The awarding of prizes was made a special Bicentennial event during the opening week of the Celebration.

On February 19, the New Cristobal Kindergarten held a George Washington program, with sixty-five children participating in a colorful pageantry exhibition of dances.

There were marching and action songs recalling events in the life of the First President of the United States, and dances reminiscent of Colonial days. Patriotic songs and poems were also rendered by these small American citizens. The children even made up their own "orchestra" of drums, tamborines, triangles and bells, played to the accompaniment of a piano. "George Washington Refreshments" worked out in patriotic colors concluded the program.

The children's observance of the bicentennial anniversary of George Washington's birth in Cristobal, was followed on February 24 by the "George Washington Program" of the Woman's Club of that city.

The participants in this event, which was held in the auditorium of the Young Women's Christian Association Building, were all dressed in Colonial costume, giving added color and effectiveness to an already interesting program. Mrs. C. A. Hearne was in charge of the event, which opened with the singing of "Yankee Doodle" by members and guests. A piano solo, "Federal March" was then played by Mrs. Frank Ullrich, who also accompanied for the other musical numbers. A chorus of ten young girls, daughters of members of the club presented an action song, "See the Conquering Hero Comes," and this was followed by a pageant woven around Martha Washington and the dancing of a graceful minuet. There was an interlude of patriotic and colonial music, and the program concluded with a beautiful and inspiring tableau of George and Martha Washington.

VARIED EVENTS IN BALBOA

The celebrations in Balboa began with memorial services in the churches on Sunday, February 21, and continued with a civic meeting the next day, a patriotic entertainment on March 7 and a tree planting ceremony by the Girl Scouts on March 18 in honor of the founder of their nation.

Among the special observances in the churches was the extensive program of the Bible School of the Balboa Heights Baptist Church in the morning and the special patriotic services at the Balboa Union Church in the evening of February 21. At the latter services, Boy Scouts led a "Salute to the Flag" to open the program, the feature of which was an address by the pastor on the "Religion of the Father of Our Country." Patriotic music brought the evening to a close.

Washington's Birthday was observed with a gala civic entertainment the next day in the auditorium of the Balboa Club House. Charles F. Wahl, Canal Zone labor leader, delivered the principal address and local school children presented an attractive program of American Colonial dances.

Before a large gathering which taxed the capacity of the auditorium, the stage of which was beautifully decorated with flags showing the development of the American flag, Mr. Wahl gave emphasis in his speech to the relationship between America's first leader and the working man. "Labor always had a warm champion in George Washington," declared Mr. Wahl. "None saw more clearly than he the decisive part Labor was to play in the creation of the great American commonwealth."

Following the address, school children appeared in a minuet and other dances of George Washington's time in keeping with the spirit of the occasion. A vocal rendition, "Father of the Land We Love," sung by Mrs. L. M. Wilheit, closed the program.

The next Bicentennial event in Balboa occurred on March 7, 1932, when the Sancta Maria Court of the Catholic Daughters of America in the Canal Zone gave a patriotic entertainment in St. Mary's Hall, the social hall of the Catholic church in that city. American Minister Roy T. Davis was the guest speaker on this occasion.

The celebration which began at 8 o'clock featured fourteen scenes and events taken from American Colonial history. The Fort Clayton Band, under the direction of Warrant Officer Fisher, contributed patriotic selections and Mrs. Jack Phillips rendered colonial melodies and folk songs.

The program, as published in THE STAR AND HERALD, was as follows:

Prologue—Selections by the Band.
 Presentation of the Flag.
 Singing of "America"—by the Audience.
 Introductory Address—The Honorable Roy T. Davis.
 "Washington, the Child"—Scene, a Cotton-field.
 Songs—"Dixie" and "Carry Me Back to Ole Virginny."
 Medley of Southern Airs—by the Band.
 "Washington, the Surveyor"—Scene, a woodland.
 Reading—Penelope Penwick.
 "Washington, the Statesman"—Scene, Signing of the Declaration of Independence.
 "Washington's Oath of Allegiance."
 "Washington, the Soldier at Valley Forge."
 Song—"Tenting Tonight."
 Patriotic Airs—by the Band.
 "Washington, Social Life"—Scene, Fredericksburg Ball, in which a minuet is given.
 "Washington's Farewell Address."

 The program committee, headed by Father A. E. Gay, as Chairman, was composed of Mrs. Charles Dawson, Grand Regent of the Catholic Daughters of America; Mrs. L. O. Keene, Mrs. W. T. McCormack, Miss Marie V. Butler, Miss Marian Daniels and Miss Bertha Mae Gibson.

The Girl Scouts of Balboa commemorated the anniversary of the First President of the United States with a significant and inspiring memorial tree planting.

Participating in the ceremony which took place on March 18 in front of the Administration Building in Balboa, were the Governor of the Canal Zone, Col. Harry Burgess, American Minister Davis, the British and French Ministers to Panama, the Superintendent of Schools of the Canal Zone, Mr. Ben M. Williams, and many other notables. The tree, a beautiful royal palm, was given by the American Legion Auxiliary Unit No. 1 to Girl Scout Troop No. 1, for which the Auxiliary is sponsor. It had been marked with a cast bronze tree marker bearing the following inscription: "G. S. Troop 1, Balboa, C. Z., Anna L. Kee, Captain."

Mr. Davis and Superintendent Williams both spoke at the exercises. The American Minister took for his subject the great part trees played in the life of George Washington. He pointed out that Washington was born almost under the protecting shade of a large tree, that he had surveyed in the wilderness through trees, had slept under trees in his campaigns, and that he had finally returned to Mount Vernon where his greatest joy was in the planting and tending of trees and shrubbery on his estate.

Mr. Williams brought out in his speech that the Girl Scouts, in learning about and loving trees, were very much like George Washington. And Washington was very much like present day Americans, Mr. Williams said. He was not the marble-like figure that historians used to paint, but a very human, warm-hearted man.

"If George Washington were alive now," said Mr. Williams, "I am sure he would pay a visit to the Panama Canal and be interested in every phase of our life here. The new conception of Washington gives Americans more faith in their efforts to emulate his virtues."

As the tree was planted, Governor Burgess placed the first spadeful of earth. He then passed the spade to Minister Davis who, after placing the second spadeful, passed it to the other guests who in turn each placed earth about the tree, ending with the Girl Scouts themselves.

The notable group of executives of the Isthmus and representatives of foreign countries included: Governor Harry Burgess, Army and Navy officers representing Major General Preston Brown and Admiral Noble E. Irwin, the French Minister to Panama, and representatives of the American Legion Auxiliary, Commissioner L. O. Burgess of the Boy Scouts, American Legion representatives, and Mr. D. E. Dickson, representing the Forty and Eight of the Legion.

The program, which was begun by a selection by the Boys Band, consisted of the "Salute to the Flag," led by the Girl Scouts; "Star Spangled Banner," by the Legion Auxiliary quartet; Invocation by the Rev. Alfred Carpenter; the address by American Minister Davis; the address by Mr. Ben M. Williams; a recitation by Virginia Lutz entitled "Trees"; and the tree planting ceremony in which Marie Fidelis Gallivan and Marie Murwin took the parts of the "first spokesman" and the "second spokesman," whose recitations were intermingled with the singing of parts of the "Tree Song" by the entire troop of Girl Scouts.

COMMUNITY EXERCISES AT ANCON

In Ancon, observance of Washington's Birthday took the form of a community gathering at the Ancon Clubhouse. Assistant District Attorney Jack Hayes and Mr. H. O. Williams, American Consul at Panama City, were the principal speakers.

The celebration opened with a salute to the Flag, conducted by the Boy Scouts. Mrs. Garabedian, of Corozal, accompanied by Mrs. Robinson on the violin, rendered several songs from the days of Washington, and local school children, dressed in Colonial costumes, danced the minuet and other old-time dances. The whole occasion was made reminiscent of Washington's time and Consul Williams' speech helped to carry the large audience back to those eventful days of the founding of the United States.

The address of Mr. Williams follows:

Two hundred years ago today on a plantation in the Potomac Valley in northern Virginia there was born a baby in the home of Mr. Augustine Washington, a well-to-do planter. This baby was the first son born to the second Mrs. Washington, whose name before her marriage was Mary Ball. She is reputed to have been a woman of remarkable intelligence and beauty. The child was named George. Now George means "farmer" and it is just possible that Washington's father intended him to follow that ancient and noble calling. And although little is said about it because his other deeds have overshadowed it, George Washington was a very successful farmer, or planter, and according to his own statements he loved life on the plantation and was eager to return to it.

We may imagine that this baby was very much like other babies. He doubtless cried when he was hungry. He was probably anxious to have his own way and had to be corrected by his parents. He probably fell down and tore his clothes, and soiled his hands and face, and behaved as any normal child and boy would behave. Years afterwards, when he had become a famous man, many stories were told about him aiming to prove that he was a human paragon. Most to blame for this was an itinerant preacher named Weems, who wrote a LIFE OF WASHINGTON, full of unsubstantiated anecdotes and cheap moralizing. There may be a basis for the cherry tree story. Give a young boy a bright, new, shiny hatchet and it is quite likely that he will do some damage with it, but it is not probable that either George or his father indulged in the sentimental twaddle attributed to them by Weems. The boy, grown man, was known for his high principles. The child is father of the man. I have an idea that if George Washington the boy used his hatchet in a destructive manner, and if he was questioned about it, he told the truth. And there are, no doubt, many boys and girls here in the Canal Zone who would be just as frank—if their parents approached them in the right manner.

A great deal is sometimes made of the 110 maxims of conduct that Washington wrote out for his guidance. I looked them up the other day. Probably he compiled them from many sources. He did not originate them, for many are simply rules of ordinary good breeding. Many, if not all of us, have passed through a period when it seemed as if life and its duties could be reduced to a set of copy-book rules. (If it only could!) The point to emphasize here is not that Washington composed or compiled these rules. It is, that he was serious minded. Books were scarce and dear. To copy valuable sayings was the best way to possess them.

The United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, appointed in 1924 by Congress to arrange a proper celebration of the 200th anniversary of Washington's birth, has shown great wisdom in its method. Instead of having an Exposition (as was done in 1876) to which only a few could go, the Commission has arranged for a nation-wide celebration in order that every citizen may have some part, and may have his thoughts directed, for a time at least, to Washington's life, and to those sterling qualities of character that made him Pater Patriae, the father of his country. Our President, Mr. Hoover, started this celebration at noon today with an address to the assembled Congress in the city of Washington.

Professor Albert Bushnell Hart, the venerable historian of the Commission, in a recent magazine article, says: "In the eyes of the Commission a genuine Washington celebration must represent the Washington who lived and breathed, and had devoted friends and bitter enemies, and took an active part in the life of the time. The Commission does not foster a worship of the first President; it is satisfied to aid in making Americans of today know and appreciate the manifold Washington, great in many fields, and especially in his confidence in the American people."

Washington, then, in the eyes of the Commission, was not a paragon, a demi-god, perhaps not a genius. His life was not a single flame. Rather may it be compared with a jewel of many facets. As Anthony said of the great Brutus, "His life was gentle, and the elements so mix'd in him that Nature might stand up and say to all the world, 'This was a man!'"

The Commission plans to leave behind it a lasting memorial of the Bicentennial in a definitive edition of the writings of Washington in twenty-five volumes.

What can I say in the few minutes allotted to me of a man concerning whom more than 400 biographies have been written? Who himself left writings that will fill 25 volumes? For whom more than 70 bays, rivers, and mountains have been named, as well as many cities, towns, and hamlets? I have no desire nor intention to review his life, recount his exploits, quote from his writings, nor describe the part he played in the origin and formation of our Republic. I shall limit myself to calling your attention to a few of the outstanding qualities of our First Citizen, qualities which, if emulated by those who followed him, would do much to insure the perpetuity of the Republic he loved, and for whose future he was so much concerned. In his first inaugural address he expresses the hope that the foundation of our national policy may be laid in the "pure and immutable principles of private morality."

Washington was a rich man who placed public duty above private gain. At the age of eleven he inherited the home plantation at the death of his father. At the age of twenty he inherited the magnificent estate of Mount Vernon from his half-brother Lawrence, who died at that time. At the age of twenty-seven he married the wealthy Mrs. Custis, who had extensive properties. All these estates must have brought him in a large income, and we know that he entertained liberally, if not lavishly. His public life begins about the time of his marriage, as a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses. As early as 1774 he appears as a staunch supporter of self-government for the Colonies. In 1775 he accepted the position of commander-in-chief of the colonial forces, with the understanding that he was to receive no pay, only his expenses. His speech of acceptance is marked by modesty; the act itself by devotion to duty and unselfishness.

His physical courage was shown on many occasions, as for example at the time of Braddock's defeat, when he had two horses shot under him. But his moral courage was greater. In 1793, when France was in the throes of revolution, Washington, true to the principle that the United States should engage in no entangling alliance with the European Powers, issued his Proclamation of Neutrality. To many this seemed a mean return for benefits rendered. Washington was steadfast in his position, and "Citizen Genet," who tried to have the United States declare war against Great Britain, and who disdained the First President, found to his sorrow that he had to deal with a firm executive.

Washington was hopeful in defeat. This is shown by the tenacity with which he struggled from 1776 to 1783 against British regulars; against divided sentiment at home; against a dilatory Congress; against treachery; even at times against the unkind powers of Nature herself.

As for his integrity of purpose, let me quote from the words of the first Secretary of State, Thomas Jefferson: "His integrity was most pure; his justice the most inflexible I have ever known; no matter of interest or consanguinity, of friendship or hatred being able to bias his decision."

Washington displayed great ability in evaluating other men—a most necessary quality in an executive. This is shown by the selection of his first cabinet: Jefferson and Hamilton (who though opposed in politics were united in their loyalty to Washington), Randolph and Knox.

Although as a rule Washington displayed great self-control, he could indulge in righteous anger, as witness the story of his reprimand to Lee at Monmouth. There is a general belief that Washington at this time accompanied his angry reprimand with a resounding oath, but in the account of the trial which followed (Lee was court-martialed) Lee, when asked what Washington said, answered that it was more the manner in which he said it! His wrath must have been like the wrath of the Olympians.

Another quality of Washington was piety. Not a sickly sentimentality, satisfied with religious platitudes and outward forms of worship, but a deep and abiding faith in Providence, in that Power, not ourselves, that makes for Righteousness. In his first inaugural he says that it would be "peculiarly improper to omit in his first official act a fervent supplication" to the Almighty, and he expresses his confidence in a Providence that has conducted the States thus far in their successful struggle for independence and in their acceptance of the new Constitution.

But the most outstanding quality was Washington's patriotism, his love for the infant country and his concern for its future. He might have started a monarchy on the American continent. But, like Caesar, he refused the kingly crown, nor has there been any cynical Casca to remark, "But for all that, to my thinking, he would fain have had it." When the end of his second administration was near and there was a desire to continue him in office, he delivered his famous farewell address, in September, 1796, declining to serve again. It is full of salutary advice from the Father to his Country.

On rereading the Address recently (and I heartily advise every one of you who has not done so to read it) I was struck with his concern that the "more perfect Union" of the Preamble should endure. Like Lincoln, his cry was, "The Union must be preserved." Five pages of the address are given up to this subject. He knew at what price independence had been purchased. He knew with what travail the new Union had been born. He realized the dangers of dissension and schism. He calls the Union the Palladium of political safety and prosperity.

It is said that on that memorable night in April, 1865, when another great President lay stricken by an assassin, that as Lincoln breathed his last Secretary Seward said, "Now he belongs to the ages."

The truly great do belong to the ages—and to humanity. Their fame is not circumscribed by frontiers, nor limited by time. Washington belongs to the glorious company of the world's liberators. His was a greater reward than has fallen to the lot of many. He was appreciated in life and mourned in death. For him there was no cup of hemlock, no cross, no pyre. No thundering Bull of Excommunication, no social ostracism. He had to meet indeed, taunts and jibes; vituperation and misrepresentation. But he rose majestically above it all, unsullied, like some towering peak whose head is refulgent with the sun, though clouds envelop it below.

TREES PLANTED AT GATUM

One of the most beautiful and impressive of the many ceremonies in honor of the bicentennial of George Washington's birth in the Canal Zone was that performed by the children of Gatun, who planted four young trees in the name of the Father of their Country and christened the grassy slope in which they were imbedded "George Washington Hill." The ceremony took place on the opening day of the Bicentennial Celebration and was sponsored by the American Legion and directed by Mrs. J. C. Deadours of the American Legion Auxiliary.

The site chosen for the planting of the trees—young banyan trees—was the green slope leading from the bridge to the canal, from which there is a beautiful view of the Panama Canal as it travels toward the Atlantic Ocean.

The ceremony began at 8:30 in the morning, when the chimes of the Union Church started a 200 stroke salute in honor of this two hundredth anniversary.

As the bell pealed out the patriotic salute, the children began forming in orderly ranks, the kindergarteners martialed by Mrs. G. B. Baxter, and followed by the older children, the adults bringing up the rear.

The Legion banner was carried at the head of the procession by Robert W. Rupp, Commander of Nathaniel J. Owen Post, No. 3, American Legion, and George Poole, Jr., followed with the banner of the American Boy Scouts. Two youthful drummers kept the marching rhythm with their regular "rat-tat-tat."

The trees were transported to the site of planting in four little wagons, each pulled by two children and attended by two pages. Arriving at the site chosen for planting the trees, a little girl dressed as "Miss America" performed the rites of christening the ground "George Washington Hill," using a bottle of grape juice.

A moment of silence, consecrated to the memory of the "Father of His Country" was then observed, the large concourse of people standing with heads reverently bowed in silent tribute of respect. The silence was broken by the singing of the National Anthem.

Dr. James A. Gridder then delivered a stirring address on George Washington after which another moment of silent tribute was devoted to the memory of the brave men who made the supreme sacrifice of their lives for the Flag. This was followed by the singing of America.

The ceremony of planting the trees closed the proceedings. The young banyans were arranged in their new positions by the gardener, and then each child and adult present placed a spadeful of earth about the trees.

The tree planting ceremony of the morning was followed in the evening with a patriotic program in the Picture Hall under the joint auspices of the various patriotic, fraternal and religious organizations.

Mr. A. E. Cotton, secretary of the Gatun Clubhouse, prepared the evening program, which opened with the sounding of "Reveille" and the singing of "America." A playlet, "Making the Flag" was then given, followed by patriotic recitations and songs. Chaplain C. F. Groeser made a brief address on the significance of the day, and the formal program of the evening closed with a salute to the Flag and the singing of the "Star Spangled Banner" by the entire assembly.

The hall was then cleared for dancing, and a feature of this part of the program were the old-time dances that had been arranged to recall the early festivities of the young American nation. "George Washington refreshments," further added to the spirit of the occasion.

The daily press of the Canal Zone joined heartily in the Bicentennial. Throughout the entire celebration period, and especially on Washington's Birthday, Independence Day and at the close of the celebration on Thanksgiving Day, there were articles, pictures and editorials honoring the First President of the United States. One of these, appearing in THE PANAMA AMERICAN of February 22, 1932, is quoted below:

GEORGE WASHINGTON

On this day, the Bicentennial celebration of the birthday anniversary of George Washington, we can gain much by recalling the teachings of the founder of our country. Well to recall, too, that times were more difficult and trying then than they are now.

His guidance made our country the greatest nation in the world, and by going back to his ideals we can go forward as a people to still greater heights. His hard work, courage and love for his country made him the most outstanding personage of his era, but in the years since his death he has grown in stature not only in the pages of history but in the hearts of every patriotic American.

The practice of canonization is inherent in the human mind. Men of the past grew into giants, history takes the form of the good old days, and all deeds become heroic. This is inspiring, but is not human experience and not true, and Washington does not need to be glorified.

For our burdens which he bore, for our sorrows which he comforted, for that character of surpassing strength and beauty, for the courage he showed, for the devotion to duty, for the patience, the hope, the steadfastness, for the new glory that his life revealed, for the immortal example of all that which we call Washington, men may well continue to study his life and character, and to give thanks for him to the Source of all power.

CHINA

HE Bicentennial in China was featured by the largest and most successful "get together" meetings of Americans that members of the various American colonies scattered throughout that vast land can ever remember.

From Hongkong and Canton in the south, to Harbin in the north, wherever a group of Americans could assemble, they held celebrations in honor of their First President during the two hundredth anniversary of his birth. Tree plantings, dances and banquets, exercises in American mission schools, commemorative church programs, all gave expression to the love and esteem in which George Washington is held by these Americans "in China far away."

One of the largest American colonies in China is that in Shanghai, but observance of the Bicentennial there had to be postponed until May, due to local unsettled conditions. The International Settlement was decorated with American flags on February 22, but owing to serious disturbances, for the first time in many years George Washington's birthday was unobserved by his countrymen in Shanghai. That the day was not forgotten, however, is shown by a communication of April 22, 1932, to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission from Consul General Edwin S. Cunningham.

"The American community in Shanghai," wrote the Consul General, "would like the Bicentennial Commission to know that the hearts of Americans in Shanghai on Washington's birthday were filled with an admiration for the Father of Our Country that neither guns nor riots could efface."

The disturbances which prevented the Washington birthday celebration were ended in time to allow for other Bicentennial programs, the first of which took place on May 28 when the American School of Shanghai produced a pageant entitled "America, Garden of the World." The presentation was devoted to the Bicentennial theme, and according to the Consul General was "widely advertised, well attended, and enthusiastically received."

MEMORIAL DAY IN SHANGHAI

Memorial Day exercises at which Consul General Cunningham was the speaker were held by the Americans in Shanghai on May 30. After paying eloquent tribute to America's military and naval heroes who had given their lives for their country, Mr. Cunningham said:

I have been impressed by the fact that an individual's life used as a prototype of the principles of patriotism is more effective than dealing in generalities. Memorial Day is peculiarly a military day. The greatest soldier of his time was George Washington, the Bicentennial anniversary of whose birth occurs this year. Therefore I have selected as a prototype of the principles which we are emphasizing today, George Washington the soldier.

The speaker went on to describe Washington's early life, and told of his attachment to his elder half-brother Lawrence whose military exploits strongly impressed young George. Lawrence and his associates influenced the boy to a marked degree, and it was at Mount Vernon, then owned by Lawrence, that he received his first military lessons. Mr. Cunningham then told of Washington's trip to the Ohio as the messenger of Governor Dinwiddie of Virginia, to warn the French from the territory which England considered her own. His subsequent military activities as head of the Virginia militia and as aide de camp to General Braddock were also described. Washington was 43 years old when he took command of the American army at the beginning of the Revolutionary War, the Consul General said. Mr. Cunningham continued:

It was not until eight years later, on Christmas Eve, 1783, that it was possible for him to resign his commission to Congress, and to retire to private life at Mount Vernon where he had not spent a Christmas for more than seven years. His activities and leadership are but the history of the military operations which took place and eventually brought about the treaty of peace which acknowledged the independence of the great American nation.

We today pay our affectionate and patriotic respects to the memory of our departed heroes as evidence of our appreciation of their lives, their services, and their devotion to the United States. Our responsibility in accepting this beautiful heritage does not end with this day. We owe vastly more to those who won the peace of union and liberty. . . . Let us accept that responsibility as did Washington, with the full realization that in order that our great and glorious country may endure, civic consciousness must be developed assiduously, and let us do our utmost to see that our nation maintains that high standard which those who have gone before have given us as a heritage, and let us perform those civic duties in an efficient and patriotic manner. Then, and not until then, shall we have rendered due and proper appreciation to the memory of our departed heroes.

Plans were made for a celebration in Shanghai on Thanksgiving Day, November 24, but according to Consul General Cunningham "a combination of incidents, some of which were tragic," made it impossible to carry out the intended program. President Hoover's proclamation, embodying the original Presidential Thanksgiving Day Proclamation, issued by George Washington in 1789, was read in the Thanksgiving Day services, and a brief, appropriate reference to the day as marking the official close of the Bicentennial Celebration was made by the Reverend E. W. Luccock.

The Bicentennial celebration was anticipated in Shanghai when, looking forward to a day when walnut trees, descended from trees planted by George Washington, would spread their branches over Chinese soil, Consul General Cunningham and an official delegation met at Jessfield Park on June 16, 1931, and with appropriate ceremonies planted walnut seeds from Mount Vernon. Mrs. Milton D. Purdy, wife of the chairman of the Bicentennial Committee in Shanghai, and Mrs. Cunningham wielded the planting instruments. Among those present were: Assistant Inspector G. G. Pleshkoff; Wong Woo Zaung, the head gardener; and Superintendent W. J. Kerr.

MUCH INTEREST IN CANTON

The keen interest in the Bicentennial Celebration which was manifested in Canton, the Chinese seaport which was first opened to American trade during Washington's time, was not confined to the American colony, for among the Chinese residents of the city were many who had studied in American universities or who had been at some previous time engaged in business enterprises in the United States. Among these were numbered many promiment municipal and provincial officials, including the Mayor of Canton, Lin Yun-hai, an alumnus of an American university. The contact with America brought to these people an appreciative understanding of George Washington's great contribution not only to the United States but to all mankind as well. Many of them consider him the inspiration of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, long a leader of the Chinese Nationalists, and they feel that George Washington is their hero as well as America's.

George Washington's birthday, for many years preceding the Bicentennial year, was the occasion in Canton for a reception and patriotic program given by the American Association of South China. This was always a memorable event in which the Chinese participated with considerable interest. To give the occasion in 1932 the importance it merited, the American Association began forming plans early in the year 1931, the initiative being taken by R. D. Wolcott, president of the organization. Dr. M. T. Rankin, who succeeded Mr. Wolcott as head of the society in November, 1931, continued the work of formulating the plans for a successful celebration.

The celebration in Canton began on the afternoon of February 22, 1932, with a reception and tea party at the club house of the Young Women's Christian Association. The program was attended by the provincial and municipal authorities in Canton, members of the consular corps in the city, many Chinese citizens, prominent in various circles of municipal life, and practically the entire American colony.

FOUND INSPIRATION IN WASHINGTON

Dr. Rankin, then president of the American Association of South China, was the featured speaker on the program. His address, which stressed George Washington's international importance, was happily phrased and eloquently delivered. Dr. Rankin spoke especially of the inspiration which China's own great Nationalist leader, Dr. Sun Yat-sen, had drawn from the life of the American President. It was evident from the response of the audience that Dr. Rankin's speech was appropriate and impressive.

Musical numbers and a dramatic sketch, by pupils of the American schools in Canton, added to the program.

In the evening the Americans in Canton were hosts at individual dinner parties to their many foreign friends. This was a feature very much enjoyed by the guests and it added to the good feeling in evidence throughout the day.

A brilliant and an elaborate George Washington Bicentennial Ball, given at the Canton Club under the auspices of the American Association, brought the celebration to a close. The ball was an outstanding social event of the season, and all who attended agreed that it was a fitting climax to the activities of a day dedicated to the memory of the great American leader who himself knew how to enjoy the pleasures of the ballroom.

The next program given in Canton as a Bicentennial feature, took place on Memorial Day, May 30, at the United States Consulate, when Commemorative services were held by members of the American colony and their friends. J. W. Ballantine, United States Consul General, and Captain C. W. Early, United States Navy, were the speakers of the day. Both men paid high tribute to the memory of George Washington and the soldiers of the Continental Army under his command who fought and died for the freedom of their country.

Continuing the plan to honor George Washington's memory on all days of national significance, July 4, the 156th anniversary of America's Declaration of Independence, was observed in programs dedicated to the First President. A reception at the home of Consul General Ballantine opened the day's activities, and as the guests drank a toast to George Washington, the guns of the U. S. S. Mindanao boomed out the international salute of 21 guns. The American colony was "at home" to all friends at the Canton Club where a buffet luncheon was served and dancing provided the entertainment. A tea dance was held at the Victoria Hotel for the service men attached to the Mindanao, and the day's festivities ended with a "community dinner" at the home of R. D. Wolcott.

PRESIDENT'S PROCLAMATION READ

Thanksgiving Day witnessed the closing ceremonies of the Bicentennial Celebration in Canton. The program for that day began in the morning and continued until late evening. There was a Thanksgiving service followed by a meeting of the American Association of South China, children's games, a basket lunch and other social activities.

Dr. M. T. Rankin, president of the American Association of South China, presided at the Thanksgiving service which was opened by the singing of the ode "America the Beautiful" by the entire gathering. Consul General J. W. Ballantine then read President Hoover's Thanksgiving Proclamation embodying the original Presidential Thanksgiving Proclamation issued by George Washington in 1789. Choruses were then sung by the pupils of the Paak Hok Tung and the Ling Nan schools for the American children.

Copies of the Athenaeum portrait of George Washington, supplied by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, were presented to the schools in Canton for American children by Captain C. W. Early of the United States Navy. In his presentation address Captain Early spoke interestingly on the life of George Washington. Following the presentation of the portraits the Thanksgiving Day address was made by Dr. William L. Burdick, Vice Chancellor of the University of Kansas. Dr. Burdick's discourse was devoted to the commemoration of George Washington's birth. The service was closed by the community singing of "America."

At the meeting of the American Association of South China the president, Dr. M. T. Rankin, presented the report of the year's activities which included the following reference to the Bicentennial Celebration:

During this year Americans have been observing the celebration of the 200th anniversary of the birth of George Washington. Thus it was quite fitting that the first public gathering held by the Association in this year should be the celebration of Washington's birthday. Your Executive Committee made efforts to observe this occasion with an extraordinary program. We first attempted to secure a motion picture reel of the history of Washington which was especially prepared for the celebration of this anniversary, but because of the cost of the reel we were unable to carry out this plan. In the end we had to present a more simple program than we wished to do, but the large number of people who attended that gathering were quite generous in their expressions of appreciation of the Celebration.

BICENTENNIAL EVENTS IN AMOY

An American destroyer, flag-bedecked, rode gracefully at anchor not more than a hundred yards from the United States Consulate in Amoy as all the Americans in the vicinity gathered to honor the memory of George Washington on the two hundredth anniversary of his birth. All other craft in the Chinese port were also decorated with flags and banners in recognition of the occasion, and the harbor presented a most festive appearance.

Throughout the city of Amoy and nearby Kulangsui, all official buildings and many others as well, were adorned with flags in token of esteem for America's first President and her outstanding citizen of all time.

At the Consulate a reception was held by United States Consul and Mrs. Lynn W. Franklin which was attended by all the members of the American colony living in Amoy and its environs and their Chinese friends. The fact that Mrs. Franklin is a descendant of George Washington's paternal aunt, Mildred W. Gregory, added a note of interest to the reception.

The reception afforded an excellent opportunity, which was not neglected, according to Mr. Franklin, for the Chinese guests to express their good will and friendliness for the United States and her citizens. Every comment, said the consul, indicated that the reception, though small, was an appropriate tribute to the memory of George Washington.

Again on Memorial Day, 1932, the Americans residing in and near Amoy assembled at the Consulate to participate in further Bicentennial ceremonies in which two young cedar trees were planted in memory of George Washington. The trees, which were planted in the grounds of the Consulate, were obtained by Consul Franklin from the Washington homestead on the Rappahannock River opposite Fredericksburg, Va. They were of the same lot as the seedling planted in the White House grounds by President and Mrs. Hoover.

Mr. Franklin made a brief address noting especially the significance of the occasion and the appropriateness of planting trees in Washington's memory. Washington was a lover of trees all his life, the consul said, and spent much of his time at Mount Vernon beautifying the place by planting and caring for trees of all kinds, many of which he received as gifts from admirers. The seedlings planted in Amoy, Mr. Franklin pointed out, would ever be of especial interest because of their having come from Washington's boyhood home. Each guest assisted in the ceremony by placing a spadeful of earth about the roots of the young cedars. Brass plates, suitably inscribed to identify the trees in the future, were provided.

At the conclusion of the tree-planting ceremony, tea was served in the Consulate. In addition to members of the American colony in Amoy, there were also present at the program marines and sailors from the U. S. S. Tulsa.

The Bicentennial Celebration was brought to a close in the City of Amoy on Thanksgiving Day. The American Consul read President Hoover's Thanksgiving Proclamation which included George Washington's first Thanksgiving Proclamation. The Thanksgiving ceremonies were held at the Union Church under the auspices of the American Association of Amoy.

OTHER CHINESE CITIES CELEBRATE

The American residents of the Chefoo Consular district were guests of United States Consul Leroy Webber at a reception held in commemoration of George Washington's Bicentennial anniversary on February 22, 1932. Prominent Chinese and other friends of America were also in attendance at the reception, which, Mr. Webber reported to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, "may be rightly interpreted as a fine tribute to the memory of George Washington." It also revealed, the Consul further pointed out, the excellent relations prevailing between the Chinese and the American Consulate staff and American members of the foreign community.

Mr. Webber was assisted at the reception by Mrs.

J. W. Moore, of the Southern Baptist Mission, Mrs. F. E. Dilley, of the American Presbyterian Mission, and Mrs. Mervin Rothschild, who acted as hostesses.

An interesting and entertaining celebration in honor of George Washington was held in Foochow under the direction of United States Vice Consul Gordon L. Burke on February 22, 1932, when the Americans of that district presented a pageant depicting events in their country's history as a feature of the four-hour program. Despite the limited numbers of the American colony in the Foochow consular district, the celebration was successful in every detail. A large and interested audience, including Chinese and many other friends of America, attended this tribute to the memory of George Washington.

The program opened with community singing and was followed by a flag drill by the pupils of the American school at Foochow. A piano solo was contributed by Eugenia M. Savage and a vocal quartet sang the "Soldiers' Chorus." Following a minuet, danced by members of the colony, Bishop John Hind delivered an address on "Washington and Our Present Ideals." In his discourse the speaker dwelt upon the patriotism of George Washington and how his example and teachings might be applied to the solution of today's problems.

Another piano solo was played by Miss Savage, and the quartet sang a medley of national airs. The Rev. Freeman C. Havighurst then spoke on the subject, "What We Owe to Washington." In this address Rev. Mr. Havighurst reviewed the career of George Washington, emphasizing the fullness of his service to America and mankind in general. Washington was no less great, said the speaker, in his example of integrity than in his actual service. Community singing marked the end of this part of the program which was followed by the presentation of the pageant.

Mr. Burke advised the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission that the guests at the program gave every manifestation of friendliness and that the celebration was looked upon by the residents of Foochow as one of the most significant entertainments ever presented there by a foreign colony.

COLORFUL CELEBRATION IN HANKOW

With several hundred Americans and their foreign friends participating, one of the most colorful celebrations ever held by the American colony in Hankow took place on February 19, 1932, in commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of George Washington's birth. The ballroom of the Race Club, the scene of this function, was beautifully decorated for the occasion, one of the features being a huge coin, outlined with electric lights, which bore the image of George Washington. Red, white and blue were the colors featured throughout the hall, and American flags were hung or draped in prominent places.

Each guest was greeted upon arrival by Admiral and Mrs. Yancey Williams and United States Consul General Walter Adams. Dancing, featured by such typically American dances as the Virginia reel, provided the main source of entertainment for the evening. A buffet supper was served with corn meal muffins, candied sweet potatoes, and many other American dishes prominent on the menu.

A short speech was made by Admiral Williams, who also read President Hoover's proclamation to the American people inviting them to participate in the Bicentennial celebration. The speaker expressed his belief that he voiced the sentiments of his countrymen in Hankow when he said they were all happy to participate in the world-wide Bicentennial celebration honoring the memory of George Washington. This great man's service to his country and his ideals of freedom for all mankind, said Admiral Williams, marked him as a world character that would never die. The foreign friends of America who were in attendance at the celebration were particularly welcomed, and their presence was accepted as a token of the esteem in which they also held the memory of George Washington.

The celebration was given considerable space by the HANKOW HERALD in a detailed account of the ball, and Consul General Adams advised the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission that it was a successful and worthy program.

Included in the celebration in Hankow was the program presented by the Hua Chung College, a school maintained in the Hankow diocese by the Methodist Episcopal Church. The event was so aptly described in a news letter from the college that the item is herewith quoted in full:

According to its policy of utilizing suitable occasions for giving its students an international outlook, Hua Chung College made a gala event here of the two-hundredth anniversary of George Washington's birthday.

The festivities commenced with a faculty-student dinner at Poyu Hall, during which school and college songs were sung and at the end of which the American National Anthem was bravely attempted by the American contingent (which has more bravery than musical ability). After-dinner coffee was served at Yen Hostel by the fairer members of the student body. Then the guests adjourned to the auditorium at Ingle Hall for an oratorical contest, the main event of the evening. There were six speakers, each taking for his subject some aspect of the life and character of George Washington. The Judges, Mrs. Paul Kwei, Bishop Gilman and Professor Pien, awarded the laurels of victory to John Chang, who spoke on "Washington's Religious Attitude." Second prize went to Liang Peh-hsien, whose subject was "Washington's Early Years." The award of the judges brought to an end what was voted a very successful celebration of the Washington Bicentennial.

THANKSGIVING DAY IN HARBIN

In Harbin the small American colony found it impracticable to hold any Bicentennial ceremonies until Thanksgiving Day when a celebration took place at the residence of United States Consul General G. C. Hanson. The program on that occasion was made to serve two purposes. It was a commemoration of George Washington's two hundredth anniversary and was also utilized as the occasion for raising money for the winter relief of Harbin's destitute.

According to a report of the exercises which appeared in the HARBIN DAILY NEWS of November 26, 1932, the program attracted a larger attendance than any previous Thanksgiving Day celebration. Howard A. Haag, senior secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association at Harbin, presided, and Consul General George C. Hanson read the Thanksgiving Day proclamation of President Hoover which contained the original Thanksgiving Day proclamation issued by George Washington in 1789. Community singing and a piano solo by Mrs. Margaret B. Lindstedt provided the musical diversions on the program.

A religious service was also held during which Rev. Charles A. Leonard officiated and preached a Thanksgiving Day sermon in which appropriate references were made to the Bicentennial celebration of George Washington's birth. The newspapers reported that the sermon was "unusually interesting and was followed with keen appreciation." In the evening a fancy dress ball was given at the Consulate by Mr. Hanson. The hall was fittingly decorated with American flags, and a portrait of George Washington occupied a conspicuous place. There were numerous guests in attendance, including the Consular corps of Harbin and many representatives of official circles of the city. The newspapers noted that "it was generally agreed that the costumes as a whole and individually were the best that had been seen in Harbin in some time."

Among these appeared the costumes of George Washington's time, American cowboy outfits, sailor suits, and Spanish dress.

The ball was, according to the DAILY NEWS, "one of the outstanding events of Harbin's social season."

HONGKONG HARBOR SCENE OF ANIMATION

Americans in Hongkong were not alone in their observance of George Washington's 200th birth anniversary for they were joined in a gala celebration by many Chinese, British, and other friends on February 22, 1932. The great occasion had been heralded in the newspapers for many days in advance, and the morning of Washington's birthday found the city ready for the celebration with flags waving from all American official buildings and business houses.

The harbor at Hongkong presented as brilliant a sight as did the city itself, for warships and other vessels from many lands ran up flags and pennants in honor of the occasion. At high noon the Oriental calm was shattered as the booming guns of the British battleship, Tamar, roared their salute in memory of America's first President, who was himself once a subject of England's king.

During the afternoon the American consulate and American business houses were closed in tribute to Washington's memory. The United States Consul General, John R. Putnam, was the recipient of several calls paid by consular officials and other prominent people from different countries.

A dinner dance, one of the most brilliant gatherings of foreigners ever witnessed in Hongkong, ended the day's activities. Among the many guests present at this function were officials and eminent men and women of many nations who thus evinced their regard for the memory of George Washington and their friendship for the great country which he created.

FOREIGNERS JOIN AMERICANS AT MUKDEN

A buffet supper and dance, under the auspices of the American Association was given in Mukden on February 22, 1932, to mark the two hundredth anniversary of George Washington's birth. Practically the entire foreign colony and the consular corps in Mukden joined the Americans in the observance of this significant occasion.

Brief remarks were made to the gathering by United States Consul General M. S. Myers who welcomed the guests on behalf of the American Association and spoke of the extent of the Bicentennial Celebration. Referring to the bitter winter of 1777 and 1778, at Valley Forge, Mr. Myers stated his belief that it was perhaps Washington's severest trial and one which brought out courage, resourcefulness, and persistence in the face of desperate conditions.

It is these self-same qualities which are needed to meet successfully the economic crisis which prevails throughout the world today, said the Consul General, and added that George Washington still remains "First in war, First in peace, and First in the hearts of his countrymen."

BRILLIANT EVENT AT PEIPING

The American colony in Peiping observed the two hundredth anniversary of George Washington's birth in a dinner and dance at the Grand Hotel de Pekin on February 22, 1932—a function which proved to be one of the brilliant events of the season among the foreign residents of China's Capital City. The Americans present, numbering about three hundred, were joined by a great many friends, officials, and other prominent men and women of various nationalities.

The banquet was presided over by Leon H. Ellis, president of the American Association of Peiping. As toastmaster for the occasion, Mr. Ellis welcomed the guests and explained the purpose of the gathering in honor of America's first President.

Brigadier General James E. Breckenridge, commander of the Marine guard at the American Legation, was then introduced as the speaker of the evening. The general proved to be an interesting and entertaining speaker. General Breckenridge pointed out that the gathering in Peiping was only one of thousands of others throughout the United States and the rest of the world, in which Americans and their friends were honoring the memory of George Washington. Launching into his address, the speaker then dealt with the outstanding events in Washington's life which finally led up to the creation of the greatest republic in all history and his elevation to the Chief Magistracy in its government.

The many complimentary remarks on the celebration which were made by the guests gave ample evidence that the event would live long in the memory of those present as an outstanding tribute to George Washington.

In connection with the Bicentennial celebration in Peiping, reproductions of the famous Athenaeum portrait of George Washington, by Gilbert Stuart, supplied for the purpose by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, were framed and presented to American educational institutions in the city by Nelson T. Johnson, United States Minister to China. Mr. Johnson also placed additional reproductions in the United States Legation and other government-owned buildings where, he advised the Bicentennial Commission, they were all displayed to good advantage.

OBSERVANCE AT SWATOW

The small American colony at Swatow observed the Two Hundredth anniversary of George Washington's birth at a tea given by United States Consul Leonard N. Green on February 22, 1932. Practically the entire American colony was in attendance, as were the local civil and military officials. Also numbered among the guests were the officers of the American destroyer, U. S. S. Pillsbury and the officers of the British destroyer, H. M. S. Verity. The guests of honor included General Chang Sui-kuei, Commander of the Chinese troops at Swatow, and the mayor of the city.

Consul Green reported that an invitation to the tea was extended to General Li Yeung Ching, Pacification Commissioner, to which he received the following reply:

"I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your invitation to attend the celebration of George Washington's birthday.

"In reply I deeply regret to state that owing to the pressure of my official business I cannot come to Swatow and attend the celebration as desired. However, instead of my personal presence, I have to convey herewith this wish:

"That the spirit of President Washington may forever live and the relations between our countries become more and more close as time goes on."

The Chinese newspapers of Swatow noted the event, and also stated that all the gunboats in the harbor were decorated with flags in honor of the occasion.

TSINAN RESIDENTS CELEBRATE

More than a hundred persons, including, in addition to the American colony at Tsinan, a number of English speaking students affiliated with the Shantung Christian University, and friends of America of many different nationalities, participated in an entertainment and dance held at the Tsinan Club under the auspices of the American community, to celebrate the Two Hundredth anniversary of George Washington's birth. This was considered an excellent representation by United States Consul C. D. Meinhardt, who reported to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission that the celebration was a complete success, thoroughly enjoyed by all who attended.

ELABORATE CEREMONIES IN TIENTSIN

Despite the disturbed condition of affairs in China during the early part of 1932, the Americans and their friends in Tientsin held a celebration on Washington's birthday which was considered one of the most successful functions ever given by the American colony of that city. Consisting of a dinner and ball the celebration was held under the auspices of the American Consulate General, the American Association of Tientsin, the American Chamber of Commerce, the American Legion, and officers of the Army and Navy units stationed in the city.

The Country Club, rendezvous for foreigners and their friends in Tientsin, was the scene of the celebration. The club dining room being too small to accommodate all the guests, supper was served in the Badminton Courts. The ballroom at the latter place, however, proved spacious enough for the crowd of dancers who flocked to it after dinner had been served. In addition to the public dinner, many private dinner parties, at which the Americans entertained their friends of all nationalities, preceded the ball.

According to an account of the celebration, appearing in the NORTH CHINA STAR, the ballroom was appropriately and interestingly decorated, the main feature being a series of paintings depicting important incidents in the life of George Washington from boyhood to his inauguration as first President of the United States. Among these were such typical scenes as "Washington the Surveyor," "Washington with Braddock," "Crossing the Delaware," "Washington Taking Command of the Continental Army," "Valley Forge," and others. The display, arranged under the direction of Captain Paul H. Rice, United States Navy, Captain G. J. Braun, United States Army, Lieutenant E. J. Tiernan, United States Navy, and George Atcheson, Jr., of the United States Consulate General, attracted much attention and favorable comment from the guests.

The feature of the evening's program was a minuet danced by Mr. and Mrs. Niel Gorman; Lieutenant and Mrs. H. Ford; Lieutenant and Mrs. R. H. Brown; Captain and Mrs. G. J. Braun; Miss Eileen Feeney, Mrs. H. R. W. Herwig, Mr. Hugh Black, Mr. E. R. Eichholzer, Lieutenant E. Foy, and Mrs. C. H. Royce. All the participants were dressed in the costume of the American Colonial period. Music for the dance was furnished by the Country Club orchestra and the band of the Fifteenth United States Infantry.

The committee in charge of the ball consisted of the following officers:

Honorary Chairman—Mr. F. P. Lockhart, American Consul General; Chairman—Mr. Orin de Motte Walker, President of the American Association; Treasurer—Mr. F. F. Spielman, Treasurer of the American Association; and Secretary—Mr. John D. Haynes, Secretary of the American Association. The members of the committee were: Mr. H. A. Raider, President of the American Chamber of Commerce; Dr. John Colbert, Commander of the American Legion; Colonel James D. Taylor, Commanding United States Army Troops in China; Captain Paul H. Rice, Commanding U. S. S. Tulsa; Mr. N. A. Draper, Secretary of the American Chamber of Commerce; Lieutenant Colonel W. S. Drysdale, United States Army; Messrs. A. S. Reynolds and C. N. Joyner, members of the Executive Committee of the American Association; Mr. Max A. Lorenzen, Vice-Commander of the American Legion; and Mr. W. J. Sterquelle, Adjutant of the American Legion.

CHILDREN ENTERTAIN PARENTS

The Bicentennial celebration in Tientsin really began on the morning of February 22 with a program at which the children of the American school entertained their parents. The PEKING AND TIENTSIN TIMES, a British newspaper, gave such an interesting account of the program that it is herewith quoted:

The local Washington Bicentennial Celebrations commenced yesterday morning at the Army "Y" on Race Course Road when the children of the Tientsin American School entertained their parents and the Board at a delightful program of appropriate songs and recitations, commencing with a Flag Salute and the singing of "America" by the assembly. The next item on the program was a recitation by the first grade followed by a song by the second.

A particularly delightful number was the minuet danced by Miss Bonnie Eastham and Miss Connie Brooks. Both children were dressed in costumes of the period being celebrated, Bonnie being the little gentleman with a white curled wig, blue knee breeches and a pink satin coat with dainty lace frills at the wrists and as a neckerchief. Connie Brooks wore a charming little Martha Washington dress with ecru lace underskirt and panniers of pale pink satin. A pink ribbon bound around her curly hair and tied with a demure little bow in front completed her charming appearance while the stately figures of the minuet were very gracefully performed.

The third and fourth grades sang two songs and then came the feature of the program, an original drama written by Luby Bubeshko which was acted by the children in costumes made by themselves. All the children had written plays but the class decision was that Luby's was the one they wished to perform, though they also made suggestions elaborating it and directed the action and the costumes. The story was, briefly, of a brother and sister, Jim and Anne. Jim found his historical facts hard to assimilate and his sister's attempts to assist him were not always well received. In the first scene he threw a book at her and then when she left the room, he tried very hard to remember what he had been reading. Closing his history he tried to recall the names and deeds of the Revolutionary period and in doing so he fell asleep. The second act was a dream. Betsy Ross came to him followed by Nathan Hale, Patrick Henry, George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Paul Revere, and three symbolical figures representing the "Spirit of '76." In the last scene Jim awakened and his sister re-entering asked him certain historical facts. His answers, which caused a laugh, showed that he was, if possible, even more muddled than ever.

The parts were taken by children of the seventh and eighth grades under the direction of the other members of the class. Luby Bubeshko was George Washington and looked very well in the costume of the period. The modern children's rôles were played by Nathalie Rice and George Harr. George Hill took the part of Patrick Henry and Jack Chow came in almost too realistically garbed as Nathan Hale with the hangman's rope still round his neck. Clara Liu was Thomas Jefferson and Betsy Ross was represented by Jean Oliver who looked the part, very well indeed. The symbolical figures who marched in with fife and drum and bearing signs of battle were Ruth Evans, Concepcion Pasquale, and Jean Yang. The quaintest figure of all was John Ward as Paul Revere who implied the famous ride by prancing in on a hobby horse, a bit of property designed and executed by the children themselves. Really the production was a very creditable effort and the advantages of the self-expression and creative effort implied is a feature of the new system of education now in practice at the school.

The Hykes Memorial Lodge—Masonic—of Tientsin conducted a commemorative program in honor of George Washington on February 17, 1932. About 200 Masons, representing English, Scottish, Canadian, and American lodges, participated in the exercises. The speakers on this occasion were B. C. Eastham, Master of the Hykes Memorial Lodge; J. van G. Gillis; R. M. Gatliff; and W. B. Pettus who delivered the main address of the evening. Mr. Pettus discussed the subject "Masonic Lessons from the Life of George Washington," in an able and interesting manner. Music was furnished by the orchestra of the Fifteenth United States Infantry stationed in Tientsin.

GRAND DUCHY OF LUXEMBURG

HE Grand Duchy of Luxemburg, a peaceful little country of small landholders four-fifths the size of Rhode Island, situated between Germany, Belgium, and France, responded heartily to the call of the George Washington Bicentennial.

The principal event was an official Washington reception at the American Legation on the morning of July 4, 1932. The American Chargé d'Affaires ad interim, Hon. George Platt Waller, in reporting this occasion to the Department of State says that "no invitations were issued, in view of the fact that personal calls on the national holidays and feature occasions of foreign countries are a voluntary expression of good will and esteem." Continuing, Mr. Waller writes: "I am gratified to report that all of the local diplomatic corps, the Royal Family, the President of the Government, the Cabinet and other dignitaries were present in person or through their representatives. . . . Monsieur de Colnet d'Huart, Grand Marshal of the Court, by command of her Royal Highness the Grand Duchess, requested me to convey to my Government the sincerest wishes for the prosperity of our Country on this glorious anniversary. Colonel Speller, Aide de Camp to her Royal Highness, and Monsieur Donckel, Honorary Aide to his Royal Highness the Prince Consort, also brought congratulations on behalf of the Grand Ducal Court. Commandant Miller, on behalf of the Commander of the Armed Forces of the Grand Duchy, (confined to his bed) expressed the good wishes of the Army. His Excellency, Monsieur Joseph Bech, Minister of State, President of the Government, and Minister of Foreign Affairs, presented the good wishes of the Grand Ducal Government. The Burgomaster of Luxemburg City sent a congratulatory telegram."

During the afternoon of Independence Day, the American Club of Luxemburg, an organization composed of Luxemburgers who have at some time or other lived in the United States and their friends, held at the Mullerthal its annual banquet, which was styled this year a George Washington Bicentennial Celebration.

The President of the Club welcomed the attendance of the American Charge d'Affaires, expressed the hope that the American Club might enjoy many such functions in the future and toasted the President of the United States and the memory of George Washington. Mr. Waller responded, recalling that though Luxemburg was small in area it was the home of great souls and a great people.

During the evening of July 4 the Municipal Harmony Club gave a Washington Day Concert in the public square, where a great concourse of citizens had gathered. The crowd stood with uncovered heads while the American and Luxemburg National Anthems were rendered.

LUXEMBURGER WORT, the leading newspaper of the Duchy, made a full report of the day's activities. The same paper had previously, on February 22, 1932, devoted the greater part of the front page to a Tribute to George Washington and an illustrated biographical sketch of his life.

PERSIA

BLACK Walnut trees, the seeds of which were gathered at Mount Vernon from the trees planted by Farmer Washington, are now taking root in the soil of the Kingdom of Persia. The seeds were sent to the American Legation in Teheran, Persia, by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission and the National Nut Tree Planting Project.

On the two hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth, Hon. Charles C. Hart, American Minister to Persia, his staff, Dr. Samuel W. Jordan, President of the American College at Teheran, and the leading members of the American Colony gathered in the formal garden of the Minister's residence and held appropriate ceremonies incident to the transplanting of one of the seedling Walnut trees. According to the American Minister, "The day and setting were ideal; a first touch of spring was in the air and the snow-covered Elburz mountains loomed clear in the background. . . . I was impressed into service, breaking first ground with a cumbrous Persian pick, and Dr. Morgan wielded a spade equally as clumsy. Four abashed children manned the handbarrow on which the earth was thrown and Mrs. Hart placed the seedling. Some fifty feet of motion picture film was taken of the event. As to the Bicentennial celebration on Thanksgiving Day in Persia it might be said that it is the custom of all of the scattered small American communities in the Near and Middle East to meet on Thanksgiving Day in the Churches maintained by the various American missionary enterprises, which for more than a hundred years have spread Christian teachings and American culture in the Moslem lands.

The American Minister, in a dispatch of December 17, 1932, to the Department of State in Washington, D. C., says of these observances:

"The keynote of these church services is Thanksgiving in the truly puritanical spirit of the early settlers of the American colonies. And, if an American diplomatic or consular officer is one of the community, it is he who reads the President's Thanksgiving Proclamation. This year, then, in Persia, there was read in each of our seven scattered mission stations the first Thanksgiving Proclamation made by President George Washington. From the leaders of the American Mission in Persia, I have received and transmit to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission expressions of cordial thanks for the interesting explanatory notes thereon kindly sent me by the Commission. In Teheran, our only diplomatic and consular post in Persia, the Proclamation was read by Consul Robert B. Streeper."

PARAGUAY

FOUR days travel inland by river steamer, and 900 miles from the ocean, lies the land-locked Republic of Paraguay. The beautiful city of Asunción is the capital of the Republic. The American colony in Asunción, besides the United States Legation and Consulate staffs, numbers but 22 adults. Even with this small nucleus, detailed plans for the Celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington were made. Americans and officials and citizens of Paraguay were to join in honoring the memory of the First President of the United States.

Unfortunately, the difficulties existing between Bolivia and Paraguay, added to the unsettled economic conditions of the country, prevented the carrying out of these plans in full. Despite these handicaps the people of Paraguay evidenced a most kindly interest in the Bicentennial Celebration.

EL LIBERAL, the principal newspaper of the capital city of Asunción, in its issue of February 21, 1932, dedicated a whole page to articles on the life of George Washington and on the world-wide Bicentennial Celebration. Editorially George Washington was heralded as the forerunner of the independence of the Americas and as one of the world's foremost characters. Prominent on this Washington page was a translation of his famous Farewell Address.

A portion of the editorial appearing in that issue is here reported in translation:

In the two centuries that have elapsed since the birth of George Washington, the world has progressed a great deal in science, arts, commerce,—in everything that makes for civilization. But what is even more outstanding in this epoch is the advance made in liberty—liberty that has exalted the individual morally, socially and politically, and by which the people have abandoned their position of passive obedience to the Government and have begun to take part in it, thus achieving a democracy.

A great part of this transformation was accomplished in the land which gave birth to George Washington, and he was one of its principal authors, although he did not have the happiness of seeing how the spark of liberty lighted in his native land spread in a bright flame over the whole world.

Having been the supreme military commander during the war for independence, Washington was placed at the head of the first national government which sought to build its edifice on the Constitution. It was a government without a throne, without privileges, by people with different customs, religions, temperaments and interests—a novel experiment.

Washington headed this government, backed by the confidence of the people, grown strong through his wisdom, virtue, discretion and patriotism. The basis of his internal policy was the Constitution. Through it, Washington established justice in the land, achieved national tranquillity, assured the common defence, worked for the general well-being and secured the benefits of liberty to all the people.

SCHOOL UNVEILS WASHINGTON PORTRAIT

The "United States School" in Asunción unveiled a portrait of George Washington with appropriate ceremonies on February 22, 1932, and the United States Minister, the Honorable Post Wheeler, issued a statement in praise of George Washington to the Press of Paraguay.

Tomorrow, reads a translation of Mr. Wheeler's message, begins the third century since the appearance on this earth of the greatest citizen of the United States of America, who was born in the country which, under the influence of his supreme genius, was later to be the stage and scene of the greatest liberty and social and economic equality that has ever been known in the world.

If he had not existed, such a nation and the high destinies of the two sister continents of the west would perhaps have been different. With him the spirit of liberty was incarnated in a republic and a constitution.

Great in his own epoch, Time has made him still greater. Just as a mountain on the horizon looms even higher into the sky as one goes closer to it, so does the figure of Washington, with the passing of each decade, assume greater proportions among those of mankind.

JULY 4TH CELEBRATED

On July 4th, a pageant was presented at the "United States School" in honor of the one hundred and fifty-sixth Anniversary of the independence of the United States and the two hundredth anniversary of the Birth of George Washington. United States Minister Wheeler and the staffs of the United States Legation and Consulate were the guests of honor on this occasion.

Another Bicentennial event was held on the following day, under the auspices of the United States Legation and the Colegio Internacial. The exercises commenced with the singing of the Star Spangled Banner and closed with a tableau. A George Washington portrait, presented by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, was unveiled. Elaborate plans had been made for this event, but since the Colegio had been turned into a soldiers' hospital the original plan could not be carried out in full.

PRESIDENT OF PARAGUAY SENDS MESSAGE

The esteem in which the name of George Washington is held in Paraguay found expression in the following message from His Excellency, José P. Guggiari, President of the Republic of Paraguay. The message was read at the tomb of George Washington at Mount Vernon, on April 14, 1932, as part of the Pan American Day ceremonies in honor of America's hero:

THE PUBLIC LIFE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, SO FERTILE IN ITS IMMEDIATE RESULTS, WAS FERTILE ALSO IN THE CONSEQUENCES IT HAD IN HISPANIC AMERICA. THE ENERGY AND WILL WITH WHICH HE CARRIED FORWARD THE GREAT ENTERPRISE OF BRINGING A NEW AND GREAT NATION INTO BEING, HIS LOVE OF DEMOCRACY AND LIBERTY, HIS UNBOUNDED FAITH IN THE FUTURE OF THE NEW WORLD, WERE LESSONS FOLLOWED IN THE STRUGGLES FOR THE INDEPENDENCE AND FIRM ESTABLISHMENT OF OUR NATIONS WHICH BEGAN ON THE RIO DE LA PLATA IN 1810.

LIKE A POWERFUL BEACON HIS MEMORY ILLUMINED THE PATH WHICH THE FATHERS OF HISPANIC AMERICAN NATIONS FOLLOWED. AND THE LIGHT HAS NEVER FAILED; TODAY AS YESTERDAY IT SHINES SUPREME IN THE SKIES OF AMERICAN DEMOCRACY.

JOSE P. GUGGIARI,
PRESIDENT REPUBLIC OF PARAGUAY.

COSTA RICA

WING to conditions in Costa Rica during the year of the celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, plans for the Bicentennial Celebration which had been formulated could not be carried out in full.

The people of Costa Rica were intensely interested in the Bicentennial Celebration and in the life of the hero of the occasion. Numerous requests for copies of the Gilbert Stuart Athenaeum portraits of George Washington, and for literature pertaining to the life and times of the Father of his Country, were received by the United States Consular officers in Costa Rica and by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission in Washington. Pictures and literature were distributed to the schools and libraries of Costa Rica and made available to all the citizens of the country.

On April 14, 1932, the President of Costa Rica, Cleto González Víquez, sent a message to the United States for Pan American Day in which he eulogized George Washington and the United States. This splendid tribute follows:

GREAT AND POWERFUL IS THE UNITED STATES. ITS POPULATION ASTONISHES; ITS SWIFT DEVELOPMENT ASTOUNDS; ITS PRODUCTIVE POWER IS IMMEASURABLE; THE RAPIDITY OF ITS RISE ON THE PATH OF PROGRESS APPEARS THE WORK OF CENTURIES, THOUGH IT IS THE RESULT OF BARELY A HUNDRED YEARS.

ON THE HEIGHTS OF THIS GREAT NATION IS OUTLINED AN AUGUST SILHOUETTE. CLOTHED IN GENTLE AUSTERITY, WITH A FAINT SMILE THAT BETOKENS PATERNAL PRIDE, WITH THOUGHTFUL MIEN, THIS NOBLE FIGURE SEES THE JUST AND PATRIOTIC WORK OF HIS HANDS GROW FROM DAY TO DAY. ALONG THE STRAIGHT ROAD THAT HIS WISDOM DETERMINED THE GREAT NATION MARCHES FORWARD, PROUD OF ITS YOUTHFUL MIGHT, BUT WHEN IT STOPS TO MEDITATE, THE SOUL OF THE NATION IS UPLIFTED AND BLESSES THE FATHER OF ITS INSTITUTIONS, THE GREAT WASHINGTON.

CLETO GONZALEZ VIQUEZ,
President of the Republic.

An interesting Bicentennial event was held in San José on October 20, 1932. On that day the Costa Rican branch of the Zionist Organization of America met to honor the memory of George Washington. A secondary purpose of the meeting was to raise funds to contribute to the George Washington forest in Palestine.

LATVIA

LATVIA'S participation in the George Washington Bicentennial might be aptly characterized as one of the most sincere expressions of honor and respect ever accorded by one nation to a hero of another. The sentiment in the hearts of the Latvian people for the memory of George Washington and for their affiliation with the United States was voiced by their leaders; the Mayor of the city of Jelgava declared in a letter to the American Chargé d'Affaires that it was "only a proper and fitting thing that the name of the great builder of America should ring from our lips in every day life, reminding us of the high ideals of patriotism, unselfishness, integrity, truth and industry"; the Latvian Minister of Foreign Affairs averred in an official dispatch to the Secretary of State in Washington, D. C., that "George Washington is highly esteemed in Latvia as a defender of the liberty of nations"; and the LATVIS, Organ of National Union, for November 21, 1932, states that "the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington in Latvia is far more than a friendly gesture to the United States. It is in recognition of the unusual qualities of a great statesman."

A group of Latvian patriots chose the 200th anniversary of Washington's birth as the most appropriate date on which to hold the inaugural meeting of the "Latvian Society of Friends of America"—an organization devoted to the fostering of international good will in general and particularly committed to the sponsorship and preservation of fraternity between Latvia and the United States.

This impressive gathering, according to the American Minister, Hon. Robert E. Skinner, took place in Riga in the assembly hall of the University of Latvia. American and Latvian flags converted the meeting place into a patriotic shrine and a large portrait of George Washington identified the event with the Bicentennial.

Among those in attendance were the Latvian Minister of Foreign Affairs, the charter founders of the Society of Friends, staff members of the American Legation and representatives from the American colony in Riga. Dr. Alfreds Bilmans, Chief of the Press Section of the Latvian Foreign Office, who was largely instrumental in organizing the Society, presided. Three addresses were given, the first of which was delivered by Dr. A. Butuls, President of the Society and member of the faculty of the University of Latvia, who spoke a sincere tribute to George Washington and America in the following language:

Honorable Rector, Your Excellency, Ladies and Gentlemen: The Latvian Society of Friends of America have gathered today in this hall to pay tribute to the great son of America—George Washington, on the occasion of the two hundredth anniversary of his birth. We celebrate this memorable day at the same time as the great American nation does, and which is a friend of ours. To all of us America has always been a country which we admire: from our childhood we are taught to esteem and love her. The natural wealth of America, the flora and fauna which have no equal, the attainments in building up a union of republics, the astounding technical developments, the great achievements in the field of science and education, the great universities, the extensive libraries, the splendid museums, the greatest observatories in the world, the institutions of physics, chemistry, biology, medicine, etc., where the largest number of the best men of science are at work—all this evokes our admiration. And this is why we express today our esteem and respect to the American genius.

The Society of Latvian Friends of America today extends its hands to the great American nation on this important hour. The Latvian nation obtained magnanimous help from America during the darkest days of her struggle for independence. Even before the war America opened wide her gates to all Latvians who were made to leave their country because of political, social or economic circumstances—this was done in the spirit of George Washington.

Please accept, Mr. Minister, the expression of the deep esteem and sincere gratitude of Latvians to the great American nation. At the same time the Latvian Society of Friends of America entertains the hope that you, Your Excellency, will feel yourself in our midst as among friends. We are very glad to see you with us because you come from the land of George Washington with the great ideals and the high prudence of life of George Washington.

Dr. A. Tentelis, also a member of the faculty of the University of Latvia was the second speaker. Dr. Tentelis recounted the legend of George Washington and the cherry tree and pointed out that although the tale was discredited as to historical authenticity, one thing is certain, and that is that George Washington had from his youth to his dying day a sense of integrity beyond reproach. The speaker then reviewed Washington's activities as a soldier and statesman, emphasizing particularly the influence exerted by George Washington upon the making of the Constitution of the United States. The speaker pointed out that this great instrument had served as a guide for the framers of Constitutions now in force in several European nations.

The American Minister responded to these two addresses in a speech that was warmly applauded and given wide publicity. The full text of Mr. Skinner's speech follows:

I am happy to hear that a Society of Friends of America has been founded in Latvia, and especially, that this day, the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, has been chosen to inaugurate its activities. We Americans are always proud and grateful when our friends abroad honor the memory of Washington in this way, believing as we do, and as Daniel Webster once said, that his character belongs to the world and that if America had made no other contribution, that alone would entitle it to the respect of mankind.

In international relations, however, we need something more than respect if they are to be really fruitful, and that "something" is friendship. If, throughout a world now sorely troubled in various ways, we could replace doubt and suspicion by genuine friendship, what would it not mean in the practical settlement of the problems by which all countries are confronted? And how is that genuine friendship to be created if we stand apart from each other, if we lack actual acquaintance with each other, if we make no effort to draw together as we are drawing together this afternoon? Charles Lamb once remarked to a companion that he hated so-and-so. "But why do you hate so-and-so?" was the reply, "when you do not even know him, and never once have seen him?" "That is just it," replied Lamb, "how could I hate him if I knew him?" So it is our business to cultivate friendship between Latvia and the United States. And probably, while engaged on this congenial task, we Americans certainly can learn to know much more than we do about this interesting and ancient part of the world, to our advantage and to yours, and the peoples of the Baltic States generally can learn something to their advantage as they study the early history of the United States.

It is surprising when one looks into the matter to perceive how, at a distance of a century and one-half since the establishment of the United States, the circumstances of the establishment of these Baltic nations resemble those which prevailed in the time of Washington. I read only the other day in one of your newspapers that no comparison could be drawn between conditions here and those which prevailed in America. The person who wrote the article should join a Society of Friends of America. We have in the United States, it is true, a fairly homogeneous population, and our institutions, laws, and literature have come to us most naturally from British sources. But this was not always the case. The thirteen original states were in many respects antagonistic to each other; there were intense local rivalries; it required years of patient effort and the genius of Franklin to make it possible to secure a constitutional connection between the states; and it required the better part of 100 years afterwards to complete our conception of an efficient Federal Union. We speak the English language, it is true, but had our historical development been other than it was, we might have adopted the Dutch language, or the French language, or conceivably the Swedish language. There is nothing new in this minorities question which puzzles today the Baltic States. Again, our remoteness from Europe did not preserve us from aggressions of more than one kind. We had the wilderness and the Indians on the one side, we had the complications arising out of the Napoleonic wars on the other side against which to contend, so that all in all, our early history was one unceasing struggle. With the result you are familiar—a result which probably was only possible because we were fortunate in having had Washington as our first leader. It was he who gave us the great example of his own life; it was he who outlined the national policy by which we have been guided ever since, and at no time, probably, more certainly than at this very moment.

I must not detain you longer. It has been a pleasure to be here, and I wish for the Society of Friends of America a long and prosperous existence.

OTHER BICENTENNIAL EVENTS

In addition to the Washington event sponsored by the Society of Friends of America there were other significant Bicentennial happenings in Latvia.

The American Minister reports that "in connection with the celebration in Latvia of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, especial note should be taken of the fact that Minister of Education, Hon. Attis Kenins, issued instructions that on February 22, 1932, in all schools in Latvia, pupils were to be informed of the life and activities of George Washington."

NEWSPAPERS ENTHUSIASTIC

Latvian newspapers were enthusiastic in their expressions of the social and moral benefits that were to accrue from the observances of the George Washington celebrations in Latvia.

JAUNAKAS SINAS, Latvian language newspaper for February 22, 1932, carried an article written by the Latvian Minister of Education, Attis Kenins, in which George Washington is characterized as one of the greatest democrats, whose political ideals are reflected in the constitutions of France, Germany, Poland, and other European countries. It is stated that Washington is not merely the pride of America, but of all mankind, and the article concludes with the remark that if idealism has been such an important factor in the development of great nations, it is of especial importance to small, newly-founded states, and this fact should not be lost sight of by Latvia.

LATVIS, Organ of National Union for February 21, 1932, editorially declares that the celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington is far more than a friendly gesture of the United States. It is in recognition of the unusual qualities of a great statesman. Character and love for his country enabled Washington to overcome threatening obstacles and to lay the foundation for the United States of today.

SEVODNIA, Russian Minority Organ for February 21, 1932, describes Washington in an editorial as one possessed of unusual ability as an organizer, as was shown in his military activities, and points out that Washington was not self-seeking as was proved by his disinclination on various occasions to accept high offices that were offered to him. He was not vain, nor did he designedly make bids for popular approval. His conduct, however, was so meritorious that he won and held the esteem of all classes of the people.

RIGASCHE RUNDSCHAU, German minority organ, for February 22, 1932, contained an article by Dr. Hans v. Rimscha, an editorial writer for the paper. The article opened with the quotation, "The greatest of the good and the best of the greatest," and continued by pointing out that Washington can thus be characterized, not primarily because of specific achievements as a soldier and statesman, but because of his great moral influence. He became the "first in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen" because of his equanimity in times of good fortune and bad, because of his courage, his sincerity, his faithfulness and his deep love of freedom, but in spite of this, when the whole civilized world today celebrates the birthday of George Washington, it does so chiefly because of his achievements and not because of his character, for Washington, is after all the founder of that America whose immeasurable significance the world is just now, especially since the World War, beginning to be cognizant of. Today we realize that the Declaration of Independence did not merely create a new nation, for today America is not merely a rich and powerful country. America is a spiritual problem whose influence is felt throughout the world, and its spirit today is engaged in a struggle with the spirit of Asia for the soul of the deathly sick Europe. Consequently it is appropriate, particularly for Europe, to celebrate the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of Washington and not only to speak and write about America but also to reflect on America.

WASHINGTON SQUARE NAMED

As an expression of their high regard for the Great American, Riga, the capital city of Latvia and the municipality of Jelgava resolved to rename certain avenues and public squares for George Washington. A resolution was adopted by the city council of Riga in June, 1931, by virtue of which the name "Hanza Square" was authorized to be changed to "Washington Square." A public ceremony was held in connection with the official renaming of this square during the Bicentennial year, the details of which were not fully known at the time of the publication of this record.

The following letter from the Mayor of the city of Jelgava to Mr. Felix Cole, American Charge d'Affaires in Latvia, sets forth the sentiment of the people and some of the details in connection with the renaming of an avenue and a square in honor of George Washington in that Latvian city:

JELGAVAS PILSETAS VALDE

DECEMBER 31ST, 1931.
No. 7085

MR. FELIX COLE,

Charge d'Affaires, American Legation, Riga.

DEAR SIR:

In the course of the year the news came to us that America is preparing to celebrate on the 22 day of February 1932 the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington. The Council of the city of Jelgava, the ancient capital of the independent Latvian Duchy of Kurland and Zemgale, desirous of establishing an everlasting sign of the deference and admiration which the citizens have for this great man and his high ideals, resolved to have a Washington Square and a Washington Street in the city of Jelgava. To this end the names of the "Sluzu laukums" and "Dambja iela" were duly changed.

We take great pleasure in sending you enclosed herewith the photographs of the Washington Square and the Washington Street in Jelgava, together with the sketches of the proposed development of the same.

We cherish the firm conviction that the inscription of the name of George Washington upon the places in Jelgava will not only reflect the esteem and admiration our citizens have for the first American President and his country, but that it will also be the cementing force that will bind us closer together, this, the city of Jelgava, and that, the Great Republic of the United States of America.

Great men are products of great people, they are the incarnation of the spirit of a people, their great ideals live forever and build up the nations of the world and make them move forward to better things, greater liberty, greater happiness and greater prosperity for humanity.

We, the citizens of Jelgava, the birthplace of the first Latvian newspaper and the hometown of our first president, we still remember the visit of Herbert Hoover, now President of the United States, to our country in the dark days of the war time. We have not forgotten the helping hand America extended to us at the time of the struggle for the independence of Latvia, when the American Red Cross gave us food and clothing—this humane act will be inscribed with golden letters on the pages of our history. It is only a proper and fitting thing, that the name of the great builder of America should ring from our lips also in everyday life, reminding us of the high ideals of patriotism, devotion, unselfishness, integrity, truth and industry. These high ideals of George Washington will ever be the foundation of the noblest trend of human progress.

May we request, dear Sir, that you kindly send the enclosed album to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, together with our sincere and most cordial greetings to your nation and your government.

(Signed) HUGO STOLCS,
Mayor of the City of Jelgava.

The plans for the Washington Square and Avenue in Jelgava, a reproduction of which were forwarded to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission in Washington, D. C., call for an extensive scheme of improvements, including the planting of a great number of leaf and coniferous trees, the setting apart of a section of the square as a playground and the conversion of the remainder of the square into a public park. Washington Avenue will be one of the most distinguished thoroughfares in the city. It will be macadamized and will extend through forests of beautiful shade trees, pass several municipal institutions, including the soldiery, the school for the deaf and dumb and municipal hospital, a public sanitarium and will converge with the main street of the city.

The American Chargé d'Affaires states in a dispatch to the Secretary of State in Washington, D. C., that "it is worthy of attention that there were neither any natural features in Latvia called 'Washington' nor any streets or squares so named in any Latvian cities. It would therefore appear that the Latvian Ministry of Foreign Affairs took amiable advantage of the Bicentennial."

To set the seal of American gratitude and approval on the action of the two Latvian cities, the American Legation at Riga forwarded a message to the Latvian Ministry of Foreign Affairs in which it was stated:

The Legation has the further honor to request the Ministry to be so kind as to convey to the Councils of the Cities of Riga and Jelgava, and their Mayors, the Legation's deep appreciation of their exceedingly gracious act in honoring as they have done the name of George Washington, one of the founders of the American Republic, whose name is esteemed wherever the liberties of nations are cherished. It is most appropriate that this name should be honored by these organs of Latvian self-government. During the days of Latvia's difficult struggle for independence, the men, whose courage and energy made possible the foundation of a free and independent Latvia, gave new evidence of the enduring principles of liberty and independence exemplified by George Washington nearly 150 years earlier.

The Legation has informed the State Department of the action of the Municipalities of Riga and Jelgava and makes no doubt that the American Government will deeply appreciate the action of the Riga and Jelgava City Councils, which strengthens the ties already existing between the two free peoples, both of which enjoy the benefits of independence and liberty, ideals of which George Washington was so distinguished an advocate.

ESTONIA

ESTONIA, to express its gratitude to the United States for support rendered during the critical moment when Estonian independence hung in a balance and for the homes that many Estonians have found in America, and to demonstrate a national regard for America's liberator, joined whole-heartedly in the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration. Bounded as Estonia is on the east by Soviet Russia, from which country Estonia declared her independence in 1918, following the Bolshevik coup d'état, there was special significance in such affirmations on the part of prominent Estonians as the following, uttered during the Bicentennial year:

George Washington will be able to lend seriousness and stamina both to Estonian practical and intellectual life. His mind is an inspiration everywhere.—Ants Oras, President of the Anglo-Estonian Academical Society.

Estonians have always highly appreciated both the liberty of nations and all persons who have fought for that liberty. George Washington is one of those, and he will therefore be everlastingly dear to the Estonian people. He occupies the place of honor in the realm of its political vision and aspiration. . . . He, together with the entire American nation, is an illustrious example which Estonia has followed and will endeavor to follow in the future.—Prof. Juri Uluots, Estonian Educator and Statesman.

The official Estonian celebration in honor of George Washington was held in Tartu, the second largest city of the country, on November 23, 1932, at the University of Tartu, under the auspices of the Anglo-Estonian Academical Society. The meeting was held in the large university auditorium and was attended by one hundred persons. The president of the Anglo-Estonian Academical Society, Ants Oras, presided and in his introductory address spoke as follows:

Mr. Chargé d'Affaires, Ladies and Gentlemen:

The Academical Anglo-Estonian Society is delighted to get into immediate contact with the official diplomatic representative of that nation whose greatest citizen we have come to commemorate. Our country owes much to the United States of America, having been supported by the great Trans-Atlantic Republic from the very first days of our independence. We were helped by the United States of America at the most critical moment of our recent history when it was extremely doubtful whether an independent Estonia was possible without that support, both moral and financial. Moreover, America continued to help us even after our first critical struggles were over. We have to be grateful for the remarkable work done in this country by the American Y. W. C. A. and Y. M. C. A. Special emphasis should be laid on the readiness with which America helped us in our scientific endeavours. The generosity of the Rockefeller Foundation has enabled many Estonian scholars to pursue their favourite studies with greater intensity than would otherwise have been possible. The Carnegie Institution is sending us its valuable publications and enriched one of the chief libraries of this country by the donation of an excellent collection of books dealing with the civilization of America. These are only a few chance instances of America's willingness to back us in our cultural efforts.

However, even before our emergence into history as an independent nation numerous Estonians who found the oppressive atmosphere of Russian Czarism insupportable, profited by the humane attitude of the great democratic power of the West. Emigrants who were threatened by the Russian ancien regime often found a lasting home on the other side of the Atlantic. Others returned to their home country to give it the benefit of their American experiences. All of us regarded America as the mainstay of democracy and equality.

American scholars have called attention to the extraordinary, idealistic optimism of American literature. One has only to mention the names of such men as Benjamin Franklin, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Ralph Waldo Emerson and Henry David Thoreau to feel at once the truth of these remarks. Could there ever be any doubt as to the share a genius like Walt Whitman had in the work of instilling new humane-ness, frankness and vitality into the etiolated European mind? Even today we are aware of a new idealistic, serious spirit coming to us from the American Universities. The new humanism that is rapidly spreading in the States, encouraged by such men as Irving Babbitt and Paul Elmer More, shows that the essentials of European culture have found magnificent champions there—champions that Europe might be proud of but unfortunately lacks. We here in Estonia are beginning to draw upon these sources of invigorating idealism.

Culture and civilization are largely matters of character and ethical development. Moral firmness and strength of mind are those bedrocks on which the success even of the fine arts ultimately depends. There can be no culture without great, profound souls. One of the greatest and profoundest souls, one of the most brilliant examples of honesty of mind ever to be met with in history is being commemorated at the present meeting. George Washington's integrity and strength of character and his profound sanity of outlook are among the most durable bases of American civilization, and consequently of an imposing part of the civilization of the world. He is a character to be looked up to for centuries. He was great in victory and great in defeat. His thought was clear, his actions were resolute and bold. And what is even more, his integrity was incorruptible.

He is one of the purest sources of inspiration for his nation and for the world. American thought has every right to be optimistic and idealistic, having such an ancestor—for a statesman and soldier may be an ancestor even to philosophy if he possesses a moral backbone like that of Washington. Let us honour ourselves rather than him in calling to our minds his life and activities. George Washington will be able to lend seriousness and stamina both to our practical and to our intellectual life. His mind is an inspiration everywhere.

THANKS ESTONIAN GOVERNMENT

Mr. Harry E. Carlson, the American Chargé d'Affaires, was the second speaker on the program. In a widely quoted speech he told how the Bicentennial was being celebrated at home and abroad and thanked the Government of Estonia on behalf of the Government of the United States for Estonian participation. Mr. Carlson's remarks follow:

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Academical Anglo-Estonian Society, Ladies and Gentlemen:

Please permit me to thank you for the kind invitations which your Society has been so good as to extend to the American Minister to Estonia, Mr. Robert P. Skinner, and to me to be present at this meeting of your Society which is to be devoted to commemorating the George Washington Bicentennial. Minister Skinner has requested me to express to you his deep regret that a previous engagement has prevented him from being with you here today; he has, however, asked me to communicate to you the hope that he will, at some future date have the pleasure of meeting the members of your Society. At the same time he has designated me to make, in his stead, a few remarks to you on this occasion.

I should like, furthermore, to express my thanks to the Rector of the Tartu University for the honor which he has shown my country by associating himself with this George Washington Celebration. I also wish to express my appreciation to the professors of this time-honored institution of learning, who have come here this evening, for the courtesy which they have thereby shown my fellow countrymen.

Two hundred years ago on a colonial estate in Virginia there was born a man who was destined later on to become not only the founder of a great Republic but also the proclaimer of ideas concerning freedom of the individual which have since made a lasting impression upon practically every country of the civilized world. This man was George Washington, the first President of the United States.

By an Act of Congress of the United States the period from February 22nd, the day on which this illustrious patriot was born, to November 24th, that is, tomorrow, the American day of national thanksgiving, has been set apart for the celebration of the achievements of George Washington and for the comprehensive study of his career. To this end the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission was formed, with which the States, cities, organizations and public-spirited citizens in the United States have cooperated in commemorating with appropriate ceremonies the greatest of all Americans.

It has been a matter of much gratification to the United States that foreign countries have also joined it in paying tribute and in showing honor to the father of American independence. On February 22, 1932, a flood of telegrams was received by President Hoover and by the Department of State of the United States from every corner of this wide world of ours, even the most remote. All these messages vied with one another in their expressions of admiration and of reverence for the great master and the outstanding champion of the cause of personal freedom.

In the interval which has elapsed since February 22nd, the American Nation has, following the wishes of its Congress, devoted itself to a sincere and respectful study of the life of its first citizen.

Some of our people have studied him as a youth before he entered the arena of public events. Others have followed his brilliant career as a young officer fighting against the Indians in the service of the King whose power over the American Colonies he was, years later, destined to overthrow. In this study attention has also been paid by our people to George Washington as a law-abiding citizen who, in the years of his early manhood, before he had been called upon to give his services to his country, devoted himself with great assiduity to the common ordinary tasks of everyday life, even as you and I. His early successes as a frontiersman, a surveyor, and as the administrator of his colonial estate, were due to the sterling qualities of straightforwardness, integrity, fair dealing, patience and honesty, by which he was characterized throughout his life.

Still others, and, perhaps, by far the greater number of our people, have given during this Bicentennial Year consideration to the achievements of George Washington as the public leader through whose efforts the formation of a free and independent United States of America was made possible. These persons have studied the events which led to his selection as Commander-in-Chief of the Continental forces. They have re-lived with him the scenes of the long and bitter War of Independence which followed. Our people have visited the places at which not only his successes in this war took place but also those at which his defeats and his hardships occurred. They have portrayed these events in pageant, in story and in picture. The American nation has this year lived again with Washington the hard months spent by him at Valley Forge when all seemed lost and when the future looked dark and foreboding. The nation has also recalled the stirring and enheartening examples of fortitude, courage and determination to succeed, which Washington gave to his troops and to the American people during this period of adversity, and it has also followed him step by step in the long struggles which eventually resulted in the brilliant victory which he gained at Yorktown. It was this victory that laid the foundation for the subsequent treaty of peace, and still later, for the creation of a free and independent United States of America.

But we have not stopped here. Careful consideration has been given during this George Washington Anniversary Year to Washington's subsequent activities as a patriot, a statesman and as the country's first President. It was in the trying years which elapsed between the Yorktown victory in 1781 and the adoption in 1789 of the present Constitution of the United States, that Washington, by his example and by his sage counsels, played an important part in leading his people safely out of the political chaos which then existed.

The American public, moreover, has this year been proud to turn back in its history to the record of the events in the two administrations of its first President. It has re-read all of his great public addresses, from his noble speech of acceptance at his inauguration in 1789 to his moving Farewell Address of September 19, 1796. In the utterances of its first great leader the present generation of Americans has found much from which to draw profit and to encourage it in the problems and difficulties by which it is now faced in common with the rest of the world.

The American nation has also this year bowed its head in reverence in commemoration of the death of the country's foremost leader, which took place on December 14, 1799, at Mount Vernon, the home of George Washington. Mount Vernon has since become a national shrine and has been visited during the decades by great multitudes of persons desirous of showing respect to the man whose name has stood and now stands for the personification of the spirit of liberty and of the freedom of the American Republic.

I repeat that the United States has taken grateful cognizance of the way in which the other countries of the world have joined with it in commemorating the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. It has appreciated the sentiments of congratulation and felicitation which were contained in the numerous messages sent to its President on the birthday of the man who is now affectionately termed "the Father of his Country." The American nation has been present in spirit at each of the innumerable gatherings which have been arranged spontaneously in foreign countries to do honor to the memory of George Washington. American citizens travelling in foreign lands will point with pride to the public squares, boulevards, avenues and streets which have, during this Bicentennial Year, been named in honor of their illustrious leader. Their children will stand reverently with uncovered heads in the shade of the noble trees which have this year been planted in foreign lands, in spots already rich in local tradition and in historic interest, to commemorate the George Washington Bicentennial.

It is in this spirit of appreciation and of deep gratitude that I have come to you today to be present at the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration, which has so graciously been arranged by the Academical Anglo-Estonian Society. Please permit me, in behalf of my Government and of my fellow countrymen, to thank you for the tribute which you have thus shown to George Washington. The oak tree which, I understand, is to be planted on the campus of your famous University, will remain as a sign to future generations of the short pause which we have made here today in our respective appointed tasks to show respect to the memory of George Washington, the outstanding champion of freedom.

You may be certain that when the history of the George Washington Bicentennial is written, as it will be by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, the name of the Republic of Estonia will also be included in the list of those countries which have joined with us this year in showing homage to George Washington, a man whose example and whose life is worthy of emulation by all of us.

FOUGHT FOR SAME PRINCIPLES

The principal address on the program was delivered by Prof. Ants Piip of the University of Tartu. For forty minutes this speaker held the interest of the audience with a description of outstanding events in the life of George Washington. He likened the American struggle for independence to that of Estonia and declared that essentially the same principles had been fought for. He said that Estonians had only to think of the vicissitudes of Washington and his compatriots when their own lot seemed hard during their recent fight for freedom, and their cause took on fresh meaning.

The complete program was broadcast through the Tallinn Radio Station, and messages received from listeners throughout the country showed that it was heard by a vast audience.

The Estonian press played its part in the observance of the George Washington Year. Newspapers and periodicals carried miscellaneous articles and editorials concerning George Washington at intervals throughout the celebration. The Estonian Writers' Union of Tartu, translated G. Sheridan Jones' short biography of George Washington into the Estonian language. The booklet was read with great interest in every part of the land.

One of the most inspirational estimates of the character and far-felt influence of George Washington was contributed by Prof. Juri Uluots, Estonian educator and statesman, to the bicentennial number of the AMERICANIZATION BULLETIN and is reprinted here:

GEORGE WASHINGTON AND THE ESTHONIAN NATION

George Washington was a man of exceptionally well balanced character. He possessed a genius for fathoming the reality beneath the outward show of things, and with relentless will power he systematically realized ideals which were far in advance of his day.

He appears to be the person who incorporated and concentrated in himself the liberal ideals of the American people and as the leader of that nation, gave those ideals material form. His personality, in the foundation or base of the enduring liberty and mightiness of America, may be compared to the granite base of a well built house.

The history of mankind shows that there have always been subordinate nations and ruling nations, and history is to a certain extent a record of the struggle for liberty of subordinate nations against their rulers. Those individuals who have embodied in themselves the aspirations towards liberty of their nations and who have materialized these ideals, shine out like stars in the history of those struggles. George Washington appears in the foremost rank among such persons and stands forth in an especially brilliant light in the pageant of mankind.

Estonians have always highly appreciated both the liberty of nations and all persons who have fought for that liberty. George Washington is one of those, and he will therefore be everlastingly dear to the Estonian people. He occupies the place of honor in the realm of its political vision and aspiration.

The Estonian nation, in addition to the foregoing reasons, has particular motives for esteeming so highly the name of George Washington. An individual who has been obliged to hide himself underground understands how to appreciate to the fullest what it means to live in liberty with free access to pure air and sunshine. A nation which has lived under foreign rule and fought for its liberty, knows at first hand how to appreciate worthily the liberty of nations and the man who led his people in the struggle for independence. Estonia is such a nation.

In the past the Estonian people had temporarily lost their political liberty in the struggle against other nations, but since that time they have never lost their hope that at a right time in the future they would regain their lost freedom. They bore in their minds the images of men who had led nations in their battle for freedom. Among these George Washington occupied the foremost place.

Estonia was obliged to fight against nations much stronger and larger than itself, but it did not lose its hope of victory. It knew that a combination of all its strength, with a right conception of conditions and a relentless will to materialize its high ideals would, regardless of all difficulties, lead to victory. The American nation, with its leader George Washington, was a classic example and an auspicious guide in the attainment of this goal.

As a result of its struggle to carry out these ideals the Estonian nation won back its liberty and established the Estonian Republic on the land of its forefathers, which lies along the East coast of the Baltic Sea. The Estonian nation knows that the maintenance and the furtherance of its liberty is a difficult, but an absorbing and vitally important task, and it has the will to perform it. In this undertaking the American nation will be an excellent example. On the foundation established by George Washington the American nation has succeeded in building what is known in the history of nations as a symbol of strength and power.

The person of George Washington is therefore dear to the Estonian nation, not only as a monumental figure in the family of fighters for the liberty of nations, but he, together with the entire American nation, is also an illustrious example which Estonia has followed and will endeavor to follow in the future.

May God help the Estonian nation to continue the task it has undertaken!

ETHIOPIA

EXCEPT for King Solomon, who is regarded as the ancestor of the present Royal Ethiopian ruling family, no foreign national hero has ever been commemorated in the Empire of Ethiopia, according to information received from the American Consul in Ethiopia, Hon. Addison E. Southard; and for that reason and because facilities were lacking in that remote country for a notable Washington celebration, the Bicentennial was not observed by the people or government of the country.

But the George Washington message was sounded in the land by a little colony of American missionaries and consulate staff members who gathered at the consulate in Addis Ababa, the capital of Ethiopia, on Washington's birthday and planted a cedar tree in honor of the Great American "in the rented and not very prepossessing grounds of the office in the comparatively primitive African town that has no public parks."

The spectacle of the planting was an inspiring one. There on African soil, thousands of miles from their native land, heads bowed in respect to George Washington and hearts filled with the kind of patriotism that only wells up in the souls of those who are far away from their fatherland, this small group of loyal citizens of the United States of America contributed their share to the success of the world-wide Bicentennial celebration.

IRAQ

HE name of George Washington was sounded with honor on the 200th anniversary of his birth in the ancient city of Bagdad in the Kingdom of Mesopotamia, more familiarly known by its Arabic name Iraq, and the echoes of the celebration reached the city's 150,000 Mohammedan, Jewish and Christian inhabitants.

The celebration took place at the American Legation and was termed a George Washington tea and reception. According to the American Chargé d'Affaires, Hon. Alexander K. Sloan, "the entire American colony in Bagdad and vicinity were invited."

The guests drank toasts proposed to the hero of the day and the entertainment features were reminiscent of the colonial period. George Washington literature furnished by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission was made available for those who sought further information concerning the Father of their country.

It was the consensus of opinion that the event had contributed a great deal to the patriotic love of country in the hearts of the Americans present and also had created a favorable reaction among the people of Bagdad.

ARABIA

MERICANS, British, natives of Arabia, and visitors from several other countries, joined in giving honor to the name of George Washington in Aden, Arabia, the British coaling station on the Red Sea, during the Bicentennial year.

The American Consul, Hon. W. N. Walmsley, Jr., in reporting a Bicentennial reception held at the American Consulate at Aden on the 200th anniversary of the birth of George Washington, wrote:

"It was highly gratifying to witness the sympathetic interest with which Englishmen here regard General Washington. According to the expressions of opinion of many persons with whom the writer conversed, General Washington's appeal to the English is largely based on his English 'breeding' and ideals of fair play."

Invitations were sent to more than 60 guests by the American Consul for this George Washington reception. The guests included representatives from the British diplomatic corps, army and navy, and several native Arabs. American flags, George Washington portraits, and American patriotic music linked the celebration with the Bicentennial.

Incidental to the Bicentennial, an investigation was conducted by agricultural experts in Aden to ascertain whether or not it would be advisable to plant seeds from walnut trees sent to Arabia for that purpose from George Washington's estate, Mount Vernon. It was found that the soil at Aden was not fit for walnut trees; so the officials in charge recommended that different means of honoring George Washington be adopted.

LIBERIA

 IN 1822, twenty-three years after the death of George Washington, a group of Negro freedmen from the United States, with the assistance of American colonization societies, founded the Republic of Liberia, patterning its constitution and government after those of the United States. In this African country, the population of which is almost entirely of the Negro race, was held one of the most unusual events of the Bicentenary year. The celebration took place in Monrovia, the capital of the republic, on February 22, 1932, under the direction of a Bicentennial Committee headed by Dr. Ottawa J. Saunders and including as assistants Hon. G. W. Gibson, Secretary of Education; Hon. Gabriel Dennis, Secretary of the Treasury; Charles E. Mitchell; Louise Scott, Sue Brownell, Clara Cassell, Ira Haltiwanger; Mrs. Ira Haltiwanger, and Irene Gant.

Under the auspices of this committee the city and vicinity were circularized with printed notices in which it was declared in part that "Liberia, having a peculiar regard for the United States, has seen fit to take part in this elaborate celebration honoring the Father of that great country . . . These programs are being fostered with the approval of the Government of Liberia."

The scene of the celebration was the Government Square in the heart of the city. The ceremonies were opened with a patriotic overture by the Liberian Frontier Force Band, following which American anthems were rendered by a group of native choirs and musical societies recruited from different parts of the land. The Bassa tribe community sang American anthems in the Bassa tongue, the invocation was pronounced by D. T. E. Ward and the program continued with the rendition of patriotic songs by the assembled choirs, remarks concerning the observance of the Bicentennial in Liberia by Hon. G. W. Gibson and a native war dance executed by Mr. Frank Williams Etal, assisted by the Bassa Community players, who also presented a dramatic episode in which General Washington was portrayed as offering civilization to the natives of Africa.

The introductory address was made by Dr. Saunders who said in part that "if there had not been a George Washington, there might not have been a Liberia" and that "the heroes of Liberian independence acted under different circumstances and conditions, but the fundamental characteristics of those freedmen were forged alike in the thought and personality of Washington." Bishop R. E. Campbell delivered the principal address of the occasion, choosing as his subject "Washington, Builder of a Nation." The Bishop told how Washington was the father of a real democracy and how Liberia had given him great respect by shaping her Constitution and directing her Governmental principles and precepts after the fashion of Washington's ideas and ideals.

Hon. Gabriel Dennis, Secretary of the Liberian Treasury, delivered a Washington eulogy in which he outlined in detail the genealogy, life and circumstances surrounding the death of Washington and paid a high tribute to him as the founder of the United States and the inspiration of Liberia.

Following the singing of the Liberian National Anthem by the choir and the public, the benediction was pronounced by Dr. D. R. Horton.

After the program a parade was staged, which was described in a dispatch of the American Consul to Monrovia, Hon. William H. Hunt, to the Secretary of State in Washington, D. C., as "one of the largest parades ever witnessed in the city of Monrovia." All of the school children marched with flags and banners. The Boy Scouts and Girl Guides responded under the command of the Chief Scout of Liberia. And, according to Consul Hunt, "the parade was accompanied with much local color, for the natives had their 'country devil,' their dancers and warriors in full tribal attire. The procession was led by the Liberian Frontier Force Band, and upon its arrival at the pavillion in Government Square, space was hardly available. Natives with their chiefs, high government officials, all mingled together." "But," the consul concludes, "the exercises were very impressive and dignified."

In his account of the events of the day, Dr. Ottawa J. Saunders says: "I am glad to report that the first program of the Bicentenary activities here were very successful. I can proudly say that the parade and general enthusiasm among the Liberian people were among the largest and most impressive ever beheld in the black republic."

FREE CITY OF DANZIG

HE citizens of the Free City of Danzig, outlet on the Baltic Sea for Polish commerce, did not hold a special Bicentennial celebration, but the significance of the occasion was brought appropriately to their attention by the American consulate in the city.

On Washington's birthday, 1932, the President of the Senate of the Free City of Danzig, Dr. E. Ziehm and Mrs. Ziehm, the Chief and Assistant Chief of the Division of Foreign Affairs of the Senate, the president of the Bank of Danzig, and members of the American colony in the city were guests at a George Washington reception given by the American Consul, Hon. Charles H. Heisler.

The event was marked by fitting toasts to the hero of the day and to the respective governments of the guests, and the conversation was directed largely to the theme of the Bicentennial celebration. A Washington motif was carried out in the decorations, the music and the luncheon of the reception.

The governmental officials who attended expressed their felicitations to the American Consul, C. Warwick Perkins, Jr., with respect to the meaning of the day, and accounts of the affair appeared in the leading newspapers of the city.

MOROCCO

LMOST directly east, a distance of more than 4,500 miles, across the ocean from George Washington's Virginia birthplace, is the country of Morocco. If Washington could have thrown the famous legendary coin straight across the Atlantic, instead of merely across the Potomac, it would probably have come to earth in Tangier, Morocco. In this ancient city, once a stronghold of the Moors, but now an internationalized territory, on Washington's birthday, 1932, a small group of Americans, led by Hon. Maxwell Blake, Diplomatic Agent, gathered in the patio of the American Legation and, with a solemnity that befitted the occasion, planted a number of Walnut seeds, garnered from the trees planted by Washington at Mount Vernon. The affair was impressive and added to the grand sum total of Bicentennial celebrations the world over.

In searching through the files of the American Consulate General in Tangier, one of the assistants discovered a letter written by Hon. James Simpson, American Consul at Tangier in 1800, in which the writer laments the death of President Washington. The letter is addressed from "Mount Washington, near Tangier," and it is explained by the office of the Consulate General that "this mount was named for Washington while he was still alive. . . . The 'Mount Washington near Tangier' referred to in the dispatch is now known as 'The Mountain,' but a property in this section, formerly owned by Colonel Felix Mathews, American Consul at Tangier from 1870 to 1893 is still known locally as 'Mount Washington.' "

The letter written by Consul Simpson, setting forth a vivid word picture of the conditions of the day, with its reference to the death of President Washington reads:

MOUNT WASHINGTON, NEAR TANGIER.
8 MARCH 1800.

SIR:

Foregoing is copy of what I had the honor of writing you 23 November by way of Cadiz, since when we have not had an occurrence in this Country, meriting to trouble you with a letter upon.

Since the begining of the year we have lived in daily dread of seeing the Plague break out with violence in Tangier, as there has been from time to time some few people taken off suddenly by violent Fevers, . . . A similar disorder has also of late visited Tetuan and Arzilla tho in no violent degree, but in different villages in this Northern-most part of the Country, the mortality has been, and continues to be, considerable. Under these circumstances I have found it necessary to remain here during the winter with my Family, and had only communication with Town, as the duties of my office on other matters rendered necessary, for the small House I have there can afford no shelter in time of Sickness. Since my return from Spain there has not any American vessel anchored in this Port. The Emperor in December last signified to the Consuls, his intention of not permitting any Vessel to Trade under his Flag, but we find that regulation has not yet taken place at any other but this Port; we have just written His Majesty and requested his final Determination on the Point, as the first of May was the time proposed he should continue his protection up to, for accommodation of those Merchants who might have freighted Vessels under his Colours.

I lately heard with heart felt concern of the Death of General Washington, his Public and private Virtues must immortalize his Name. I hope I may be honoured with a letter from you, in the mean time beg to subscribe myself with the highest Respect.

JAMES SIMPSON.

The Secretary of State of the United States of America.

PALESTINE

N THE fertile Plain of Esdraelon, stretching from Mount Carmel-by-the-Sea to Mt. Gilboa, where the oracles of Israel prophesied, where kings and judges ruled, where Judaism waxed old and where Christianity was born, Jewish pioneers as if in fulfilment of ancient prophecy are gathering again to lay the foundation for a "New Jerusalem." On this sacred soil will rise a George Washington forest of eucalyptus and pine trees—a straight-growing tribute of American Jews and non-Jews to the Great American.

Such was the momentous announcement made in Jerusalem, Palestine, on the Two Hundredth Anniversary of George Washington's birth.

The day was fittingly observed in the Holy City by what was termed in THE PALESTINE BULLETIN of February 23, 1932, "one of the largest consular functions ever seen in Jerusalem." According to Hon. Paul Knabenshue, American Consul General in Jerusalem, the function "was attended by approximately three hundred people, including the leading government officials of Palestine, the judiciary, representatives of all public bodies and the heads of churches of all denominations." The reception began at five o'clock in the afternoon and to quote again THE PALESTINE BULLETIN "from beginning to end the cordiality remained unflagging." On the tongue and in the heart of every guest was the illustrious name of Washington, and the felicitations expressed by the non-Americans to General Consul Knabenshue to be conveyed to his Government were among the most sincere accorded anywhere during the Bicentennial celebration.

A SIGNIFICANT MEMORIAL

The-George-Washington-forest-in-Palestine plan had its origin in the United States. Responding to the spirit of the congressional resolution setting apart 1932 as a George Washington year and heeding the summons of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, the Jewish National Fund of America conceived this noble means of honoring George Washington. There is evidence that the proposal met with immediate and universal approval and enthusiasm. Zionists and non-Zionists, Jew and non-Jew concurred in the extraordinary timeliness of the proposal. As stated in a pamphlet issued by the Jewish National Fund of America, "they immediately recognized the beauty underlying the thought and visualized the transcendent significance of a memorial that would forever link the name of America's first and foremost national hero with the ancient land of Israel and with the soil, sacred to all, now giving forth new growth and new life."

The plan at its outset called for the planting of approximately five hundred thousand eucalyptus and pine trees—"not a monument of marble nor a statue of stone; not a figure of copper or bronze nor a eulogium on perishable parchment, but an evergreen memorial of a growing forest" in the Holy Land, alive with the sacred memories and the eternal life of the historic sites, where, in the phrase of the Old Testament all vegetation "blossoms as a rose."

The plan gathered momentum at a conference of notable leaders and educators convoked by the National Jewish Fund of America, presided over by Nelson Ruttenberg, President of the Fund. This meeting took place at the Pennsylvania Hotel in New York City on Washington's birthday in 1932, and was attended by several thousand persons. Judge Julian W. Mack, Chairman of the Zionist Organization of America; Mr. Grover Whalen, Chairman of the City of New York George Washington Bicentennial Committee; Rabbi Israel Gold-

EXPRESSIONS OF PROMINENT AMERICANS

According to printed reports in THE JEWISH LEDGER of Rochester, N. Y., "the audience was moved to a high pitch of enthusiasm for the Washington Forest plan by the enthusiastic expressions of opinion contained in messages from President Herbert Hoover, leading American statesmen, clergymen and outstanding citizens." The pertinent parts of some of these messages were as follows:

I thank you cordially for bringing to my attention the purpose of American Jews, under the auspices of the Jewish National Fund, to plant a forest of pines and eucalyptus trees in Palestine as a living memorial to George Washington. I am deeply interested in all proposals to honor the memory of our first President during this bicentennial year.

HERBERT HOOVER.

The plan you have in vogue to make this memorial a living thing through planting, whereby a growing forest will forever be a reminder of the life-giving principles of liberty and self-government inaugurated by the founder of the Republic, is most commendable. I commend you in the highest terms, not only for the leadership in giving recognition to the service of our first President, but especially for the living memorial to be established in the cradle of modern civilization.

SIMEON D. FESS,

Vice Chairman of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission.

I think your plan for a Washington memorial in Palestine a splendid and worthy undertaking.

ROBERT F. WAGNER.

Native pines and Australian eucalypti planted by American Jews in the Holy Land as a memorial to George Washington—a picture of the world-wide association of his name with the God-given trees that he loved placed in a restored Zion by its children, prosperous and honored in the nation he founded. No memorial is more appropriate.

SOL BLOOM,

Director of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission.

How well I remember my trip up that coast through the region north of Tel-Aviv, when I saw those rolling headlands and far valleys stretching inward, all denuded of the ancient growth of tree and shrub. A Washington Forest here would be a thing of beauty and joy forever. But the particular site is not important! The great thing is the idea for the happy fulfilment of which Jew and Gentile, all lovers of the dream of Zion, should join hands and hearts. Your proposal is altogether the most inspiring thing which I have encountered in connection with the Bicentennial celebration of the birth of George Washington. I hope that it may be carried through to great and speedy success.

REV. JOHN HAYNES HOLMES, Community Church, New York.

This plan to plant a Washington Forest as a perpetual memorial to our great President is an excellent one, and I sincerely hope it may be carried through.

REV. S. PARKES CADMAN,
Federal Council of Churches, New York.

Messages were also received from abroad lauding the project:

Heartily welcome decision of American Jews to pay tribute to the memory of Washington by planting in Palestine a forest bearing his name. Forestation of its hills is one of the most vital needs of Palestine, as I can bear witness from my tours in the country. Plantation of another forest will prove of real benefit to the people of this generation and future.

GENERAL ARTHUR WAUCHOPE,
British High Commissioner for Palestine.

Welcome decision to plant forest in honor of George Washington, liberator of America. Location of forest in Emek Hills, vicinity of wood honoring Masaryk, liberator of Czecho-Slovakia, and forest honoring Balfour, who proclaimed liberation of Israel.

MENACHEM USSISHKIN,
World President of the Jewish National Fund, Jerusalem.

A Washington Forest in Erez Israel, the finest symbol of people's love of freedom and best tribute American Jewry can pay his memory.

THE WORLD ZIONIST EXECUTIVE, London.

Impossible to imagine more striking noble monument by American Jewry than Washington Forest in Jewish National Home.

EMANUEL NEUMANN,
American Member of the World Zionist Executive.

In his address before the assembled notables, Rabbi Goldstein averred that the Washington Forest in Palestine would also serve as a token of America's sanction of approval upon the development of a Jewish homeland in Palestine. No nation has been a greater friend of that ideal than America. Countless monuments in marble have been erected in memory of Washington. Stone, however, is inanimate. In time, it often wears out and even becomes corroded by the elements. A forest, however, is a living memorial which, as the years go on, grows ever more abundant and more beautiful. Many Jews in other countries will thus honor the name of Washington. Surely there is no more fitting tribute that American Jews can render to honor the memory of the Father of his Country.

A LASTING TRIBUTE TO GEORGE WASHINGTON

Following the speech-making, this resolution was adopted at the meeting:

WHEREAS the President of the United States of America has issued the following proclamation:

"The happy opportunity has come to our generation to demonstrate our gratitude and our obligation to George Washington by fitting celebration of the 200th anniversary of his birth.

"To contemplate his unselfish devotion to duty, his courage, his patience, his genius, his statesmanship, and his accomplishments for his country and the world, refreshes the spirit, the wisdom, and the patriotism of our people.

"Therefore, I, Herbert Hoover, President of the United States of America, acting in accord with the purposes of the Congress, do invite all our people to organize themselves through every community and every association to do honor to the memory of Washington during the period from February 22 to Thanksgiving Day."

WHEREAS the lofty principles of equality, liberty, and freedom proclaimed by the founders of the United States under the leadership of George Washington have inaugurated the new era of civic freedom and religious liberty, thus giving an unprecedented example and inspiring ideal to the world;

WHEREAS throughout the history of the United States runs a thread of American sympathy, interest, and deep understanding for a restored Zion;

WHEREAS the planting of a Washington Forest in Palestine, the land sacred and dear to all mankind, will constitute a living and evergreen memorial to the memory of the first President of the United States, and will be of great and everlasting benefit to the land.

WHEREAS the Jewish National Fund, which is the agency of the Jewish people for the reclamation and afforestation of Palestine, has proposed a plan for the planting of a forest of pine and eucalyptus trees to bear the name of George Washington on an historic site in Palestine which is held in perpetual trust as the property of the Jewish people;

Therefore, Be It Resolved, That this conference expresses its heartiest and most enthusiastic approval of this plan;

Be It Further Resolved, That this conference invites Americans of all faiths, and in particular American Jews and Zionists, to pay their tribute to George Washington on the occasion of the Bicentennial Anniversary of his birth by planting trees in the Washington Forest in Palestine.

Typical of the commentaries on the project is the following editorial from the JEWISH MORNING JOURNAL, New York, of February 24, 1932:

The decision to plant in Palestine a forest bearing the name of George Washington will, we hope, be carried out sooner and with more enthusiasm than most of the enterprises which we undertake. The association of the name of the founder of this Republic with the upbuilding work in the ancient and sacred land possesses the power of the broadest appeal imaginable. Jews of all classes and of all shades of opinion should be ready to support such a plan and Christian participation may give the enterprise, and, later on, to the forest itself, an international character.

The commemoration of Washington's birthday was not ended this year with the holiday last Monday. This was but the beginning of a series of ceremonies, gatherings, and undertakings and of various forms of memorials which will be held for a longer time, almost up to the end of the year. This is sufficient time to carry out the plan for planting several hundred thousand trees, even half a million trees, in one single effort which should not be delayed or protracted too long.

The example of an enterprise carried to success in a short time would give courage to think of other things with more and greater hope.

Not counting those Jews for whom it is now difficult to give even the smallest contribution, there should be in this country but very few Jews who decline to participate in such an enterprise which links the United States of America and Palestine in such a practical and at the same time idealistic manner. The broadened field will also not fail in winning new sympathizers for the other activities in Palestine and in securing more support for the strengthening of the work which is now being carried on and which is planned for the future in Palestine. The year 1932, as a "time to plant," is a fitting period for the Jews of both countries. It should serve to strengthen the hopes Palestine is placing on America.

ONE MILLION TREES PLANTED

Machinery for furthering the plan was set in motion immediately following the meeting under the auspices of the Jewish National Fund of America. As an inducement for the planting of trees in the Washington Forest, this organization issued certificates to those who were responsible, through contributions, for the planting of one, five, or one hundred trees. Names of the donors were also en-

The George Washington Forest is a continuation of a great afforestation project to bring Palestine into its heralded glory. More than one million trees have already been planted by the Jewish Fund on its possessions in Palestine. During the past two years a forest has been planted on the Plain of Esdraelon honoring the memory of Arthur James Lord Balfour, famous British statesman, whose name is associated with the declaration of November 2, 1917, in which the British Government pledged "its best endeavors" for felicitating the establishment of the Jewish National Home. A wood bearing the name of Thomas Massaryk, liberator and President of Czechoslovakia, is also planted in the vicinity. And the Jews and non-Jews of France are now planning a forest in the name of Aristide Briand, Europe's "Apostle of Peace."

STATUS OF PROJECT

At the time this report was prepared, according to information supplied to the United States George rolled by the American Tree Association, which records contain names of many prominent people who planted trees in honor of George Washington during the Bicentennial Year throughout the world.

Franklin D. Roosevelt

Under the scheme devised by the organization, trees may be planted in the Washington Forest in Palestine in the name of any great man, but the forest as a whole is to be dedicated to Washington. Information has been conveyed to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission that one hundred trees are to be planted in this forest in honor of President Franklin D. Roosevelt. Upon hearing of the contemplated tree plantings in his honor, the President wrote to the Jewish National Fund of America: "Some day I want to see that tree in person—I have never yet been to Palestine and hope to go."

Washington Bicentennial Commission in a letter from the Jewish National Fund of America, the status of the George Washington Forest in Palestine was as follows:

Site Designated.—The George Washington Forest is to be planted in Palestine on land belonging to Keren Kayemeth Lelsrael, which is the parent organization of the Jewish National Fund of America, and is the agency of the Jewish people for the acquisition and perpetual ownership of the land acquired. You will recall that before the project was announced in this country, we had obtained the consent of the Jerusalem organization to set aside a special area for afforestation work in the name of George Washington. We have recently been informed that our Jerusalem headquarters have set aside for the planting of the Washington trees an area of approximately 8,000 dunams (200 acres) on the historic site between Haifa, Palestine's future port-city, and Nazareth, in the vicinity where the Jewish National Fund has recently completed the planting of a forest in memory of Arthur James Lord Balfour, the late British Statesman, whose name is indelibly linked with the famous Balfour Declaration. The area is the property of the Jewish National Fund and begins South of the excellent Haifa-Nazareth road, a pathway extensively travelled by the numerous tourists to the Holy Land, as well as by the residents of the country.

The Forestry Department of the Jewish National Fund of Jerusalem has informed the Forestry Department of the Palestine Government that the types of trees most suitable for this area have been found to be: Pinus Halepensis, Ailanthus, Azedarah, and Accacia.

Number of Trees To Be Planted.—It is difficult at this juncture to predict the number of trees which will comprise the Washington Forest in Palestine. Unfortunately our appeal for contributions for the realization of this patriotic project had to be made during a time of the most severe economic depression, and in many instances the steps necessary for the raising of the appropriate contributions had to be postponed.

Still I am glad to be able to report to you that up to date we are in receipt of the amount of $6,226.44, representing contributions towards the Washington Forest Fund, which will make possible the planting of (at a price of $1.50 per tree) 4,125 trees. In addition, we are in receipt of unspecified contributions for the planting of trees in the amount of $2,500, making possible the planting of 1,670 trees, which will also be planted in the Washington Forest. The initial amount for the Washington trees has already been transmitted by us to our Jerusalem headquarters with the direction to carry out the planting of the Washington trees during the next planting season in Palestine. In addition, there are a number of communities where functions for the Washington Trees Fund will be held in the near future, and the proceeds thereof will be applied for this purpose.

Palestine, as you know, is badly in need of reforestation work. The planting of trees is therefore an important and integral part of our rehabilitation work in the country. It is our plan to present the appeal for the planting of additional trees in the Washington Forest annually during the month preceding Washington's Birthday and on other suitable occasions until the great Washington Forest in Palestine is completed. This procedure had been followed by us for a number of years in the planting of the forests in the names of Theodor Herzl, the founder and first leader of the Zionist Movement; Lord Balfour; President Massaryk of Czechoslovakia; and King Peter of Serbia. Up to date the Jewish National Fund has caused 1,300,000 trees to be planted on its land holdings.

PLAN STIRS INSPIRATION

As stated in a pamphlet issued by the sponsors of the forest plan: "There is poetic beauty and historic justice in the proposal for the planting of a George Washington Forest in Palestine. The ideals and principles for which George Washington fought and through which he succeeded in freeing a continent and in establishing a nation, had their roots in the soil of that land which had been the cradle of faith and the birthplace of justice. 'Hebrew mortar cemented the foundations of the American Democracy,' the historian says."

Perhaps David, "sweet singer of Judea," had in mind men like Washington when he recorded in Psalms 1:3, "and he shall be like a tree planted by streams of water." A modern-day poet, Philip M. Raskin, has also been touched by the inspiration of this great project and from his pen has come the following poem:

THE WASHINGTON FOREST

Father of this great Republic,
Whose name the gifts of heart adorn;
Take the gift of an ancient people
That never died, yet is reborn.

Fearless of Fate, and faithful of Freedom
You welded a race and gave it breath;
Take the gift of an ancient people
Whose road to life was paved with death.

You sang to Freedom in its cradle,
Made Liberty a Nation's pride;
Israel's prophets—your inspiration,
His Book of Life—your friend and guide.

We plant a Forest in your honor,
To deck the hallowed hills and plains
Where Freedom's clarion call was sounded,
To break the yoke of man-made chains.

We plant a forest in our birthland
To greet two centuries of your birth;
A tribute from a time-proof nation
To the youngest one on earth.

Father of this great Republic,
Whose name the gifts of heart adorn
Take the gift of a tree-like people
That never died, yet is reborn.

SYRIA

T HAS been the annual custom of the American Community in and around Beirut, Syria, to make a pilgrimage to the American Consulate on Washington's birthday and there be received by the Consul General and his corps.

The 1932 reception was, in view of the Bicentennial, according to Hon. Christian T. Steger, American Consul, "a particularly large affair. Invitations were extended to the officials of the Lebanese Government and the French High Commission, as well as to official representatives of many other countries. There were about 250 present and more than 20 nationalities were represented. The receiving hours were from 5 p. m. until 10 p. m. At 8 o'clock a buffet supper was served. An orchestra provided concert and dance music during the entire evening and a number of bridge tables were in constant use. After the observance of the early formalities, the evening developed into a delightful social affair and most of the guests remained until after midnight."

FLAGS OF AMERICAN LIBERTY

ON THE FOLLOWING TWO PAGES IS SHOWN A COLORED CHART OF THE "FLAGS OF AMERICAN LIBERTY." THIS CHART ILLUSTRATES LOCAL FLAGS, PINE TREE FLAGS, RATTLESNAKE FLAGS, AND REGIMENTAL AND OTHER BATTLE FLAGS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION; ALSO VARIOUS STAGES (MORE OR LESS TRADITIONAL) IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE NATIONAL ENSIGN.

ORIGIN OF THE STARS AND STRIPES

HE colonies which became the United States had as British dependencies the flag of that nation as their official emblem. Until the Scottish Union that emblem was red with a red cross of St. George on a white field as the canton. After 1707 the white cross of St. Andrew on a blue field for Scotland was imposed. At the beginning of the French and Indian War colonial newspapers showed the device of a severed snake, each section bearing the initials of a colony and labeled "Join or Die." Also in still earlier times Massachusetts had, without authority, issued coins that bore a pine (or fir) tree on them. These two symbols were undoubtedly influential on the form which the flags of the revolting colonies took when the trouble with the Mother Country began. The rattlesnake flags of several varieties came into use in the more southern colonies and the tree flag in New England, and finally the idea of union brought these devices together. There were various other local colors, some of which are shown on the chart.

The American Revolution was a naval war as well as a land conflict; the necessity of fighting and prize-taking vessels was soon evident, and as the contest had, under the control of the Continental Congress, become a unified one, a demand for a common flag on the seas appeared. The origin of the flag which resulted from this demand is unknown, however. We know that on January 1, 1776, the Union or Continental Flag was hoisted by the army under George Washington which was besieging the British at Boston, but this was evidently to mark the organization of the new Continental Army. There is nothing to show that this or the later Stars and Stripes was ever used as an official flag by the land forces during the American Revolution; though both were flown at sea. This first Union Flag was the old British one with six white stripes imposed on the red field, signifying both the Thirteen United Colonies and the loyalty to the British Crown which they still professed. After the Declaration of Independence the flag was altered to testify this fact; Congress on June 14, 1777, resolving that the canton or union should be thirteen white stars on a blue field, while the stripes remained as before. This was the first Stars and Stripes. The arrangement of the stars was not fixed and probably various forms of the canton appeared. By 1792 the number of states had been increased to 15 and by an act of Congress in 1794 the flag was altered to fifteen stripes and fifteen stars. With the rapid increase of states after that, this revised emblem lost its significance, and in 1818 it was enacted that while the stripes should be restored to thirteen to symbolize the original states, the union should show a star for each state—now forty-eight.

UNION OF CONTINENTAL FLAG
 Hoisted by the Continental Congress at the siege of Boston. Origin and authorship unknown. But designed primarily for naval use.

PINE TREE FLAGS OF AMERICAN REVOLUTION

BUNKER HILL FLAG

Pine (fir) tree flag, also with a red field. A second form, with cross of St. George eliminated.

PINE TREE FLAG

A second form, with cross of St. George eliminated.

 Another form used on early ships, especially South Carolina state vessels.

WESTMORELAND BATTALION FLAG
 Ensign of a Pennsylvania battalion raised in Westmoreland County by John Proctor in 1775.

FIRST STARS AND STRIPES
 There was no official land flag during the Revolution; the circle of stars is the traditional form.

GEORGE WASHINGTON HORSE
 Flag of Washington's court (part way to Continental Congress, 1775).

AN APPEAL TO HEAVEN
 Used by Washington's fleet (1775) and Massachusetts.

LIBERTY TREE
 A popular form, originating from the liberty (elm) tree in Boston.

AMERICAN FLAG OF TODAY

(This flag was formally adopted by Act of Congress, April 9, 1818)

THE STORY OF THE STARS AND STRIPES

EXCERPTS FROM AN HISTORIC ADDRESS BY HONORABLE SOL BLOOM, BROADCAST JUNE 17, 1931, FROM THE BETSY ROSS HOUSE, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

"Wherever this Flag flies today, those who gaze upon its protecting folds must realize that in its creation there was brought into being not only a new constellation of states, but a new principle of government. Your Flag and My Flag which George Washington won for us, is the first bright banner of unstained honor to float over a people destined for a vast new Liberty. Upon all the glorious pages of our National History, that Flag has never been dishonored, nor has it ever been lowered to the enemies of our land. In the history of our Country Almighty God has been at the helm. In the beauty, the dignity, and the significance of Our Flag as it flies over you and me today, there is the guiding hand of that Protecting Providence which has willed that all should be well with this homeland."

REGIMENTAL AND OTHER BATTLE FLAGS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

AMERICAN NAVY JACK
 One form used in early navy.

GADSDEN FLAG
 So called because Christopher Gadsden presented such a flag to the South Carolina Provincial Congress. Commodore Esch Hopkins' broad pennant, hoisted by Trust John Paul Jones on the "Alfred" early in 1776, was probably like this.

BEDFORD FLAG
 Standard of Minute Men at Concord; meaning "Conquer or Die."

AN APPEAL TO GOD
 This form brought together pine tree design of New England and more southern rattlesnake emblem.

LINKED HAND FLAG
 Thirteen mailed hands grasping thirteen links of an endless chain. Exhibited at the Centennial as a Newburyport, Mass., flag.

CULPEPPER MINUTE MEN FLAG
 Motto taken from famous speech of Patrick Henry, March 23, 1775—"Give me liberty or give me death."

FORT MOULTRIE FLAG
 First American flag of the South, sometimes without the word "Liberty". The emblem Sgt. Jasper nailed to the staff June 28, 1776.

JOHN PAUL JONES' STARRY FLAG
 The flag of the "Bon Homme Richard"; probably originally had a thirteenth star.

BENSINGTON FLAG
 Associated with victory at Battle of Bensington August 16, 1777 under General John Stark.

FIRST NAVY STARS AND STRIPES
 In absence of specific arrangement of stars in the resolution of Congress, June 14, 1777, it is probable that in the naval flag the stars were in the form of the crosses of St. George and St. Andrew.

BUCKS OF AMERICA
 Flag of a post-revolutionary colored company of Boston, initiated J. G. W. H. for Hancock and Washington.

NEW YORK REGIMENT FLAG
 Originally of Col. Gansevoort's Regiment, of Fort Stanwix fame. Flag also at siege of Yorktown, 1781.

THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER
 Flag that inspired immortal lines of poem of Francis Scott Key; Emblem of our National Anthem, fifteen stars and fifteen stripes, ordered by act of January 13, 1794.

CONNECTICUT FLAG
 Color differed with the regiment. One of the first regimental flags; almost identical with the state flag of today.

TAUNTON FLAG
 Hoisted at Taunton, Mass. 1774. British union with American watchwords—"Liberty and Union."

FLAG OF FRANCE
 Adopted 1794. It was the white standard of the Bourbons that was carried by Rochambeau and De Grasse.

PULASKI STANDARD
 Made by Moravian Sisters, Bethlehem, Pa., for Count Pulaski's corps.

FLAG OF THE THIRD MARYLAND
 Carried at Cowpens, January 5, 1781.

RHODE ISLAND FLAG
 Carried at Trenton, Brandywine, and Yorktown as regimental standard of Rhode Island troops. Originally without canton; date of addition uncertain.

WEBB'S REGIMENT
 Probably a guidon of several Connecticut regiments.

SECOND NEW HAMPSHIRE REGIMENT FLAG
 These two flags carried by one regiment were captured at Fort Anne by the British; probably the only captured flags of the American Revolution now in existence.

WHITE PLAINS
 Apocryphal battle flag from contemporary English engraving.

GATINOIS REGIMENT
 After Yorktown known as "Royal Auvergne."

SAINTOGNE REGIMENT
 A standard of Rochambeau's army sent by France to uphold American liberty.

ROYAL DEUX PONTS
 Flag of courage and loyalty carried at Siege of Yorktown.

FIRST PENN.
 Thompson's riflemen, later First Penn. Regiment.

TALLMADGE'S DRAGOONS
 Carried at Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth.

HANOVER FLAG
 Adopted by the Hanover Township (now in Dauphin County, Pa.) Riflemen; probably in 1775.

EUTAW STANDARD
 Flag of Col. William Washington's Cavalry at Cowpens and Eutaw Springs.

MERCHANT AND PRIVATEER ENSIGN
 Probably one of the origins of the Union Flag. Striped flags were common on the seas before the American Revolution.

Official portrait of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission

Important Note

The United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission is fortunate in being able to include in this volume not only the detailed reports of foreign participation, but also a careful selection of certain other material from the Literature Series of its publications, which should be especially valuable to libraries and students in foreign countries. It is with regret that the Commission is not able to include more of its historical material, but lack of space makes this impossible. "Honor to George Washington" pamphlets, "The Highlights of the Writings of George Washington," and several additional features are of special importance to the more casual readers of other lands.

We believe that in making this careful selection of material we are enabled to present essential facts necessary to a general understanding of George Washington's life, character and achievements. If the student desires to make a more detailed study of the subject, he will find abundant bibliography for his guidance.

GEORGE WASHINGTON
By Charles Willson Peale

The "Virginia Colonel" portrait, painted at Mount Vernon in 1772, when Washington was 40 years of age. The original hangs in the Lee Memorial Chapel of Washington and Lee University at Lexington, Va.

A FRONTIERSMAN BY NATURE

THAT George Washington became the foremost figure in the colony of Virginia and afterwards in the United States of America was not due to chance or to the favor of powerful men or to wealthy marriage. The rise of Washington to responsibility, to fame, and to leadership was the outcome of conditions in the colony of his birth and growth which gave opportunity to a young man of character and ability. If Washington had been born in Massachusetts he would have made a fortune in shipbuilding and foreign commerce and trade which gave the largest opportunities in that colony. Had he been a Pennsylvanian he would have been one of the spirited group which included Franklin and Reed and Morris in developing a commercial community. As a descendant of three generations of planters on Virginia soil he accepted the conditions of his time and place. Only it was in him from youth upward to make the best of those conditions, to improve them and to aid in creating more permanent and prosperous conditions for the colonies.

In many respects young Washington was a backwoodsman of the same type as the eager spirits from the coast colonies who were pushing out into central New York and the mountain regions of Pennsylvania, Maryland and the Carolinas. Most of those regions he visited in the course of his life. He invested a good part of his fortune in western lands, then far beyond settlement. He was a frontiersman but at the same time he foresaw the growth of mining and manufacturing and transportation which were to make those frontier regions, then peopled only by scattered Indian tribes, equal in wealth and prosperity to the seacoast states. From the beginning of his active life to his last days, the mind of Washington was bent on bringing his state of Virginia and all the western region into populous, prosperous, and enduring communities. A frontiersman by descent and education, he was always pushing to raise the community in which he lived into a stable social and economic situation. To understand Washington therefore, it is necessary to know accurately how frontiersmen from 1732 to the end of the Revolution lived and worked and associated with their fellow men.

FRONTIER LAND SYSTEM

Twenty years before Washington's birth, there came to Virginia the first governor of the colony who interested himself in the development of the frontier. Governor Alexander Spotswood was an energetic, far-sighted man who set himself to the task of bringing in a class of active immigrants and developing the resources of the back country. Much of the colony even in the tide-water region was still undeveloped. The rivers were the natural highways and a large part of the population lived on or close to those rivers, particularly the wealthy land owners and slave owners who were the political, social, and economic leaders of the colony. The main crop was tobacco which speedily exhausted the land and made it necessary to clear new areas. It was difficult for men without money in hand to buy land and the middle class farmers were always at a disadvantage. The region between the tide-water heads of the rivers and the mountains contained few settlers. Even the Valley of Virginia between the Blue Ridge and the Alleghenies, the garden spot of Virginia, was still unsettled.

SPOTSWOOD'S EXPEDITION (1716)

Though the Valley previously had been entered from the north, Governor Spotswood's company of gallant gentlemen in 1716 was the first organized one to surmount the Blue Ridge, at Swift Run Gap, and to reach the South Shenandoah River. One of the members of the party, John Fontaine, kept a journal of the expedition which called itself "Knights of the Golden Horse-shoe":

"5th [of September]—A fair day. At nine we were mounted; we were obliged to have axe-men to clear the way in some places. We followed the windings of the James River, observing that it came from the very top of the mountains. We killed two rattlesnakes during our ascent. In some places it was very steep, in others, it was so that we could ride up. About one of the clock we got to the top of the mountain; about four miles and a half, and we came to the very head spring of James River, where it runs no bigger than a man's arm, from under a large stone. We drank King George's health, and all the Royal Family's, at the very top of the Appalachian mountains. About a musket-shot from the spring there is another, which rises and runs down on the other side; it goes westward, and we thought we could go down that way, but we met with such prodigious precipices, that we were obliged to return to the top again. We found some trees which had been formerly marked, I suppose, by the Northern Indians, and following these trees, we found a good, safe descent. Several of the company were for returning; but the Governor persuaded them to continue on. About five, we were down on the other side, and continued our way for about seven miles further, until we came to a large river, by the side of which we encamped. . . . 6th.—We crossed the river, which we called Euphrates. . . . We drank some healths on the other side, and returned; . . . We had a good dinner, and after it we got the men together, and loaded all their arms, and we drank the King's health in Champagne, and fired a volley—the Princess's health, in Burgundy, and fired a volley, and all the rest of the Royal Family in claret, and a volley. We drank the Governor's health and fired another volley. We had several sorts of liquors, viz., Virginia red wine and white wine, Irish usquebaugh, brandy, shrub, two sorts of rum, champagne, canary, cherry, punch, water, cider, &c. . . . 7th.—At seven in the morning we mounted our horses, and parted with the rangers, who were to go farther on, and we returned homewards; . . ."

FRONTIER ROUTES

The Washington estates when George Washington was a boy were all on or near the tide rivers, but at the time of Washington's birth the population was pushing out to the frontiers of the Carolinas, Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania; and Governor Spotswood had still another idea in his mind with which Washington was later to be concerned. Spotswood said that "The Chief Aim of my Expedition over the great Mountains in 1716, was to satisfy my Self whether it was practicable to come at the Lakes," in order to trade with the Indians and check the French advance in the Mississippi Valley. However, the more immediate result was the settlement of the Shenandoah Valley. Non-English settlers came to Pennsylvania from the beginning; they were encouraged by the proprietary, and were soon found in the region west of the Susquehanna. Thence through York, Cumberland, and Adams counties to the Maryland line following an Indian trail, later developed into the Monocacy Road, the pioneers came into Maryland about 1729. The route crossed the Ridge by Crampton's Gap, in the region later made famous by the Antietam campaign, and then across the Potomac by a ford above present Harper's Ferry. Though there may have been earlier attempts, the first permanent settlement of the Valley began in 1727.

THE PENNSYLVANIA DUTCH

That portion of the Valley drained by the Shenandoah, the part with which Washington was first acquainted and where his own lands were, was settled mostly by Germans. Benjamin Rush in 1789 noted the special characteristic of these "Pennsylvania Dutch," and it is interesting to trace in them possible influences upon Washington's own traits as a scientific farmer, as described in another pamphlet in this series.

"In settling a tract of land, they always provide large and suitable accommodations for their horses and cattle, before they lay out much money in building a house for themselves. The barn and stables are generally under one roof, and contrived in such manner as to enable them to feed their horses and cattle, and to remove their dung, with as little trouble as possible. The first dwelling house upon this farm is small, and built of logs. It generally lasts the life time of the first settler of a tract of land; and hence they have a saying that 'a son should always begin his improvements where his father left off'—that is, by building a large and convenient stone house.

"They always prefer good land or that land on which there is a large quantity of meadow ground. From an attention to the cultivation of grass, they often double the value of an old farm in a few years, and grow rich on farms, on which their predecessors of whom they purchased them, have nearly starved. They prefer purchasing farms with some improvements to settling a new tract of land.

"From the history that has been given to the German agriculture, it will hardly be necessary to add that a German farm may be distinguished from the farms of the other citizens of the state, by the superior size of their barns; the plain, but compact form of their houses; the height of their inclosures; the extent of their orchards; the fertility of their fields; the luxuriance of their meadows, and a general appearance of plenty and neatness in everything that belongs to them."

FOREST LANDS

The insistence on good land usually meant rich forest growth, likely to be a limestone area, but also meadowland. Washington in various places in his Diaries estimates the probable value of land much on this basis. For instance: "March 13 [1748] Rode to his Lordships Quarter about 4 Miles higher up y. River we went through most beautiful Groves of Sugar Trees and spent ye. best part of y. Day in admiring ye. Trees and richness of ye Land." October 13, 1770: "The Lands we travelld over today till we had crossd the Laurel Hill (except in small spots) was very mountainous and indifferent, but when we came down the Hill to the Plantation of Mr. Thos. Gist, the Ld. appeard charming; that which lay level being as rich and black as any thing could possibly be; the more Hilly kind, tho of a different complexion must be good, as well from the Crops it produces, as from the beautiful white Oaks that grows thereon, the white Oak in generl. indicates poor Land, yet this does not appear to be of that cold kind." October 15: "The Lands which I passed over to day were generally Hilly, and the growth chiefly white Oak, but very good notwithstanding; and what is extraordinary, and contrary to the property of all other Lands I ever saw before, the Hills are the richest Land; and the Soil upon the Sides and Summits of them, being as black as Coal and the Growth, Walnut, Cherry, Spice Bushes, etca." October 30: "A Mile or two below this we Landed, and after getting a little distance from the River we came (without any rising) to a pretty lively kind of Land grown up with Hicky. and oaks of different kinds, intermixed with Walnut, etca. here and there." November 5: "This is a good Neck of Land the Soil being generally good; and in places very rich. Their is a large proportion of Meadow Ground, and the Land as high, dry and Level as one coud wish. The growth in most places is beach intermixed with walnut, etca., but more especially with Poplar (of which there are numbers very large). The Land towards the upper end is black oak, and very good; upon the whole a valuable Tract might be had here, . . ." September 8, 1784: "I . . . recrossed . . . to a tract of mine on the Virginia side which I find exceedingly Rich, and must be very valuable—the lower end of the Land is rich white oak in place springey; and in the winter wet.—the upper part is exceedingly rich and covered with Walnut of considerable size many of them."

THE SCOTCH-IRISH

Mixed with these Germans were some Scotch-Irish, but for the most part the latter continued on to the upper part of the Shenandoah and over the watershed to the southern slope of the Valley. For this there is a probable reason in the character of the people. Logan, Penn's agent, in 1724 wrote of the Scotch-Irish as "bold and indigent strangers, saying as their excuse, when challenged for titles, that we had solicited for colonists and they had come accordingly." Again, in 1727: "They say the Proprietor invited people to come and settle his country; they came for that end, and must live. Both they and the Palatines pretend that they will buy, but not one in twenty has anything to pay with. The Irish settle generally toward the Maryland line, where no lands can honestly be sold till the dispute with Lord Baltimore is decided." In 1730 Logan wrote that the Irish alleged that "it was against the laws of God and nature, that so much land should be idle while so many Christians wanted it to labor on and raise their bread." The Germans, while many of them were originally squatters in the Valley, would pay for the land if the alternative was to move on. They were, in other words, permanent settlers by instinct. With the Scotch-Irish the reverse was true: they were in the van of the pioneers not only because of their adventurous spirit, but because of their unwillingness to acknowledge the rights of the holders of great grants.

Washington himself had an experience with such adventurers. They had squatted on land he claimed in southwestern Pennsylvania, and after he had ineffectually endeavored personally to compromise with them in 1784 he went to law and ousted them. September 14, 1784: "This day also the People who lives on my land on Millers Run came here to set forth their pretensions to it; and to enquire into my Right—after much conversation and attempts in them to discover all the flaws they could in my Deed &c.—and to establish a fair and upright intention in themselves—and after much counselling which proceeded from a division of opinion among themselves—they resolved (as all who lived on the land were not here) to give me their definite determination when I should come to the land, which I told them would probably happen on Friday or Saturday next." September 19: "Being Sunday, and the People living on my Land, apparently very religious, it was thought best to postpone going among them until tomorrow." September 20: "Dined at David Reeds, after which Mr. James Scot and Squire Reed began to enquire whether I would part with the Land, and upon what terms; adding, that tho' they did not conceive they could be dispossessed, yet to avoid contention, they would buy, if my terms were Moderate. I told them I had no inclination to sell; however, after hearing a great deal of their hardships, their Religious principles (which had brought them together as a Society of Cedders) and unwillingness to separate or remove; I told them I would make them a last offer . . . they then determined to stand suit for the Land; . . ." September 22: "I set out for Beason Town, in order to meet with, and engage Mr. Thomas Smith to bring ejectments, and to prosecute my Suit for the Land in Washington County, on which those, whose names are herein inserted, are settled."

MIXED FRONTIER ELEMENTS

These Scotch-Irish were not the only border settlers; there was a mingling of Germans, English, Scots, some Huguenots, and even a few Catholic-Irish, Hollanders, and Swedes. Of this mixture Roosevelt has written: "A single operation, passed under the hard conditions of life in the wilderness, was enough to weld together into one people the representatives of these numerous and widely different races; and the children of the next generation became indistinguishable from one another. . . . Their grim, harsh, narrow lives were yet strangely fascinating and full of adventurous toil and danger; none but natures as strong, as freedom-loving, and as full of bold defiance as theirs could have endured existence on the terms which these men found pleasurable. Their iron surroundings made a mould which turned out all alike in the same shape. They resembled one another, and they differed from the rest of the world—even the world of America, and infinitely more, the world of Europe—in dress, in customs, and in mode of life."

HARDSHIPS OF WASHINGTON'S EXPEDITIONS

Washington's frontier relations, in both peace and war, had a large influence upon his development and policies. His experiences with the Indians in the warfare with the French, and his interest in western development, are treated in other articles of these pamphlets; here the purpose is to give some idea of the character and life of these frontiersmen with whom he was brought in contact, first in the Valley and later in present West Virginia and western Pennsylvania. Washington in his account of the journey to the French commandant on the upper Ohio in 1753 illustrates the hardships encountered by those who traversed the wilderness. December 23, 1753: "Our Horses were now [after leaving Venango on the return] so weak and feeble, and the Baggage so heavy (as we were obliged to provide all the Necessaries which the Journey would require) that we doubted much their performing it; therefore myself and others (except the Drivers, who were obliged to ride) gave up our Horses for Packs, to assist along with the Baggage. I put myself in an Indian walking Dress, and continued with them three Days, till I found there was no Probability of their getting home in any reasonable Time. The Horses grew less able to travel every Day; and the Cold increased very fast; and the Roads were becoming much worse by a deep Snow, continually freezing: Therefore as I was uneasy to get back, to make Report of my Proceedings to his Honour, the Governor, I determined to prosecute my Journey the nearest Way through the Woods, on Foot.

"Accordingly I left Mr. Vanbraam in Charge of our Baggage: with Money and Directions to Provide Necessaries from Place to Place for themselves and Horses, and to make the most convenient Dispatch in Travelling.

"I took my necessary Papers; pulled off my Cloaths; and tied myself up in a Match Coat. Then with Gun in Hand and Pack on my Back, in which were my Papers and Provisions, I set-out with Mr. Gist, fitted in the same Manner, on Wednesday the 26th.

"The Day following, just after we had passed a Place called the Murdering-Town (where we intended to quit the Path, and steer across the Country for Shannapins Town) we fell in with a Party of French Indians, who had lain in Wait for us. One of them fired at Mr. Gist, or me, not 15 steps off, but fortunately missed. We took this fellow into Custody, and kept him till about 9 o'clock at Night; Then let him go, and walked all the remaining Part of the Night without making any Stop; that we might get the start, so far, as to be out of the Reach of their Pursuit the next Day, since we were well assured they would follow our Tract as soon as it was light. The next Day we continued travelling till quite dark, and got to the River [Allegheny] about two Miles above Shannapins. We expected to have found the River frozen, but it was not, only about 50 Yards from each Shore; The Ice I suppose had broken up above, for it was driving in vast Quantities.

"There was no way for getting over but on a Raft; Which we set about with but one poor Hatchet, and finished just after Sun-setting. This was a whole Day's Work. Then set off; But before we were Half Way over, we were jammed in the Ice, in such a Manner that we expected every Moment our Raft to sink, and ourselves to perish. I put-out my setting Pole to try to stop the Raft, that the Ice might pass by; when the Rapidity of the Stream threw it with so much violence against the Pole, that it jerked me out into ten Feet Water; but I fortunately saved myself by catching hold of one of the Raft Logs. Notwithstanding all our efforts we could not get the Raft to either Shore; but were obliged, as we were near an Island to quit our Raft and make to it.

"The Cold was so extremely severe, that Mr. Gist had all his Fingers, and some of his Toes frozen; but the water was shut up so hard, that we found no Difficulty in getting-off the Island, on the Ice, in the Morning, and went to Mr. Frazier's."

THE VALLEY OF VIRGINIA IN 1748

One of the largest landgrants in Virginia was the Northern Neck grant owned by Lord Fairfax, one of the few titled Englishmen to make his home in Virginia. Lord Fairfax was Washington's patron, and selected the youth in 1748 for his first experiences on the frontier. This was more than twenty years after the first movement into the Valley. The settlement, especially of the northern part, was fairly rapid, since there was at that time no Indian trouble. The settlers and the remaining Indians continued as quiet neighbors until 1753; the fact that the pioneers were from Pennsylvania is said to have been a reason for this—a reflex of Penn's comparatively enlightened policy. Against settlers from eastern Virginia, however, the "Long Knife" men, the Indians showed animosity. In 1753 the Indians, after a visit by western tribe emissaries, left the Valley, which, if the settlers could have read the signs, would have been recognized as meaning trouble. By 1734 the inhabitants were demanding a seat of justice nearer than Fredericksburg which was the shire town of Spotsylvania County, within the vast bounds of which the Valley was included. In that year Orange County was formed, but still including land on both sides of the Blue Ridge, and five justices were named for the Valley region. Finally, in 1738, the region west of the Blue Ridge was organized by itself in two counties, Frederick on the north and Augusta on the south.

The upper portion of the Valley was opened later than the lower end and, as stated above, by Scotch-Irish rather than Germans. John Lewis, father of Thomas, one of the surveyors of the Fairfax line, was the first of the race. He settled near present Staunton, probably in 1737. Though Washington's relations were less intimate with this section, yet as he was commander of the frontier it was during the war under his control and frequent inspection. But the Valley throughout was still the pioneer land when Washington first visited it. Settlements "were widely separated and large areas of country entirely destitute of inhabitants." Game abounded; and though there were not many Indians living there, it was still a war trail for the perpetually contending northern and southern tribes.

WASHINGTON WITH A TRANSIT (1748)

Washington records some of the experiences and impressions of frontier conditions that he met in his first survey expedition in 1748, when for the first time, so to say, he saw life in the raw. "Tuesday [March] 15th We . . . return'd to Penningtons we got our Supper and was lighted into a Room and I not being so good a Woodsman as ye rest of my Company striped myself very orderly and went in to ye Bed as they called it when to my Surprize I found it to be nothing but a Little Straw-Matted together without Sheets or anything else but only one thread Bear blanket with double its Weight of Vermin such as Lice Fleas &c I was glad to get up (as soon as y. Light was carried from us) I put on my Cloths and Lay as my Companions. Had we not been very tired I am sure we should not have slep'd much that night I made a Promise not to Sleep so from that time forward chusing rather to sleep in y. open Air before a fire as will appear hereafter. . . .

"Wednesday 16th We . . . Travell'd up to Frederick Town [Winchester] where our Baggage came to us we cleaned ourselves (to get Rid of y. Game we had catch'd y. Night before) and took a Review of y. Town and thence return'd to our Lodgings where we had a good Dinner prepar'd for us Wine and Rum Punch in Plenty and a good Feather Bed with clean Sheets which was a very agreeable regale . . .

"Saturday 26 Travelld up ye [Patterson's] Creek to Solomon Hedges Esqr one of his Majestys Justices of ye. Peace for ye County of Frederick where we camped when we came to Super there was neither a Cloth upon ye. Table nor a knife to eat with but as good luck would have it we had knives of [our] own. . . .

"Monday [April] 4th . . . we did two Lots and was attended by a great Company of People Men and Women and Children that attended us through ye. Woods as we went showing there Antick tricks I really think they seemed to be as Ignorant a Set of People as the Indians they would never speak English but when spoken to they speak all Dutch . . ."

He wrote, probably a year or so later, when again in the Valley surveying: "since you receid my Letter in October Last I have not sleep'd above three Nights or four in a bed but after walking a good deal all the Day lay down before the fire upon a Little Hay Straw Fodder or bairskin whichever is to be had with Man Wife and Children like a Parcel of Dogs or Catts and happy's he that gets the Birth nearest the fire there's nothing would make it pass of tolerably but a good Reward a Dubbleloon is my constant gain every Day that the Weather will permit my going out and some time Six Pistoles . . . I have never had my cloths of but lay and sleep in them like a Negro except the few Nights I have lay'n in Frederick Town"

THE MORAVIANS ON THE FRONTIER (1747)

During these early years of the Valley settlement, Moravian missionaries made visits to the outlying members of their flocks, and have left in their diaries a valuable record of what they saw and felt in western Maryland, Shenandoah Valley, and on the south branch of the Potomac, to which the settlements had extended, and where Washington surveyed in 1748. Schnell records in 1747: "July 6th—In the evening we came to the Patomik River, being very tired. We stayed with an Englishman over night. Our poor lodging place reminded us that Jesus had also lain in a stable. . . .

"July 8th. Since we learned that we would not find a house today for thirty miles, but only mountains and bad roads, we took a man with us who conducted us over the mountains. It was a way the like of which I have not seen in America. In the evening we came to an Englishman with whom we stayed over night. . . .

"I visited a place called 'Betessens Creek' [Patterson's Creek], where many German's live, interspersed among Low Dutch [Hollanders] and English New Lights. The High Germans are a poor people, internally as well as externally. . . .

"July 12th, . . . Many complained about their forsaken condition, that they had not been to the Lord's Supper for four years for want of a minister. The people asked us to come again if possible. We had much pity for them. . . .

"July 22nd. . . . In the evening we came to a German. When he heard that we were from Bethlehem and I a preacher, he asked us for our own sakes to return to Pennsylvania at once, as a notice had been posted on the courthouse that all preachers should be arrested who traveled without a passport from England."

A MISSIONARY OF THE FRONTIER (1748)

In 1748 Gottschalk made the journey, Washington being then in the vicinity.

"On March 14-25 [O. S. and N. S.], . . . In the evening I came to the last house, that of an Indian trader [Polk, on the Maryland side of the Potomac], beyond which there was no house for forty miles. It was a very disorderly house. The man was not at home. I asked the Lamb to protect me and it was done.

"On March 15-26, I arose early, being very glad and thankful to the Lord for having delivered me from this house. The Saviour gave me grace to speak to several people, who had conducted themselves very badly the night before.

"I continued joyfully on my way. Today I crossed the high North Mountain, the appearance of which everywhere was terrible. If one is down in the valley he cannot look up to the high, steep mountains without shuddering. And if one is up on the top of the mountains, the deep valleys, in which no bottom but only the tops of the trees are seen and the rushing of the water is heard, are also awe inspiring. The last and highest mountain is called 'High Germany,' and immediately after it is a deep valley, called 'Devil's Alley,' because it looks so terrible. But the Lamb helped me through safely with my horse. . . .

"On March 16-27, I asked the Lord very urgently that, as I was to enter Virginia today for the first time, he should show me the right persons and places. I had hardly entered the house again when Abraham Degart offered to take me to 'Bateson's Creek,' where we arrived late, but safely, in the evening.

"On March 17-28, I went up to the South Branch [of the Potomac]. I had to climb a terrible mountain, and at the same time it rained very hard. I came to an Englishman, Daniel Onar, who showed me much love, and soon afterwards to a German, named Kasselman, in whose house I felt a peculiar grace.

The people sat around me and gave me an opportunity to speak to them. They would have liked to give me a horse to Matthaes Jochem, if it had been possible to take it across the South Branch. The weather being so bad Mr. Kasselman accompanied me three miles, he took me across the South Branch and assisted me in getting a horse from an Englishman, named Collins. Kasselman said to him: 'Mr. Collins, here is a friend, who would like to hire one of your horses. Let him have one, and if he runs away with it, I will pay you for it.' Whereupon the Englishman was not only immediately willing to give me one of his horses, but also asked me to preach in his house to the English people living there. I replied that I would be willing to speak as well as I could, if there were people willing to hear of the Saviour, and I appointed a sermon for the 18-29th, at four o'clock. Then I rode away. During the night it became so dark that I could no longer see the way. I went astray several times, and finally, late at night, eight miles this side of Matthaes Jochem's, I came to a German, named Heiter, with whom I stayed over night.

RIVAL DENOMINATIONS (1748)

"On April 3-March 23, I came to the real German settlement, and among others to a man named George Daehlinger, at whose house Bro. Schnell lodged and preached. The congregation [of the Brethren] is known and loved there as little as the Saviour himself. I found that the people in that district are not pleased with the preaching of the Brethren, but become angry and bitter about it. When they learned afterwards that Bro. Schnell was a Herrnhutter, they wanted to pick a quarrel with Daehlinger, because he did not only not arrest him, but allowed him to preach and even helped him along with his horses. I felt the bitter, hostile and sarcastic spirit of the people in that district very much, and as the conditions were the same at Cedar Creek and in some respects even worse, I did not have the heart to preach to these people, but left again on the next day. The door at these two places is really closed."

MORAVIAN JOURNEY TO NORTH CAROLINA (1753)

In 1753 a more extensive journey was undertaken by a party of fifteen from Bethlehem to the proposed Moravian settlement at Wachovia (Winston-Salem), North Carolina.

"On October 13, . . . When the storm was over, we started at twelve o'clock midnight and traveled several miles farther to the next creek. We passed a little town, called 'Carl Isles' [Carlisle, Pa.], consisting of about 60 houses and inhabited mostly by Irishmen.

"On Sunday, October 14, about 4 o'clock in the morning, we pitched our tent four miles this side of [beyond] 'Carl Isles,' in order not to be an eyesore to the Irish Presbyterians. We lay down for several hours and slept well and peacefully. After breakfast the brethren were shaved. The rest of the time we spent happily in our tent. At noon we ate pork and dumplings. . . . Towards evening we went three miles farther to the widow Tennent's tavern. This night we stayed on the other side of the creek. Several people came to us, who lodged in the tavern, to see what kind of people we were. We inquired of them about the way. They were very obliging towards us. . . .

"On October 19, . . . The brethren secured bread and hay and brought it to the 'great road' where the other brethren waited with the wagon. . . . We bought several bushels of oats, but had to wait several hours till it had been threshed. Several Germans came to us, of whom we inquired about the way. They gave us bad news, that beyond 'Augusti' Court House the way is so bad that we would hardly be able to proceed. . . .

"On October 24, . . . Three miles farther we came to 'Augusti Court House' [Staunton], a little town of some twenty houses, surrounded by mountains on all sides. This whole district is settled by Irish and English people. Immediately behind 'Augusti Court House' the bad road begins. . . . The road ran up and down continually, and we had either to push the wagon or keep it back with ropes which we had fastened to the rear. There was no lack of water, for every two miles we met creeks. We pitched our tent eight miles this side of 'Augusti Courthouse,' close to a spring and an old dilapidated house. Bro. Loesch went to several plantations to buy feed for our horses. But the people had none themselves. However, they were very friendly and regretted that they could not help us.

"On October 25, . . . In the evening we pitched our tent upon a height. We had to fetch water from a considerable distance. Bro. Gottlob had preceded us half a mile to a free negro, who is the only blacksmith in this district. He had his horse shod. The negro and his wife, who was born in Scotland, were very friendly towards Bro. Gottlob and related to him that not long ago they had removed hither from Lancaster County. . . .

"On October 26, . . . Although it is very hilly here, yet it is a fruitful county. It has a few stones, but consists of the fattest, black soil. It is settled mostly by English and Irish people. Bro. Gottlob and Nathanael preceded us several miles and stayed, a mile and a half across the North Branch of the James River [near present Lexington], with Mr. Brickstone, a well-to-do man, who removed to this place a few years ago. . . ."

SETTLEMENTS BEYOND THE VALLEY

This was the condition of the Valley of Virginia before the outbreak of the French and Indian War. Though still pioneer, it was not by that time the extreme western line. Mention has been made of the settlements on both branches of the upper Potomac. Dr.

Thomas Walker, exploring into Kentucky in 1750 under a contract for a settlement, says: "16th March. We kept up the Staunton to William Englishes. He lives on a small Branch, and was not much hurt by the Fresh. He has a mill, which is the furthest back except one lately built by the Sect of People who call themselves of the Brotherhood of Euphrates, and are commonly called the Duncards, who are the upper Inhabitants of the New River, which is about 400 yards wide at this place. They live on the west side, and we were obliged to swim our horses over. The Duncards are an odd set of people, who make it a matter of Religion not to Shave their Beards, ly on beds, or eat flesh, though at present, in the last, they transgress, being constrained to it, they say, by the want of a sufficiency of Grain and Roots, they have not long been seated here. I doubt the plenty and deliciousness of Venison and Turkeys has contributed not a little to this. The unmarried have no Property but live on a common Stock. They don't baptize either Young or Old, they keep their Sabbath on Saturday, and hold that all men shall be happy hereafter, but first must pass through punishment according to their Sins. They are very hospitable."

This settlement was near the mouth of the Little River in present Pulaski County, Va. A few days later he helped Stalkaner raise his house on the Holston River. This was put down in Fry and Jefferson's map of 1751 as the most western habitation, and this and the Dunkard settlement were on the western side of the Alleghenies. There was further activity in this region up to 1755. The inhabitants on the branches of the Potomac and Patterson's Creek were in present West Virginia; and there were attempted settlements on the westward-flowing Greenbrier and Cheat. To the north and south of Virginia the frontier line was being pushed forward also. Washington's interests were concerned with western Pennsylvania, much of which was claimed by Virginia, as well as with his native colony. There, however, at the outbreak of hostilities, the frontier line was still east of the mountains, though there were various trading posts, including some of the Ohio Company, on the western waters. For instance, when Washington reached Venango on his journey to the French commandant, he found the French occupying the house from which they had driven the English trader Frazier.

INDIAN RAIDS (1755-1758)

Following Washington's Fort Necessity expedition, and especially after Braddock's defeat in 1755, the frontier was ablaze between Carolina and New York. In the north and south, the Iroquois and Cherokees being friendly to the British, the forays of the French Indians were held in check; but across the line throughout its length in Virginia and Pennsylvania the hostile tribes made raid after raid, destroyed the outlying settlements, and brought terror to those even in the well-settled regions.

Such petitions as the following to the Virginia Assembly are illustrative: "April 3, 1758 . . . That a Memorial of John Smith, late Captain of a Company of Rangers on the Frontiers of this Colony, . . . was read, setting forth That in June, 1756 the said Smith, then in Fort Vaux [Vass] in Augusta, with a small Party, was attacked by the Enemy, which (after having defended it till he had but three Men left) he was at length obliged to surrender: That the Enemy then most inhumanly murdered his eldest Son before his Face, and carried him Prisoner to the Shawnese Towns and French Forts, and from thence to Quebec, where he was put on Board a Cartel Ship and carried to England. . . . That he has lost three Sons and great Part of his Fortune in the Service of his Country."

"March 20, 1761 . . . A Petition of Mary Ingles setting forth that in the Year 1756 she was with her Husband in Fort Vaux [Vass], in Augusta, when he was killed and she carried away into Captivity by the Indians, amongst whom she was barbarously treated; and on her Return into the Colony she found her House and her whole effects burned, and was thereby reduced to the utmost Distress, since which she has been supported entirely by the charitable Contributions of the Welldisposed, and praying Relief of the House, was presented to the House and read."

WASHINGTON ON THE RAIDS

Washington describes rather emotionally the state of affairs in a letter to Dinwiddie, April 22, 1756: "Your Honor may see to what unhappy straits the distressed inhabitants as well as I, am reduced. I am too little acquainted, Sir, with pathetic language, to attempt a description of the people's distresses, though I have a generous soul, sensible of wrongs, and swelling for redress. But what can I do? If bleeding, dying! would glut their insatiate revenge, I would be a willing offering to savage fury, and die by inches to save a people. I see their situation, know their danger, and participate their sufferings, without having it in my power to give them further relief, than uncertain promises. In short, I see inevitable destruction in so clear a light, that, unless vigorous measures are taken by the Assembly, and speedy assistance sent from below, the poor inhabitants that are now in forts, must unavoidably fall, while the remainder of the country are flying before the barbarous foe. In fine, the melancholy situation of the people, the little prospect of assistance, the gross and scandalous abuses cast upon the officers in general, which is reflecting upon me in particular, for suffering misconducts of such extraordinary kinds, and the distant prospects, if any, that I can see, of gaining honor and reputation in the service, are motives which cause me to lament the hour, that gave me a commission, and would induce me, at any other time than this of imminent danger, to resign without one hesitating moment, a command, which I never expect to reap either honor or benefit from; but, on the contrary, have almost an absolute certainty of incurring displeasure below, while the murder of poor innocent babes and helpless families may be laid to my account here!

"The supplicating tears of the women, and moving petitions from the men, melt me into such deadly sorrow, that I solemnly declare, if I know my own mind, I could offer myself a willing sacrifice to the butchering enemy, provided that would contribute to the people's ease."

MAURY ON THE INSECURITY OF THE FRONTIER (1756)

Reverend James Maury was one of those to bring the matter earnestly to the attention of the Burgesses. He wrote, February 10, 1756: "Not to mention the repeated Acts of Hostility and Violence, committed on our Fellow-subjects, in the remoter Parts of this Colony, by those bloody Instruments of french Policy, the Indians; nor the great Extent of country, on both Sides the Alleghenies, now almost totally depopulated by them; which are Facts long since notorious to all: I beg Leave to inform You, that such Numbers of People have lately transplanted themselves hence into the more southerly Governments, as must appear almost incredible to any, except such, as have had an Opportunity of knowing it, either from their own Observation, or the credible Information of others, or both. From the waters of Potomac, James and Roanoke Rivers on the eastern Side of the above-mentioned Ridge of Mountains, nay from the same Side of the blue Ridge, hundreds of Families have, within these few Months past, removed, deserted their Habitations, & conveyed themselves & their most valuable Movables into other Governments. . . . And they, Sir, notwithstanding those Measures, & all others, which have yet been pursued with the Views, still look upon our Frontiers to be in so insecure & defenseless a State, as to justify their Apprehensions, that the same bloody Tragedies, which were acted at the Expence of their Neighbours last Summer, will, if they stay, be reacted the insuing at their own. If only fifty Indians, which they believe to be as many as were upon our Borders in the Southwest last Year, of which they, perhaps, are the best Judges, made such Havoc & Desolation; drove off upwards of two Thousand Head of Cattle & Horses to support themselves & the Enemy at Duquesne, besides what they wantonly destroyed; & if so contemptible a Band depopulated & ravaged so large a Tract of Country; they suspect, much greater Numbers, animated & tempted by the extraordinary Success of those few, will e'er long renew the same Hostilities, & consequently, much greater and more extensive Mischiefs insue. And certain it is, should that be attempted, & no effectual Methods pursued to defeat the Attempt, many Parts of the Colony, now several Miles within their Frontiers, will shortly become frontier in their Turn. . . . It is generally believed by the most prudent & discerning in this Part of the Country, that, during the present Troubles, nothing will put a Stop to this prevailing Humour of removing southerly, because nothing will convince the People they are safe, but a Line of Forts, extended quite across the Colony, as a Barrier against Incursions of the Barbarians."

CHAIN OF FRONTIER FORTS (1756-1758)

This remedy of a line of forts was adopted in both Virginia and Pennsylvania. The Virginia General Assembly, by an act of March, 1756, ordered a chain of forts from Cacapon River in present Hampshire Co., W. Va., to the south fork of the Mayo River in present Halifax Co., Va. A council of militia officers at Augusta on July 27, 1756, which Washington did not attend, designated the location of the forts, which with four already built were to be the guard line. These were, however, not adequately manned; and they neglected the best means of defense, through offense, since, in spite of Washington's pleadings, no adequate provision was made to employ the services of the friendly Indians, who alone could offset the raids. These public forts were not the only defensive points, however. Boughter says that there were some seventy-five forts and stockades, major and minor, along the Virginia frontier from the Forks of the Ohio to Carolina; some withstood the Indian attacks, others, like Fort Vass mentioned above, succumbed. They did not stop the incursions, and by the end of 1758 the frontier had been driven in all along the line. The fact that one of the most important of the fortifications was at Winchester indicates the depth of the terror.

Washington as commander-in-chief of the Virginia forces was in the midst of all the trouble; in fact, as the above letter shows, felt a heavy responsibility for the conditions, though he was for the most part helpless to alter them. These years of trial, coming when he was still in young manhood, receptive to external surroundings and influences, not only helped to build his character but gave him a valuable knowledge of the frontier state of mind, which was useful later in life both in war and in peace. The personal phase is treated in other articles in this series, especially those on the Indian contacts and on his colonial military training.

WASHINGTON'S IMPRESSIONS (1784)

Washington was again in the West in 1770. His last visit was in 1784 when Indian troubles prevented him from going down the Ohio. The fourteen years had witnessed the Revolution, which in the West had been another series of Indian conflicts and these, indeed, continued for another ten years. His comments at this time on the squatters on his Pennsylvania lands have been given above; and in his general comments on the tour, which had this time the development of trans-alleghean transportation as one of the motives, he wrote, October 4, 1784: "And tho' I was disappointed in one of the objects which induced me to undertake this journey namely to examine into the situation quality and advantages of the Land which I hold upon the Ohio and Great Kanhawa—and to take measures for rescuing them from the hands of Land Jobbers and Speculators—who I had been informed regardless of my legal and equitable rights, patents, &c.; had enclosed them within other Surveys and were offering them for Sale at Philadelphia and in Europe.—I say notwithstanding this disappointment I am well pleased with my journey, as it has been the means of my obtaining a knowledge of facts—coming at the temper and disposition of the Western Inhabitants—and making reflections thereon, which, otherwise, must have been as wild, incoherent, or perhaps as foreign from the truth, as the inconsistency of the reports which I had received even from those to whom most credit seemed due, generally were."

This was prophetic of the need of just such knowledge in the years to come when as head of the new nation one of the problems he had to meet was the character and points of view of these same frontiersmen, in the consideration of Indian affairs, foreign affairs, westward extension, and that developing democracy so closely associated with them and the children who inherited their spirit.

Part II

Washington's Contact with the Indians

SURVEYING TRIP (1748)

Washington's connection with Indians began in 1748 on his first survey expedition beyond the Blue Ridge. He records in his diary that on March 23 at Cresap's (present Oldtown on the upper Potomac) "we were agreeably surpris'd at y. sight of thirty odd Indians coming from War with only one Scalp We had some Liquor with us of which we gave them Part it elevating there Spirits put them in y. Humour of Dauncing of whom we had a War Daunce." He describes "there manner of Dauncing . . . in a most comical Manner." This was merely incidental and Indians were not at that time numerous so far eastward.

CARRYING WARNING TO THE FRENCH (1753)

In November, 1753, he was sent by Governor Dinwiddie to deliver to the French commandant on the Ohio a letter of protest and warning for encroaching on territory which Virginia claimed. This was land which, most emphatically, the Indians also claimed, and from which the English rather than the French were likely to push them back; for the English settled while the French did little more than trade. It was part of Washington's task to gain their confidence, to enhance their restlessness over the French intrusion, to make them forgetful of the past harrying by the English, and to prevent too much inquisitiveness concerning the colonial intentions.

He with Gist, a sturdy frontiersman who was his guide, met the Indians at Logstown, a trading post on or near the Ohio at Big Beaver Creek—chiefs of the Delawares, Shawnees, Senecas, and others, including the Half-King, the most important Indian of the region and just then unfriendly to the French—, had speech with them and gave wampum; and a party of them, including Half-King, conducted him first to the Indian town of Venango (at present Franklin, Pa.) and then to Fort Le Boeuf (near present Waterford), where he delivered his letters on December 12 and received a reply. The French attempted to separate the Indians from the Virginians; but the party held together until Venango was reached on the return trip on December 22.

In his speech to the Indians at Logstown he said: "'Brothers . . . I am sent, with all possible Dispatch, to visit, and deliver a Letter to the French Commandant, of very great Importance to your Brothers, the English; and I dare say, to you . . . because His Honour our Governor treats you as good Friends and Allies; and holds you in great Esteem.' . . . He [Half-King] returned . . . and came with . . . other Sachems to my Tent, and begged . . . to know on what Business we were going to the French? this was a Question I all along expected, and has provided as satisfactory Answers to, as I could; which allayed their Curiosity a little."

At Venango: "We found the French Colours hoisted at a House from which they had driven Mr. John Frazier, an English subject. . . . Capt. Joncaire sent for the Half-King, as he had just heard that he came with me: He affected to be much concerned that I did not make free to bring them in before. I excused it in the best Manner I was capable, . . . But another Motive prevented me . . . I knew he was Interpreter, and a Person of great great Influence among the Indians, and had lately used all possible Means to draw them over to their Interest; therefore I was desirous of giving no Opportunity that could be avoided. When they came in, there was great Pleasure expressed at seeing them. He . . . applied Liquor so fast, that they were soon rendered incapable of the Business they came about [to return the French speech belt], notwithstanding the Caution which was given. . . . The Half-King came to my Tent, quite sober, . . . I fain would have prevented him speaking any Thing till he came to the Commandant [at Fort Le Boeuf], but could not prevail. . . . The King . . . offered the French Speech-Belt . . . which Monsieur Joncaire refused to receive; but desired him to carry it to the Fort to the Commander. . . . We found it extremely difficult to get the Indians off Today, as every Stratagem had been used to prevent their going-up with me."

At Fort Le Boeuf: "As I found many Plots concerted to retard the Indians Business, and prevent their returning with me; I endeavor'd all that lay in my Power to frustrate their Schemes, and to hurry them on to execute their intended Design. They accordingly pressed for Admittance this Evening, which at length was granted them privately, . . . The Half-King told me, that he offer'd the Wampum to the Commander [Le Gardeur de St. Pierre], who evaded taking it, and made many fair Promises of Love and Friendship; . . . The Commandant ordered a plentiful Store of Liquor, Provision, &c., to be put on Board our Canoe; and appeared to be extremely complaisant, though he was exerting every Artifice which he could invent to set our own Indians at Variance with us, to prevent their going 'till after our Departure. Presents, Rewards, and every Thing which could be suggested by him or his Officers.—I can't say that ever in my Life I suffered so much Anxiety . . . But I urged and insisted with the King so closely upon his Word, that he . . . set off with us as he had engaged." When he and Gist had finally reached Frazier's post on the Monongahela after their perilous foot journey from Venango, he concluded the diary with the dry remark that "I went-up about three Miles . . . to visit Queen Aliquippa [Delaware], who had expressed great Concern that we passed her in going to the Fort. I made her a Present of a Matchcoat and a Bottle of Rum; which latter was thought much the best Present of the Two."

FORT NECESSITY EXPEDITION (1754)

In April, 1754, Washington's command, marching to complete the fort at the Forks of the Ohio, was met at Cresap's by the news that the French had driven the English away. The works in French hands became Fort Duquesne. Here also a speech and belt from Half-King were delivered and a council of war at Fort Cumberland decided to continue the advance to the Monongahela to assist the Indians, "whose interest is as dear to us as our lives." During the next months, and until Washington surrendered to the French at Fort Necessity, contact with the Indians was continuous, and all possible efforts were made to win their alliance, or neutrality at least, in the forthcoming struggle with the French. Results were not good, however, and the Indians were critical of Washington's conduct of affairs.

Washington's journal of this expedition was captured by the French, and is known only through a French translation of it. The original, if it still exists in the French archives, has not been unearthed. According to this document he went forward from Fort Necessity and held a council with the Indians June 18-21, Half-King with others of the Six Nations, Shawnees, and Delawares, who indicated their unfavorable intentions. "We . . . have been informed that you threaten to destroy entirely all your brethren the Indians, who will not join you on the road; wherefore we who keep in our own towns, expect every day to be cut to pieces by you. We should be glad to know from your own mouth whether there be any truth in that information, . . . We know the French will ask us on our return, of what number our brethren are whom we went to see? Therefore we desire you, by this belt, to let us know it, as also the number of those whom you expect and at what time you expect them, and when you intend to attack the French, that we may give notice thereof to our town, and know also, what we are to tell the French."

WASHINGTON'S APPEAL TO THE INDIANS (1754)

Washington replied: "The English do not intend to hurt you, or any of your allies; . . . they . . . sent an army to maintain your rights; to put you again in possession of your lands, and to take care of your wives and children, to dispossess the French, to maintain your rights and to secure the whole country for you; for these very ends are the English arms now employed: it is for the safety of your wives and your children that we are fighting; and as this is the only motive of our conduct we cannot reasonably doubt of being joined by the rest of your forces to oppose the common enemy. Those who will not join us shall be answerable for whatever may be the consequence, we only desire your brethren to choose the side which seems most acceptable to them. . . . as we have drawn the sword in your cause and in your defence, hesitate no longer, delay not a moment, but put all your wives and children under our protection, and they shall find plenty of provisions; in the meanwhile set your young men and your warriors to sharpening their hatchets, to join and unite with us vigorously in our battles. The present, my Brethren, which I offer you is not so considerable as I could wish, but I expect in a short time, a quantity of goods, . . ." This speech was to the Six Nations; to the Delawares who were believed to have gone over to the French already a similar answer was made. "After this the Council broke up and those treacherous devils [the Delawares], who had been sent by the French to act as spies, returned, though not without some stories prepared to amuse the French, which may be of service to make our own designs succeed."

There is further evidence, in a letter to Dinwiddie on June 12, that he was fast learning his Indian lore and other diplomacy: "Queen Aliquippa desired that her son, who is really a great warrior, might be taken into council, as he was declining and unfit for business, and that he should have an English name given him. I therefore called the Indians together by the advice of the Half-King, presented one of the medals, and desired him to wear it in remembrance of his great father, the King of England, and called him the name of Colonel Fairfax, which he was told signified the first of the council. This gave him great pleasure. I was also informed, that an English name would please the Half-King, which made me presume to give him that of your Honour, and called him Dinwiddie; interpreted in their language, the head of all." Half-King, who remained loyal, died before the end of the year.

IN THE BRADDOCK CAMPAIGN (1755)

Washington held no official position in the Braddock campaign, he was merely a volunteer aide to the general; but his knowledge of the region and his earlier acquaintance with the Indians and their methods of warfare and thought, made his advice of great value even though Braddock would not or could not always profit by it. The French had won ascendancy over the Indians of the region and Braddock's force was without natives except a few as guides, the others who joined from time to time meeting with such a reception that they speedily departed; so that the defeat was due not to a surprise but to the fact that a force using Indian tactics in the forest defeated an army made up largely of British regulars unable or at least unwilling to adopt the only warfare possible in the region. No diary was kept during the expedition, at least none is now known to exist; and there is nothing in the published letters on Indian connections with the march.

ON THE FRONTIER (1755-1758)

During the next three years Washington's task as commander in chief of the Virginia forces was to guard the frontier from Indian raids, with headquarters at Fort Cumberland and Winchester, and inspections of the inadequate line of "little paucity forts" beyond. The raids continued, however, and the pioneers were pushed back so that the frontier line when the French and Indian War ended was far within its position before that conflict. There were some Indians with the Forbes expedition against Fort Duquesne in 1758, Washington, who commanded the Virginia force of the army, having stressed the importance of it; but, except for the annihilation of Grant's detachment in a rash advance, there was no fighting.

No diaries are available for this period. Many letters were written on his task, the importance of which he fully realized, writing on August 14, 1755, "that it requires more experience than I am master of, to conduct an affair of the importance that this is now arisen to;" and again, April 7, 1756: "Our detachments . . . have sought them [Indian raiders] diligently, but the cunning and vigilance of Indians in the woods are no more to be conceived, than they are to be equalled by our people. Indians are only match for Indians; and without these, we shall ever fight upon unequal terms." On unequal terms the fight continued; the only available savages were the Cherokees and other southern tribes, and they did not accept to any extent the offers made to them, though Washington continued to "advise, as I often have done, that there should be neither trouble nor expense omitted to bring the few, who are still inclined, into our service, and that, too, with the greatest care and expedition. A small number, just to point out the wiles and tracks of the enemy, is better than none." The little reliance that could be put in the colonial militia to check the flight of "a people overcome with fear and consternation at the inhuman murders of these barbarous savages" is made evident by his letters and memoranda.

CHEROKEES AND CATAWBAS (1756-1757)

Later in the year 1756, when Cherokees and Catawbass were expected under a promise to Virginia commissioners, he expressed his pleasure: "They will be of particular service—more than twice their number of white men. When they arrive, which I pray may be soon, we may deal with the French in their own way; and, by visiting their country, will keep their Indians at home. . . . Those Indians who are now coming should be shewed all possible respect, and the greatest care taken of them, as upon them much depends. 'Tis a critical time, they are very humoursome, and their assistance very necessary! One false step might not only lose us that, but even turn them against us. All kinds of necessary goods, &c., should be got for them." But Major

Lewis brought only seven Cherokee men and three squaws when some four hundred were expected. When eleven Catawbas appeared: "we undoubtedly might have had more of them, had the proper means been used to send trusty guides to invite and conduct them to us; but this is neglected . . . Indian goods are much wanted." "When I spoke about scalps, I had the Indians chiefly, indeed solely, in my view, knowing their jealous, suspicious natures are apt to entertain doubts at the least delay and a suspension of rewards causes a dissatisfaction and murmuring among them, which might be productive of bad events at this critical juncture."

Though there were other such dribblings of Indian allies, evidently more than one false step was taken and savage doubts entertained; for, he wrote on May 30, 1757: "We receive fresh proofs every day of the bad direction of our Indian affairs. It is not easy to tell what expenses have arisen on account of these Indians, how dissatisfied they are, and how gloomy the prospect of pleasing them appears, while we pursue our present system of management." He described the French system of single control; "whereas, with us it is everybody's business, and no one's, to supply. Every person attempts to please, and few succeed in it, because one promises this, and another that; and few can perform any thing, but are obliged to shuffle and put them off, to get rid of their importunities. Hence they accuse us of perfidy and deceit!"

The unsatisfactory conditions not only continued but augmented, so that after the Forbes expedition the Cherokees became actively hostile. They not only raided the frontier themselves but captured Fort Londoun on the Little Tennessee River in their territory; although Washington wrote at the end of 1757 that "the sincere disposition the Cherokees have betrayed to espouse our cause heartily has been demonstrated beyond the most distant doubt; and, if rewarded in the manner in which that laudable and meritorious disposition entitles them to, would, in all human probability, soon effect a favorable change in the present (apparently) desperate situation of this poor unhappy part of his Majesty's dominions."

IN THE FORBES EXPEDITION (1758)

Washington's chief concern in 1758 was with the Forbes expedition. Cherokees for this began to assemble at Winchester early in the year. There were five hundred of them there by April, and to retain them a speedy campaign was essential. "Without this, I fear the Indians will with difficulty be restrained from returning to their nation before we assemble, and, in that event, no words can tell how much they will be missed. . . . The Indians are mercenary: every service of theirs must be purchased; and they are easy offended, being thoroughly sensible of their own importance." "They say that they did not leave home with an intention of staying any considerable time, that they can see no appearance of our being able to take the field . . . they would go home and be back again by the time they are wanted," he added in May. He wrote Forbes on June 19 that "all except those who came last . . . [have returned] home. . . . Now . . . we shall be left to perform without them a march of more than 100 miles from an advanced Post . . . a great part of which will be over mountains and Rocks, and thro' such Defiles, as will enable the Enemy, with the assistance of their Indians, and Irregulars, and their superior knowledge of the country, to render extremely arduous, unsafe, and at best, tedious, our intended Expedition; unless we also can be assisted by a Body of Indians; who I conceive to be the best if not the only Troops fit to cope with Indians in such grounds. . . . The Southern Indians, of late, seem to be wavering; and have, on several occasions, discovered an inclination to break with us. I think it will admit of no doubt, that, if we should be unsuccessful in this Quarter, which Heaven avert! the united force of several powerful nations of them might be employed against us; and that such an acquisition to the Enemy would enable them to desolate our Southern Colonies, and make themselves masters of that part of the continent, is not to be questioned. Wherefore, that nothing should be omitted that might contribute to prevent so dreadful a calamity, I suggest the idea of sending a proper person immediately to the Cherokee nation; who may not only heal the differences which now subsist, but get a Body of them to join the army on their march, and no person, surely, who has the interest of our important cause at heart would hesitate a moment to engage in such a Service, on the event of which our all, in a manner, depends." But it was the desertion of the Indian allies of the French, and not the presence of those of the English, that settled the campaign.

ON THE LAND SELECTION TRIP (1770)

Washington's next journey to the frontier was in October and November, 1770, when he went to inspect and locate bounty lands beyond the Alleghenies for himself and fellow officers of the Virginia regiment. His trip took him to Pittsburgh, then down the Ohio with Capt. William Crawford to the Kanawha, and up the lower reaches of that branch. During seven years of peace the frontier line had again advanced, in disregard of the Proclamation of 1763; and the Indians had also by treaties, which they probably did not understand, relinquished land on the southern side of the Ohio as far as the mouth of the Kanawha. Conotocarious, which was his Indian name, inherited from his great-grandfather, with George Croghan the Indian agent, received a speech and string of wampum from chiefs near Pittsburgh, had Indians to accompany him down the river, encamped at Mingo Town, below present Steubenville, underwent further down a "tedious ceremony" with another party under the leadership of a companion of the trip in 1753, and on his return left the river at Mingo Town and returned to Pittsburgh by land. He recorded his impressions of the Indians on the Ohio, who viewed "the Settlement of the People upon this River with an uneasy and jealous Eye, and do not scruple to say that they must be compensated for their Right if the People settle thereon, notwithstanding the Cession of the Six Nation's thereto." This was the treaty for Fort Stanwix in 1768; the Cherokees had also made cessions south of the Ohio; but the Shawnees, Delawares, and Mingoes had not participated. As, he continued, the settlers were constantly advancing, "how difficult it may be to contend with these People afterwards is easy to be judged of from every day's experience of Lands actually settled, supposing these to be made; than which nothing is more probable if the Indians permit them, from the disposition of the People at present." Lord Dunmore's War in 1774, in which Washington had no share, was probably here anticipated.

INDIANS AND THE REVOLUTION- ARY ARMY (1775-1783)

During the Revolution, Indian policy was important; first of all was the question whether the natives should be employed as auxiliaries. Both sides claimed to depreciate their enlistment; in the end both sides did use them. They participated both as British and American allies in the Burgoyne campaign, but their conduct under the British, especially in the murder of Jane McCrea, as it aroused the resentment of the people, was of far more influence on the outcome than the few hundred Oneidas under Gates. Washington, with the knowledge gained in early frontier warfare, had no doubt as to the proper policy. He wrote Schuyler, April 19, 1776: "You, who know the temper and disposition of the savages, will, I doubt not, think with me, that it will be impossible to keep them in a state of neutrality. I have urged upon Congress the necessity of engaging them on our side, to prevent their taking an active part against us, which would be a most fatal stroke under our present circumstances." His letter to the President of Congress of the same date repeats this advice; and on May 25, 1776, Congress declared it highly expedient to engage the Indians. In 1778 the Congressional Committee of Conference with Washington having so advised, the Board of War wrote that, "seeing these Gentlemen have fully discussed the matter with General Washington, and upon the maturest deliberation recommend it," some four hundred Indians might be employed; Congress so voted on March 4. Washington on March 13 wrote: "Divesting them of the savage customs exercised in their wars against each other, I think they may be made of excellent use as scouts and light troops, mixed with our own parties."

Whatever may have been done under these resolves, the Indians rendered no essential aid. Washington's policy of use was, after all, a limited one. While writing Schuyler, May 15, 1778, his regrets that the disposition of the Indians was "not generally favorable," he also regretted the arrival at Valley Forge of a party of Indians. "All appearances at this time are opposed to the supposition of any speedy offensive movement . . . there will be very little of that kind of service in which the Indians are capable of being useful. . . . I leave it to your judgment to assign such reasons as you shall deem best calculated for the change and satisfy them. I should think however, a good way might be, to inform them, with proper comments, of the [French] Treaties . . . and that in consequence of them, affairs have taken such a turn, as to make it unnecessary to give them the trouble, at this time of coming to our assistance."

The Indians all along the frontier, under the influence of the British agents and loyalist commanders, as well as natural desire, raided throughout the war; such events as the Wyoming massacre in 1778, and the Mohawk Valley incursions, left Washington "thoroughly impressed with the necessity of offensive operations against Indians, in every kind of rupture with them." An expedition to break the power of the hostile Iroquois was carefully planned and carried out; Sullivan, who was given the command in 1779 after Gates declined it, was instructed by Washington that "the immediate objects are the total destruction and devastation of their settlements, and the capture of as many prisoners of every age and sex as possible. . . . that the country may not be merely overrun, but destroyed. . . . When we have effectually chastised them, we may then listen to peace, and endeavor to draw further advantages from their fears." With the campaign against the Cherokees and Clark's operations in the Northwest, Washington had no direct connection.

ON THE FRONTIER (1784)

Washington made his last journey to the West in September of this year, intending to descend the Ohio for another inspection of the Kanawha lands. He gave it up because of the hostility of the Indians; and they were still intermittently on the war-path when he became President. "[September] 14th. . . Colo Willm. Butler and the officer Commanding the Garrison at Fort Pitt, a Capt. Luckett came here—as they confirmed the reports of the discontented temper of the Indians and the Mischiefs done by some parties of them—and the former advised me not to prosecute my intended trip to the Great Kanahawa, I resolved to decline it."

PRESIDENTIAL POLICY (1789-1797)

The Federal Constitution gave the national government power over Indian affairs, and it was one of the duties of Washington's administration to organize this control. Besides the western Indians, the relations with what was left of the Iroquois and with the southern tribes, especially the Cherokees and Creeks, had to be settled. Delegates from these nations were induced to come to New York and Philadelphia. Brant, Cornplanter, and Red Jacket with the Iroquois and McGillivray with the Creeks were received by Washington, feted, including entertainment by the Tammany Society, treaties made with them there and elsewhere, and peace maintained during Washington's rule. The western problem was difficult. Expeditions under Harmar and St. Clair were defeated, and Washington, irritated especially by what he considered St. Clair's neglect of due precautions, after due consideration of available men appointed Wayne to lead a new expedition. This Revolutionary veteran, in spite of being known as "Mad Anthony," made his preparations and advance with thoroughness and care and by his complete defeat of the Indians at the battle of Fallen Timbers on August 20, 1794, opened the West to peaceful penetration for more than a decade.

President Washington's policy toward the Indians, as stated in his messages, was that "aggressors should be made sensible that the Government of the Union is not less capable of punishing their crimes than it is disposed to respect their rights and reward their attachments;" that "they should experience the benefits of an impartial dispensation of justice;" that "the mode of alienating their lands, the main source of discontent and war, should be so defined and regulated as to obviate imposition and as far as may be practical controversy concerning the reality and extent of the alienations which are made;" that "commerce with them should be promoted under regulations tending to secure an equitable deportment toward them, and that such rational experiments should be made for imparting to them the blessings of civilization as may from time to time suit their conditions;" that "the Executive of the United States should be enabled to employ the means to which the Indians have been long accustomed for uniting their immediate interests with the preservation of peace;" that "efficacious provisions should be made for inflicting adequate penalties upon all those who, by violating their rights, shall infringe the treaties and endanger the peace of the Union;" and that "a system corresponding with the mild principles of religion and philanthropy toward an unenlightened race of men, whose happiness materially depends on the conduct of the United States, would be as honorable to the national character as conformable to the dictates of sound policy."

LO THE POOR INDIAN!

To Edmund Pendleton he wrote, January 22, 1795: "They [the Indians], poor wretches, have no press through which their grievances are related; and it is well known, that, when one side only of a story is heard and often repeated, the human mind becomes impressed with it insensibly. The annual presents, however, to which you allude, are not given so much with a view to purchase peace, as by way of contribution for injuries not otherwise to be redressed. These people are very much irritated by the continual pressure of land speculators and settlers on one hand, and by the impositions of unauthorized and unprincipled traders, who rob them, in a manner, of their hunting, on the other. Nothing but the strong arm of the Union, or, in other words, adequate laws can correct these abuses. But here jealousies and prejudices, (from which I apprehend more fatal consequences to this government, than from any other source,) aided by local situations, and perhaps by interested considerations, always oppose themselves to efficient measures."

Thus did he sum up the impression acquired during an experience of almost half a century with the Indians as friends and as enemies.

Personal Appearance (1759-1799)

GEORGE WASHINGTON
From the Portrait by Wertmueller

ANONYMOUS BRITON (1790)

IT was not necessary to announce his name, for his peculiar appearance, his firm forehead, Roman nose, and a projection of the lower jaw, his height and figure, could not be mistaken by any one who had seen a full-length picture of him, and yet no picture accurately resembled him in the minute traits of his person. His features, however, were so marked by prominent characteristics, which appear in all likenesses of him, that a stranger could not be mistaken in the man; he was remarkably dignified in his manners, and had an air of benignity over his features which his visitant did not expect, being rather prepared for sternness of countenance. . . . his smile was extraordinarily attractive. It was observed to me that there was an expression in Washington's face that no painter had succeeded in taking. It struck me no man could be better formed for command. A stature of six feet, a robust, but well-proportioned frame, calculated to sustain fatigue, without that heaviness which generally attends great muscular strength, and abates active exertion, displayed bodily power of no mean standard. A light eye and full—the very eye of genius and reflection rather than of blind passionate impulse. His nose appeared thick, and though it befitted his other features, was too coarsely and strongly formed to be the handsomest of its class. His mouth was like no other that I ever saw; the lips firm and the under jaw seeming to grasp the upper with force, as if its muscles were in full action when he sat still."

ANONYMOUS (1798)

"It was in the month of November, 1798, I first beheld the Father of his Country. It was very cold, the northwest wind blowing hard down the Potomac, at Georgetown, D. C. A troop of light-horse from Alexandria escorted him to the western bank of the river. The waves ran high and the boat which brought him over seemed to labor considerably. Several thousand people greeted his arrival with swelling hearts and joyful countenances; the military were drawn up in a long line to receive him; the officers, dressed in regimentals, did him homage. I was so fortunate as to walk by his side, and had a full view of him. Although only about ten years of age, the impression his person and manner then made on me is now perfectly revived. He was six feet one inch high, broad and athletic, with very large limbs, entirely erect and without the slightest tendency to stooping; his hair was white, and tied with a silk string, his countenance lofty, masculine, and contemplative; his eye light gray. He was dressed in the clothes of a citizen, and over these a blue surtout of the finest cloth. His weight must have been two hundred and thirty pounds, with no superfluous flesh, all was bone and sinew, and he walked like a soldier. Whoever has seen in the Patent Office at Washington, the dress he wore when resigning his commission as commander-in-chief, in December, 1783, at once perceives how large and magnificent was his frame. During the parade, something at a distance suddenly attracted his attention; his eye was instantaneously lighted up as with the lightning's flash. At this moment I see its marvellous animation, its glowing fire, exhibiting strong passion, controlled by deliberate reason.

"In the summer of 1799 I again saw the chief. He rode a purely white horse, seventeen hands high, well proportioned, of high spirit; he almost seemed conscious that he bore on his back the Father of his Country. He reminded me of the war-horse whose neck is clothed with thunder. I have seen some highly-accomplished riders, but not one of them approached Washington; he was perfect in this respect. Behind him, at the distance of perhaps forty yards, came Billy Lee, his body-servant, who had perilled his life in many a field, beginning on the heights of Boston, in 1775, and ending in 1781, when Cornwallis surrendered, and the captive army, with unexpressible chagrin, laid down their arms at Yorktown. Billy rode a cream-colored horse, of the finest form, and his old Revolutionary cocked hat indicated that its owner had often heard the roar of cannon and small arms, and had encountered many trying scenes. Billy was a dark mulatto. His master speaks highly of him in his will, and provides for his support."

JOHN BELL (1779)

"General Washington is now in the forty-seventh year of his age; he is a tall well-made man, rather large boned, and has a tolerably genteel address; his features are manly and bold, his eyes of a bluish cast and very lively; his hair a deep brown, his face rather long and marked with the small pox; his complexion sun-burnt and without much colour, and his countenance sensible, composed, and thoughtful; there is a remarkable air of dignity about him, with a striking degree of gracefulness."

JEAN PIERRE BRISSOT DE WARVILLE (1791)

"You have often heard me blame M. Chastellux for putting too much sprightliness in the character he has drawn of this general. To give pretensions to the portrait of a man who has none is truly absurd. The General's goodness appears in his looks. They have nothing of that brilliancy which his officers found in them when he was at the head of his army; but in conversation they become animated. He has no characteristic traits in his figure, and this has rendered it always so difficult to describe it; there are few portraits which resemble him. All his answers are pertinent; he shows the utmost reserve, and is very diffident; but, at the same time, he is firm and unchangeable in whatever he undertakes. His modesty must be very astonishing, especially to a Frenchman."

BARON CROMOT DU BOURG (1781)

"General Washington came to see M. de Rochambeau. Notified of his approach, we mounted our horses and went out to meet him. He received us with that affability which is natural to him and depicted on his countenance. He is a very fine looking man, but did not surprise me as much as I expected from the descriptions I had heard of him. His physiognomy is noble in the highest degree, and his manners are those of one perfectly accustomed to society, quite a rare thing certainly in America."

PRINCE DE BROGLIE (1782)

"General Washington is now about forty-nine years of age. He is tall, nobly built and very well proportioned. His face is much more agreeable than represented in his portrait. He must have been much handsomer three years ago, and although the gentlemen who have remained with him during all that time say that he seems to have grown much older, it is not to be denied that the general is still as fresh and active as a young man."

MARQUIS DE CHASTELLUX (1781)

"In speaking of this perfect whole of which General Washington furnishes the idea, I have not excluded exterior form. His stature is noble and lofty, he is well made, and exactly proportionate; his physiognomy mild and agreeable, but such as to render it impossible to speak particularly of any of his features, so that in quitting him you have only the recollection of a fine face. He has neither a grave nor a familiar face, his brow is sometimes marked with thought, but never with inquietude; in inspiring respect he inspires confidence, and his smile is always the smile of benevolence."

GEORGE WASHINGTON PARKE CUSTIS (1826)

"General Washington, in the prime of life, stood six feet two inches, and measured precisely six feet when attired for the grave. From the period of the Revolution, there was an evident bending in that frame so passing straight before, but the stoop is attributable rather to the care and toils of that arduous contest than to age; for his step was firm, and his carriage noble and commanding, long after the time when the physical properties of man are supposed to be in the wane."

"To a majestic height, was added correspondent breadth and firmness, and his whole person was so cast in nature's finest mould as to resemble the classic remains of ancient statuary, where all the parts contribute to the purity and perfection of the whole."

"The power of Washington's arm was displayed in several memorable instances: in his throwing a stone from the bed of the stream to the top of the Natural Bridge; another over the Palisades into the Hudson, and yet another across the Rappahannock, at Fredericksburg. Of the article with which he spanned this bold and navigable stream, there are various accounts. We are assured that it was a piece of slate, fashioned to about the size and shape of a dollar, and which, sent by an arm so strong, not only spanned the river, but took the ground at least thirty yards on the other side. Numbers have since tried this feat, but none have cleared the water."

JOHN HUNTER (1785)

"The General is about six feet high, perfectly straight and well made; rather inclined to be lusty. His eyes are full and blue and seem to express an air of gravity. His nose inclines to the aquiline; his mouth is small; his teeth are yet good and his cheeks indicate perfect health. His forehead is a noble one and he wears his hair turned back, without curls and quite in the officer's style, and tied in a long queue behind. Altogether he makes a most noble, respectable appearance, and I really think him the first man in the world."

... When I was first introduced to him he was neatly dressed in a plain blue coat, white cassimir waistcoat, and black breeches and boots, as he came from his farm. ... The General came in again, with his hair neatly powdered, a clean shirt on, a new plain drab coat, white waistcoat and white silk stockings."

MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE (1824)

"The person of Washington, always graceful, dignified and commanding, showed to peculiar advantage when mounted; it exhibited, indeed, the very beau ideal of a perfect cavalier. The good Lafayette, during his last visit to America, delighted to discourse of the 'times that tried men's souls.' From the venerated friend of our country we derived a most graphic description of Washington and the field of battle. Lafayette said, 'At Monmouth I commanded a division, and, it may be supposed I was pretty well occupied; still I took time, amid the roar and confusion of the conflict, to admire our beloved chief, who, mounted on a splendid charger, rode along the ranks amid the shouts of the soldiers cheering them by his voice and example, and restoring to our standard the fortunes of the fight. I thought then, as now,' continued Lafayette, 'that never had I beheld so superb a man'."

SENATOR WILLIAM MACLAY (1791)

"In stature about six feet, with an unexceptionable make, but lax appearance. His frame would seem to want filling up. His motions rather slow than lively, though he showed no signs of having suffered by gout or rheumatism. His complexion pale, nay, almost cadaverous. His voice hollow and indistinct, owing, as I believe, to artificial teeth before his upper jaw, which occasions a flatness."

CAPTAIN GEORGE MERCER (1759)

"Though distrusting my ability to give an adequate account of the personal appearance of Col. George Washington, late commander of the Virginia Provincial troops, I shall, as you request, attempt the portraiture. He may be described as being as straight as an Indian, measuring six feet two inches in his stockings, and weighing 175 pounds, when he took his seat in the House of Burgesses in 1759. His frame is padded with well-developed muscles, indicating great strength. His bones and joints are large, as are his hands and feet. He is wide shouldered, but not a deep or round chest, but is broad across the hips, and has rather long legs and arms. His head is well shaped though not large, but is gracefully poised on a superb neck. A large and straight rather than a prominent nose; blue-gray penetrating eyes, which are widely separated, and overhung by a heavy brow. His face is long rather than broad, with high, round cheek-bones, and terminates in a good firm chin. He has a clear though rather colorless pale skin, which burns with the sun. A pleasing, benevolent."

though commanding countenance, dark brown hair, which he wears in a cue.

"His mouth is large and generally firmly closed, but which from time to time discloses some defective teeth. His features are regular and placid, with all the muscles of his face under perfect control, though flexible and expressive of deep feeling when moved by emotions. In conversation he looks you full in the face, is deliberate, deferential and engaging. His voice is agreeable rather than strong. His movements and gestures are graceful, his walk majestic, and he is a splendid horseman."

JEDIDIAH MORSE (1789)

"General Washington in his person was tall, upright, and well made; in his manner easy and unaffected. His eyes were of a bluish cast, not prominent, indicative of deep thoughtfulness, and when in action, on great occasions remarkably lively. His features strong, manly, and commanding; his temper reserved and serious; his countenance grave, composed, and sensible. There was in his whole appearance an unusual dignity and gracefulness which at once secured him profound respect, and cordial esteem. He seemed born to command his fellow men."

ABBE CLAUDE C. ROBIN (1781)

"Tall and noble stature, well proportioned, a fine, cheerful, open countenance, a simple and modest carriage; and his whole mien has something in it that interests the French, the Americans, and even enemies themselves in his favor."

DR. JAMES THACHER (1778)

"The personal appearance of our Commander in Chief, is that of the perfect gentleman and accomplished warrior. He is remarkably tall, full six feet, erect and well proportioned. The strength and proportion of his joints and muscles, appear to be commensurate with the preeminent powers of his mind. The serenity of his countenance, and majestic gracefulness of his deportment, impart a strong impression of that dignity and grandeur, which are his peculiar characteristics, and no one can stand in his presence without feeling the ascendancy of his mind, and associating with his countenance the idea of wisdom, philanthropy, magnanimity, and patriotism. There is a fine symmetry in the features of his face indicative of a benign and dignified spirit. His nose is strait, and his eyes inclined to blue. He wears his hair in a becoming cue, and from his forehead it is turned back and powdered in a manner which adds to the military air of his appearance. He displays a native gravity, but devoid of all appearance of ostentation. His uniform dress is a blue coat, with two brilliant epaulettes, buff colored under clothes, and a three cornered hat with a black cockade. He is constantly equipped with an elegant small sword, boots and spurs, in readiness to mount his noble charger."

DR. JAMES THACHER (1779)

"Yesterday I accompanied Major Cavil to headquarters, and had the honor of being numbered among the guests at the table of his Excellency, with his lady, . . . It is natural to view with keen attention the countenance of an illustrious man, with a secret hope of discovering in his features some peculiar traces of excellence, which distinguishes him from and elevates him above his fellow mortals. These expectations are realized in a peculiar manner, in viewing the person of General Washington. His tall and noble and just proportions, cheerful open countenance, simple and modest deportment, are all calculated to interest every beholder in his favor, and to command veneration and respect. He is feared even when silent, and beloved even while we are unconscious of the motive. . . . In conversation, his Excellency's expressive countenance is peculiarly interesting and pleasing; a placid smile is frequently observed on his lips, but a loud laugh, it is said, seldom if ever escapes him. He is polite and attentive to each individual at table, and retires after the compliment of a few glasses.

EDWARD THORNTON, OF ENGLISH LEGATION (1792)

"His person is tall and sufficiently graceful; his face well formed, his complexion rather pale, with a mild philosophic gravity in the expression of it. In his air and manner he displays much natural dignity; in his address he is cold, reserved, and even phlegmatic, though without the least appearance of haughtiness or ill-nature; it is the effect, I imagine, of constitutional diffidence. That caution and circumspection which form so striking and well known a feature in his military, and indeed, in his political character, is very strongly marked in his countenance, for his eyes retire inward (do you understand me?) and have nothing of fire of animation or openness in their expression."

HENRY WANSEY (1795)

"The President in his person is tall and thin, but exact; rather of an engaging than a dignified presence. He appears very thoughtful, is slow in delivering himself, which occasions some to conclude him reserved, but it is rather, I apprehend, the effect of much thinking and reflection, for there is great appearance to me of affability and accommodation. He was at this time in his sixty-third year . . . but he has very little the appearance of age, having been all his life long so exceeding temperate."

ISAAC WELD (1797)

"His chest is full; and his limbs, though rather slender, well shaped and muscular. His head is small, in which respect he resembles the make of a great number of his countrymen. His eyes are of a light grey colour; and in proportion to the length of his face, his nose is long. Mr. Stewart, the eminent portrait painter, told me, that there were features in his face totally different from what he ever observed in that of any other human being; the sockets for the eyes, for instance, are larger than what he ever met with before, and the upper part of the nose broader. All his features, he observed, were indicative of the strongest and most ungovernable passions, and had he been born in the forests, it was his opinion that he would have been the fiercest man among the savage tribes."

Part II

Character and Service

DELEGATE JOHN ADAMS
(1775, 1776)

"I can now inform you that the Congress have made choice of the modest and virtuous, the amiable, generous and brave George Washington, Esquire to be General of the American army, and that he is to repair, as soon as possible, to the camp before Boston. This appointment will have a great effect in cementing and securing the union of these colonies.

"There is something charming to me in the conduct of Washington. A gentleman of one of the first fortunes upon the continent, leaving his delicious retirement, his family and friends, sacrificing his ease, and hazarding all in the cause of his country! His views are noble and disinterested. He declared, when he accepted the mighty trust, that he would lay before us an exact account of his expenses, and not accept a shilling for pay."

"I congratulate you, Sir, as well as all the Friends of Mankind on the Reduction of Boston, an event which appeared to me of so great and decisive importance, that the next Morning after the Arrival of the News, I did myself the honour to move, for the Thanks of Congress to your Excellency and that a Medal of Gold Should be Struck in commemoration of it. Congress have been pleased to appoint me, with two other Gentlemen to prepare a Device."

PRESIDENT JOHN ADAMS (1799)

"I have seen him in the days of adversity, in some of the scenes of his deepest distress and most trying perplexities; I have also attended him in his highest elevation and most prosperous felicity; with uniform admiration of his wisdom, moderation, and constancy. . . . Malice could never blast his honour, and envy made him a singular exception to her universal rule. For himself he had lived enough, to life and to glory. For his fellow-citizens, if their prayers could have been answered, he would have been immortal. For me, his departure is at a most unfortunate moment. . . . His example is now complete, and it will teach wisdom and virtue to magistrates, citizens, and men, not only in the present age, but in future generations, as long as our history shall be read."

REPRESENTATIVE FISHER AMES

"However his military fame may excite the wonder of mankind, it is chiefly by his civil magistracy that his example will instruct them. Great generals have arisen in all ages of the world, and perhaps most in those of despotism and darkness. In times of violence and convulsion, they rise by the force of the whirlwind, high enough to ride in it, and direct the storm. . . . But such a Chief Magistrate as Washington appears like the pole star in a clear sky, to direct the skilful statesman. His presidency will form an epoch, and be distinguished as the age of Washington. Already it assumes its high place in the political region. Like the milky way, it whitens along its allotted portion of the hemisphere. The latest generations of men will survey through the telescope of history."

JOHN BELL (1779)

"He has an excellent understanding without much quickness; is strictly just, vigilant, and generous; an affectionate husband, a faithful friend, a father to the deserving soldier; gentle in his manners, in temper rather reserved; a total stranger to religious prejudices, which have so often excited Christians of one denomination to cut the throats of those of another; in his morals irreproachable; he was never known to exceed the bounds of the most rigid temperance; in a word, all his friends and acquaintances universally allow, that no man ever united in his own person a more perfect alliance of the virtues of a philosopher with the talents of a general. Candour, sincerity, affability, and simplicity, seem to be the striking features of his character, till an occasion offers of displaying the more determined bravery and independence of spirit. General Washington having never been to Europe, could not possibly have seen much military service when the armies of Britain were sent to subdue us; yet still, for a variety of reasons, he was by much the most proper man on this continent, and probably any where else, to be placed at the head of an American army. The very high estimation he stood in for integrity and honour, his engaging in the cause of his country from sentiment and a conviction of her wrongs, his moderation in politics, his extensive property, and his approved abilities as a commander, were motives which necessarily obliged the choice of America to fall upon him."

WILLIAM PAULETT CARY (1789)

"A stranger to profusion, yet generous in every instance where liberality was a virtue; during the late troubles, his fortune was employed in succouring merit, rewarding bravery, promoting discipline in the soldiery, and subordination to the new established government, in the citizens. At a time when the calamities incident to a state of civil warfare, fell heavy on all ranks, but principally on the middle class of his countrymen, his beneficence, which seemed to shun the public eye, would in all probability be lost in oblivion, but for the voice of those whom he freed from the accumulated miseries of famine, sickness and imprisonment."

"In whatever light we view the character of this truly great man we are struck with fresh cause for esteem and admiration: we every moment discover new and shining traits of humanity, of wisdom, and disinterested heroism: we see united in him the distinguished virtues of a good citizen, an experienced general, an upright senator, and a wise politician; we behold him rising superior to every mean consideration of self-love, hazarding his fortunes in the cause of freedom, cheerfully submitting to bear the name of rebel, and braving an ignominious death, to which he would inevitably have fallen a sacrifice, had Britain triumphed in the contest: we behold him furnishing an example the most interesting to humanity, and capable of nerving the palsied arm of age, or even of cowardise itself. . . ."

DELEGATE ABRAHAM CLARK (1777)

"I believe the General is honest, but I think him fallible."

DELEGATE SILAS DEANE (1775)

"General Washington will be with You soon, possibly by the Time You receive This. His Election was unanimous, his acceptance of the high Trust, modest and polite, his Character I need not enlarge on but will only say to his honor, that he is said to be as fixed and resolute in having his Orders on all Occasions executed, as he is cool and deliberate, in giving them."

GENERAL NATHANAEL GREENE

"His Excellency, General, has arrived amongst us, universally admired. Joy was visible on every countenance, and it seemed as if the spirit of conquest breathed through the whole army. I hope we shall be taught, to copy his example, and to prefer the love of liberty, in this time of public danger to all the soft pleasures of domestic life, and support ourselves with manly fortitude amidst all the dangers and hardships that attend a state of war. And I doubt not, under the General's wise direction, we shall establish such excellent order and strictness of discipline as to invite victory to attend him wherever he goes."

"Greater powers must be lodged in the hands of the General than he has ever yet exercised. . . . I can assure you that the General will not exceed his powers, though he may sacrifice the cause. There never was a man that might be more safely trusted, nor a time when there was a louder call."

COLONEL ALEXANDER HAMILTON
(1778)

"The general I always revered and loved ever since I knew him, but in this instance he rose superior to himself. Every lip dwells on his praise, for even his pretended friends (for none dare to acknowledge themselves his enemies) are obliged to croak it forth."

DELEGATE ALEXANDER HAMILTON
(1783)

"The Commander was already become extremely unpopular, among almost all ranks, from his known dislike to every unlawful proceeding; that this unpopularity was daily increasing and industriously promoted by many leading characters; that his choice of unfit and indiscreet persons into his family was the pretext, and with some the real motive; but the substantial one, a desire to displace him from the respect and confidence of the army, in order to substitute General ———, as the conductor of their efforts to obtain justice. Mr. Hamilton said that he knew General Washington intimately and perfectly; that his extreme reserve, mixed sometimes with a degree of asperity of temper, both of which were said to have increased of late, had contributed to the decline of his popularity; but that his virtue, his patriotism and firmness, would, it might be depended upon, never yield to any dishonorable or disloyal plans into which he might be called; that he would suffer himself to be cut to pieces."

PRESIDENT JOHN HANCOCK (1775)

"The Congress have appointed George Washington, Esqr., General and Commander in Chief of the Continental Army. His Commission is made out and I shall Sign it to morrow. He is a Gentleman you will all like. I submit to you the propriety of providing a suitable place for his Residence and the mode of his Reception. Pray tell Genl. Ward of this with my Respects, and that we all Expect to hear that the Military Movements of the Day of his Arrival will be such as to do him and the Commander in Chief great honour. . . . General Washington will set out in a few Days. . . . Pray do him every honour. By all means have his Commission read at the head of the whole Forces."

DELEGATE PATRICK HENRY (1774)

"When Patrick Henry was asked 'whom he thought the greatest man in Congress,' he replied: 'If you speak of eloquence, Mr. Rutledge of South Carolina is by far the greatest orator, but if you speak of solid information and sound judgment, Colonel Washington is unquestionably the greatest man on that floor.'"

EX-PRESIDENT THOMAS JEFFERSON (1814)

"His mind was great and powerful, with out being of the very first order; his penetration strong, though not so acute as that of a Newton, Bacon or Locke; and as far as he saw, no judgment was ever sounder. It was slow in operation, being little aided by invention or imagination, but sure in conclusion. Hence the common remark of his officers, of the advantage he derived from councils of war, where, hearing all suggestions, he selected whatever was best; and certainly no general ever planned his battles more judiciously. But if deranged during the course of the action, if any member of his plan was dislocated by sudden circumstances, he was slow in a readjustment. The consequence was, that he often failed in the field, and rarely against an enemy in station, as at Boston and York. He was incapable of fear, meeting personal dangers with the calmest unconcern. Perhaps the strongest feature in his character was prudence, never acting until every circumstance, every consideration, was maturely weighed; refraining if he saw a doubt, but, when once decided, going through with his purpose, whatever obstacles opposed. His integrity was most pure, his justice the most inflexible I have ever known, no motives of interest or consanguinity, of friendship or hatred, being able to bias his decision. He was, indeed, in every sense of the word, a wise, a good, and a great man. His temper was naturally irritable and high-toned; but reflection and resolution had obtained a firm and habitual ascendancy over it. If ever, however, it broke its bonds, he was most tremendous in his wrath. . . .

"On the whole, his character was, in its mass, perfect, in nothing bad, in few points indifferent; and it may truly be said that never did nature and fortune combine more perfectly to make a man great, and to place him in the same constellation with whatever worthies have merited from man an everlasting remembrance. For his was the singular destiny and merit of leading the armies of his country successfully through an arduous war, for the establishment of its independence; of conducting its councils through the birth of a government, new in its forms and principles, until it had settled down into a quiet and orderly train; and of scrupulously obeying the laws through the whole of his career, civil and military, of which the history of the world furnishes no other example."

REPRESENTATIVE HENLY LEE (1799)

"Will you go with me to the banks of the Monongahela, to see your youthful Washington, supporting, in the dismal hour of Indian victory, the ill fated Braddock; and saving by his judgment and his valour; the remains of a defeated army, pressed by the conquering savage foe? or, when — oppressed America nobly resolving to risk her all in defense of her violated rights—he was elevated by the unanimous voice of Congress to the command of her armies? . . .

"Who is there that has forgotten the vales of Brandywine—the fields of Germantown—or the plains of Monmouth? Every where present, wants of every kind obstructing, numerous and valiant armies encountering, himself a host, he assuaged our sufferings, limited our privations, and upheld our tottering Republic. . . .

"Possessing a clear and penetrating mind, a strong and sound judgment, calmness and temper for deliberation, with invincible firmness and perseverance in resolution maturely formed, drawing information from all, acting for himself, with incorruptible integrity and unvarying patriotism: his own superiority and the public confidence alike marked him as the man designed by heaven to lead in the great political as well as military events which have distinguished the era of his life. . . .

"First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen, he was second to none in the humble and endearing scenes of private life: Pious, just, humane, temperate, and sincere; uniform, dignified, and commanding; his example was as edifying to all around him as were the effects of that example lasting.

"To his equals he was condescending; to his inferiors kind, and to the dear object of his affection exemplarily tender: Correct throughout, vice shuddered in his presence, and virtue always felt his fostering hand; the purity of his private character gave effulgence to his public virtues. . . . Such was the man for whom our nation mourns."

TUTOR EBENEZER GRANT MARSH OF YALE (1800)

"Resolute and undejected in misfortunes, he rose superior to distresses, and surmounted difficulties, which no courage, no constancy, but his own, would have resisted. His letters during his most gloomy prospects, announce a hero, conscious of his danger, but still deriving a well grounded hope from the resources of his own mind. His valor was never unequal to his duty or the occasion. He attempted things with means that appeared totally inadequate, and successfully prosecuted what he had boldly resolved. He was never disheartened by difficulties, but had that vigor of mind, which, instead of bending to opposition, rises above it, and seems to have a power of controlling even fortune itself. His character combined a cool and penetrating judgement and prompt decision, caution and intrepidity, patience and enterprise, generous tenderness and compassion, with undaunted heroism. . . .

"In no situation did Washington appear more truly great than at the helm of our federal government. Here he displayed an astonishing extent and precision of political integrity, an incorruptible heart, a constant attention to the grand principles of rational liberty, and an invariable attachment to his country. His genius was equal to the most enlarged views, and minute details, of civil policy. A vigorous mind, improved by the experience and study of mankind, dexterity and application in business, a judicious mixture of liberality and economy. Steadiness to pursue his ends, and flexibility to vary his means, marked his administration. He guided the passions of others, because he was master of his own."

REPRESENTATIVE JOHN MARSHALL (1799)

"Our Washington is no more! The Hero, the Sage and the Patriot of America—the man on whom in times of danger, every eye was turned, and all hopes were placed—lives now, only in his own great actions, and in the hearts of an affectionate and afflicted people. . . .

"More than any other individual, and as much as to one individual was possible, has he contributed to found this our wide spreading empire, and to give to the western world its independence and its freedom. . . .

"Having effected the great object for which he was placed at the head of our armies, we have seen him convert the sword into the plowshare, and voluntarily sinking the soldier in the citizen. . . .

"We have seen him once more quit the retirement he loved, and in a season more stormy and tempestuous than war itself, with calm and wise determination, pursue the true interests of the nation and contribute, more than any other could contribute, to the establishment of that system of policy which will, I trust, yet preserve our peace, our honour and our independence."

CHIEF JUSTICE JOHN MARSHALL (1804)

"The day finally came when his work was finished, and he could be, as he phrased it, 'translated into a private citizen.' Marshall describes the scene as follows: 'At noon, the principal officers of the army assembled at France's [sic] tavern; soon after which, their beloved commander entered the room. His emotions were too strong to be concealed. Filling a glass, he turned to them and said, 'With a heart full of love and gratitude, I now take leave of you: I most devoutly wish that your latter days may be as prosperous and happy, as your former ones have been glorious and honorable." Having drunk, he added: "I cannot come to each of you to take my leave; but shall be obliged to you, if each of you will come and take me by the hand." General Knox, being nearest, turned to him. Incapable of utterance, Washington grasped his hand, and embraced him. In the same affectionate manner he took leave of each succeeding officer. In every eye was the tear of dignified sensibility, and not a word was articulated to interrupt the majestic silence, and the tenderness of the scene."

EX-MINISTER GOUVERNEUR MORRIS
(1799)

"Born to high destinies, he was fashioned for them by the hand of nature. His form was noble—his port majestic. On his front were enthroned the virtues which exalt, and those which adorn the human character. So dignified his deportment, no man could approach him but with respect—none was great in his presence. You have all seen him, and you all have felt the reverence he inspired. . . . His judgement was always clear, because his mind was pure. And seldom, if ever, will a sound understanding be met in the company of a corrupt heart. . . . In him were the courage of a soldier, the intrepidity of a chief, the fortitude of a hero. He had given to the impulsions of bravery all the calmness of his character, and, if in the moment of danger, his manner was distinguishable from that of common life, it was by superior ease and grace. . . . Knowing how to appreciate the world, its gifts and glories, he was truly wise. Wise also in selecting the objects of his pursuit. And wise in adopting just means to compass honorable ends."

DELEGATE ROBERT MORRIS (1777)

"Remember, my good Sir, that few men can keep their feelings to themselves, and that it is necessary for example's sake, that all leaders should feel and think boldly in order to inspire others, who look up to them. Heaven, no doubt for the noblest purposes, has blessed you with a firmness of mind, steadiness of countenance, and patience in sufferings, that give you infinite advantages over other men. This being the case, you are not to depend on other people's exertions being equal to your own. One mind feeds and thrives on misfortunes by finding resources to get the better of them; another sinks under their weight, thinking it impossible to resist; and, as the latter description probably includes the majority of mankind, we must be cautious of alarming them."

JEDIDIAH MORSE (1789)

"It is hoped posterity will be taught, in what manner he transformed an undisciplined body of peasantry into a regular army of soldiers. Commentaries on his campaigns would undoubtedly be highly interesting and instructive to future generations. The conduct of the first campaign, in compelling the British troops to abandon Boston by a bloodless victory, will merit minute narration. But a volume would scarcely contain the mortifications he experienced and the hazards to which he was exposed in 1776 and 1777, in contending against the prowess of Britain, with an inadequate force. His good destiny and consummate prudence prevented want of success from producing want of confidence on the part of the public; for want of success is apt to lead to the adoption of pernicious counsels through the levity of the people or the ambition of their demagogues."

GOVERNOR AND COUNCIL OF NORTH CAROLINA (1790)

"We congratulate ourselves with equal sincerity in beholding you, Sir, in the high department which your virtues merited, and to which your country unanimously and gratefully appointed you. The importance of your situation receives additional dignity by the veneration your Country possesses for your character, and from a confidence that every power vested in you by the Constitution will be exerted for the happiness and prosperity of our country. . . . We have just received the happy information of your recovery from a disorder which threatened your life; a life we may truly say as necessary as dear to us:—With grateful hearts we return thanks to the great Disposer of events for this beneficent mark of his attention in preserving you. May it long be shewn in continuing you among us, and when the awful day comes which is to separate you from us, may you receive the reward of those virtues, which he only can give."

AN OFFICER (1777)

"Our army love their General very much, but they have one thing against him, which is the little care he takes of himself in any action. His personal bravery, and the desire he has of animating his troops by example, make him fearless of danger. This occasions us much uneasiness. But Heaven, which has hitherto been his shield, I hope will still continue to guard so valuable a life."

TIMOTHY PICKERING (1811)

"To the excellency of his virtues I am not disposed to set any limits. All his views were upright, all his actions just."

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
(1799)

"With patriotic pride, we review the life of our Washington, and compare him with those of other countries who have been pre-eminent in fame. Ancient and modern names are diminished before him. Greatness and guilt have too often been allied; but his fame is whiter than it is brilliant. The destroyers of nations stood abashed at the majesty of his virtue. It reproved the intemperance of their ambition, and darkened the splendor of victory. . . . Let his countrymen consecrate the memory of the heroic General, the patriotic Statesman, and the virtuous Sage; let them teach their children never to forget that the fruit of his labours and his example, are their inheritance."

PRESIDENT SMITH OF NEW JERSEY
COLLEGE (1800)

"Washington was always equal to himself. There was a dignity in the manner in which he performed the smallest things. A majesty surrounded him that seemed to humble those who approached him, at the same time that there was a benignity in his manner that invited their confidence and esteem. His virtues, always elevated and splendid, shone only with a milder light by being placed in the vale of retirement. He was sincere, modest, upright, humane; a friend of religion; the idol of his neighbors as well as of his country; magnificent in his hospitality, but plain in his manners, and simple in his equipage. . . .

"His whole character was consistent. Equally industrious with his plough as with his sword, he esteemed idleness and inutility the greatest disgrace of man, whose powers attain perfection only by constant and vigorous action, and who is placed by providence in so many social relations, only to do good. Every thing round him was marked with a dignified simplicity. . . . The virtues and the talents which, in other instances, are divided among many, are combined in him."

"The following are recollections of Washington, derived from repeated opportunities of seeing him during the last three years of his public life. He was over six feet in stature; of strong, bony, muscular frame, without fulness of covering, well formed and straight. He was a man of most extraordinary physical strength. In his own house his action was calm, deliberate, and dignified, without pretension to gracefulness, or peculiar manner, but merely natural, and such as one would think it should be in such a man. When walking in the street, his movement had not the soldierly air which might be expected. His habitual motions had been formed before he took command of the American armies, in the wars of the interior, and in the surveying of wilderness lands, employments in which grace and elegance were not likely to be acquired. At the age of sixty-five, time had done nothing toward bending him out of his natural erectness. His deportment was invariably grave; it was sobriety that stopped short of sadness. His presence inspired a veneration, and a feeling of awe, rarely experienced in the presence of any man. His mode of speaking was slow and deliberate, not as though he was in search of fine words, but that he might utter those only adapted to his purpose. It was the usage of all persons in good society to attend Mrs. Washington's levee every Friday evening. He was always present. The young ladies used to throng around him, and engage him in conversation. There were some of the well-remembered belles of that day who imagined themselves to be favorites with him. As these were the only opportunities which they had of conversing with him, they were disposed to use them. One would think, that a gentleman and a gallant soldier, if he could ever laugh or dress his countenance in smiles, would do so when surrounded by young and admiring beauties. But this was never so; the countenance of Washington never softened; nor changed its habitual gravity. One who had lived always in his family said, that his manner in public life was always the same. Being asked whether Washington could laugh: this person said, that this was a rare occurrence, but one instance was remembered when he laughed most heartily at her narration of an incident in which she was a party concerned; and in which he applauded her agency. The late General Cobb, who was long a member of his family during the war, (and who enjoyed a laugh as much as any man could,) said, that he never saw Washington laugh, excepting when Colonel Scammel (if this was the person) came to dine at headquarters. Scammel had a fund of ludicrous anecdotes, and a manner of telling them, which relaxed even the gravity of the commander-in-chief."

MILITARY SECRETARY TENCH TILGHMAN (1777)

"If it please God to spare the life of the honestest man that I believe ever adorned human nature, I have no doubt of . . . [freedom]. I think I know the sentiments of his heart, and in prosperity and adversity I never knew him utter a wish or drop an expression that did not tend to the good of his country, regardless of his own interest. He is blessed wherever he goes, for the tory is protected in person and property equally with the whig; and indeed I often think more, for it is his maxim to convert by good usage and not by severity."

VIRGINIA INSCRIPTION ON THE HOUDON STATUE (1784)

"The General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Virginia have caused this statue to be erected as a Monument of Affection and Gratitude to George Washington, who, uniting to the Endowments of the Hero the Virtues of the Patriot, and exerting both in establishing the Liberties of his Country, has rendered his Name dear to his Fellow Citizens, and given the World an immortal Example of true Glory."

Part III World Status

"AMERICAN GENTLEMAN NOW IN LONDON" (1779)

"General Washington, altho' advanced in years, is remarkably healthy, takes a great deal of exercise, and is very fond of riding on a favorite white horse; he is very reserved, and loves retirement. When out of camp he has only a single servant attending him, and when he returns within the lines a few of the light horse escort him to his tent. When he has any great object in view he sends for a few of the officers of whose abilities he has a high opinion, and states his present plan among half a dozen others, to all which they give their separate judgments: by these means he gets all their opinions, without divulging his intentions. He has no tincture of pride, and will often converse with a sentinel with more freedom than he would with a general officer. He is very shy and reserved to foreigners, altho' they have letters of recommendation, from the Congress. He punishes neglect of duty with great severity, but is very tender and indulgent to recruits until they learn the articles of war and their exercise perfectly. He has a great antipathy to spies, although he employs them himself, and has an utter aversion to all Indians. He regularly attends divine service in his tent every morning and evening, and seems very fervent in his prayers. He is so tender-hearted, that no soldiers must be flogged nigh his tent, or if he is walking in the camp, and sees a man tied to the halberds, he will either order him to be taken down, or walk another way to avoid his sight. He has made the art of war his particular study; his plans are in general good and well digested;

he is particularly careful always of securing a retreat, but his chief qualifications are steadiness, perseverance, and secrecy; any act of bravery he is sure to reward, and make a short eulogium on the occasion to the person and his fellow soldiers (if it be a soldier) in the ranks. He is humane to the prisoners who fall into his hands, and orders everything necessary for their relief. He is very temperate in his diet, and the only luxury he indulges himself in, is a few glasses of punch after supper."

CLAUDE BLANCHARD (1781)

"This day General Washington, who was expected, arrived [at Newport] about two o'clock. He first went to the Duc de Burgoyne, where all our generals were. He then landed; all the troops were under arms; I was presented to him. His face is handsome, noble and mild. He is tall (at the least, five feet, eight inches). In the evening, I was at supper with him. I mark as a fortunate day, that in which I have been able to behold a man so truly great."

JEAN PIERRE BRISSOT DE WARVILLE (1791)

"He shows the utmost reserve, and is very diffident; but, at the same time, he is firm and unchangeable in whatever he undertakes. His modesty must be very astonishing, especially to a Frenchman. He speaks of the American war as if he had not directed it; and of his victories with an indifference which strangers even would not affect. I never saw him divest himself of that coolness by which he is characterized, and become warm but when speaking of the present state of America. . . . He spoke to me of M. La Fayette with tenderness. He regarded him as his son; and foresaw with a joy mixed with anxiety, the part he was about to play in the revolution preparing in France."

PRINCE DE BROGLIE (1782)

"His physiognomy is mild and open. His accost cold although polite. His pensive eyes seem more attentive than sparkling; but their expression is benevolent, noble and self-possessed. In his private conduct, he preserves that polite and attentive good breeding which satisfies everybody, and that dignified reserve which offends no one. He is a foe to ostentation and to vain-glory. His temper is always even. He has never testified the least humor. Modest even to humility, he does not seem to estimate himself at his true worth. He receives with perfect grace all the homages which are paid him, but he evades rather than seeks them. . . .

"Mr. Washington's first military services were against the French in the War for Canada. He had no opportunity for distinguishing himself, and after the defeat of Braddock, the war having crossed the river St. Lawrence, and the Virginia militia of which he was a Colonel having been sent home, he was not kept in active service; whereupon he retired to his plantation where he lived like a philosopher.

"His estate was quite distant from the seat of the English government, the real hot-bed of the insurrection; and his wise character withheld him still further from mixing in its movements, so that he had but little share in the first troubles.

"On the breaking out of hostilities with the mother-country, every body wished a chief who joined a profound sagacity to the advantage of having had military experience. All eyes turned toward Washington, and he was unanimously called to the command of the army. The course of events justified the choice. Never was there a man better fitted to command the Americans, and his conduct throughout developed the greatest foresight, steadiness and wisdom."

LORD BYRON (1818-1821)

"Can tyrants but by tyrants conquer'd be,
And freedom find no champion and no child

Such as Columbia saw arise when she Sprung forth a Pallas, arm'd and undefiled?

Or must such minds be nourish'd in the wild,
Deep in the unpruned forest 'midst the roar

Of cataracts, where nursing Nature smiled
On infant Washington? Has Earth no more

Such seeds within her breast, or Europe no such shore?"

"Not so Leonidas and Washington,
Whose every battle-field is holy ground,
Which breathes of nations saved, not worlds undone.

How sweetly on the ear such echoes sound!

While the mere victor's may appal or stun
The servile and the vain, such names will be

A watchword till the future shall be free."

"Great men have always scorn'd great recompenses; . . .

George Washington had thanks and nought beside,

Except the all-cloudless glory (which few men's is)

To free his country."

"While Franklin's quiet memory climbs to Heaven,

Calming the lightning which he thence had riven,

Or drawing from the no less kindled earth
Freedom and peace to that which boasts his birth;

While Washington's a watchword, such as ne'er

PHILLIPS CALLBECK (1775)

[American armed vessels took prisoners on the island of St. John's and pillaged defenceless inhabitants. Such conduct, however, could not fail to excite the indignation of the commander-in-chief and he released the captives immediately, and orders were given for restoring the goods. The following note was written by Mr. Callbeck, one of the captured officials.]

"I should ill deserve the generous treatment, which your Excellency has been pleased to show me, had I not gratitude to acknowledge so great a favor. I cannot ascribe any part of it to my own merit, but must impute the whole to the philanthropy and humane disposition, that so truly characterize General Washington. Be so obliging, therefore, as to accept the only return in my power, that of my grateful thanks."

MARQUIS DE CHASTELLUX (1781)

"I wish only to express the impression General Washington has left on my mind; the idea of a perfect whole, that cannot be the produce of enthusiasm, which rather would reject it, since the effect of proportion is to diminish the idea of greatness. Brave without temerity, laborious without ambition, generous without prodigality, noble without pride, virtuous without severity; he seems always to have confined himself within those limits, where the virtues, by clothing themselves in more lively, but more changeable and doubtful colours, may be mistaken for faults. This is the seventh year that he has commanded the army, and that he has obeyed the Congress; more need not be said, especially in America, where they know how to appreciate all the merit contained in this simple fact. . . .

"It will be said of him, AT THE END OF A LONG CIVIL WAR, HE HAD NOTHING WITH WHICH HE COULD REPROACH HIMSELF. If anything can be more marvellous than such a character, it is unanimity of the public suffrages in his favour. Soldiers, magistrates, people, all love and admire him; all speak of him in terms of tenderness and veneration. Does there then exist a virtue capable of restraining the injustice of mankind; or are glory and happiness too recently established in America, for Envy to have deigned to pass the seas?"

PETER S. DU PONCEAU (1778)

"General Washington received the Baron [Steuben] with great cordiality, and to me he showed much condescending attention. I cannot describe the impression that the first sight of that great man made upon me. I could not keep my eyes from that imposing countenance—grave, yet not severe; affable, without familiarity. Its predominant expression was calm dignity, through which you could trace the strong feelings of the patriot, and discern the father as well as the commander of his soldiers. I have never seen a picture that represents him to me as I saw him at Valley Forge, and during the campaigns in which I had the honor to follow him. Perhaps that expression was beyond the skill of the painter; but while I live it will remain impressed on my memory. I had frequent opportunities of seeing him, as it was my duty to accompany the Baron when he dined with him, which was sometimes twice or thrice in the same week."

COUNT AXEL DE FERSEN (1780)

"I was at Hartford, . . . with M. de Rochambeau. . . . M. de Rochambeau sent me in advance, to announce his arrival, and I had time to see this man, illustrious, if not unique in our century. His handsome and majestic, while at the same time mild and open countenance perfectly reflects his moral qualities; he looks the hero; he is very cold; speaks little, but is courteous and frank. A shade of sadness overshadows his countenance, which is not unbecoming, and gives him an interesting air."

LOUIS, COUNT DE FONTANES (1800)

"The people who so lately stigmatized Washington as a rebel, regard even the enfranchisement of America, as one of the events consecrated by history and past ages. Such is the veneration excited by great characters. He seems so little to belong to modern times, that he imparts to us the same vivid impressions as the most august examples of antiquity with all that they accomplished. His work is scarcely finished when it at once attracts the veneration which we freely accord to those achievements only that are consecrated by time. The American revolution, the contemporary of our own, is fixed forever. Washington began it with energy, and finished it with moderation. He knew how to maintain it, pursuing always the prosperity of his country; and this aim alone can justify at the tribunal of the Most High, enterprises so extraordinary.

"His administration was as mild and firm in internal affairs as it was noble and prudent toward foreign nations. He uniformly respected the usages of other countries, as he would desire the rights of Americans to be respected by them. Thus in all his negotiations, the heroic simplicity of the President of the United States, without elevation or debasement, was brought into communication with the majesty of Kings. He sought not in his administration those conceptions which the age calls great, but which he regarded as vain. His ideas were more sage than bold; he sought not admiration, but he always enjoyed esteem, alike in the field and in the Senate, in the midst of business as in the quiet of retirement."

MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT CHARLES JAMES FOX (1794)

"And here, Sir, I cannot help alluding to the President of the United States, General Washington, a character whose conduct has been so different from that, which has been pursued by the ministers of this country. How infinitely wiser must appear the spirit and principles manifested in his late address to Congress, than the policy of modern European courts! Illustrious man, deriving honor less from the splendor of his situation than from the dignity of his mind; before whom all borrowed greatness sinks into significance, and all the potentates of Europe (excepting the members of our own royal family) become little and contemptible! He has had no occasion to have recourse to any tricks of policy or arts of alarm; his authority has been sufficiently supported by the same means by which it was acquired, and his conduct has uniformly been characterized by wisdom, moderation and firmness."

MINISTER CONRAD A. GERARD
(1779)

"I have had many conversations with General Washington. . . . I have formed as high an opinion of the powers of his mind, his moderation, his patriotism, and his virtues, as I had before from common report conceived of his military talents and of the incalculable services he has rendered to his country."

CHEVALIER ANNE C. DE LA
LUZERNE (1784)

"The estate of General Washington not being more than fifteen leagues from Annapolis I accepted an invitation that he gave me to go and pass several days there, and it is from his house that I have the honor to write to you. After having seen him on my arrival on this continent, in the midst of his camp and in the tumult of arms, I have the pleasure to see him a simple citizen, enjoying in the repose of his retreat the glory which he so justly acquired. . . . He dresses in a gray coat like a Virginia farmer, and nothing about him recalls the recollections of the important part which he has played except the great number of foreigners who come to see him."

JOSEPH MANDRILLON (1782)

"Imposing in size, noble and well proportioned, a countenance open, calm and sedate, but without any one striking feature, and when you depart from him, the remembrance only of a fine man will remain, a fine figure, an exterior plain and modest, a pleasing address, firm without severity, a manly courage, an uncommon capacity for grasping the whole scope of a subject, and a complete experience in war and politics; equally useful in the cabinet and in the field of Mars, the idol of his country, the admiration of the enemy he has fought and vanquished; modest in victory, great in the reverse; why do I say reverse! very far from being subdued he has made every misfortune contribute to his success. He knows how to obey as well as command, he never made use of his power or the submission of his army to derogate from the authority of his country or to disobey its commands."

PETER IVANOVITCH POLETICA
(1812)

"All the life of this man, worthy of eternal praise, can be compared to the cleanest of looking glasses. If one can not say that he was always above the situation he occupied, one can however assert that in any case he was always adequate to it. In his private life, Gen. Washington was always a loving husband, ardent and steadfast friend, a just master and a pious christian."

ABBE CLAUDE C. ROBIN (1781)

"He has ever shown himself superior to fortune, and in the most trying adversity has discovered resources till then unknown; and, as if his abilities only increased and dilated at the prospect of difficulty, he is never better supplied than when he seems destitute of everything, nor have his arms ever been so fatal to his enemies, as at the very instant when they thought they had crushed him for ever. . . .

"Old men, women, and children, press about him when he accidentally passes along, and think themselves happy, once in their lives, to have seen him—they follow him through the towns with torches, and celebrate his arrival by public illuminations. The Americans, that cool and sedate people, who in the midst of their most trying difficulties, have attended only to the directions and impulses of plain method and common sense, are roused, animated, and inflamed at the very mention of his name: and the first songs that sentiment or gratitude has dictated, have been to celebrate General Washington."

COMTE DE SEGUR (1782)

"One of my most earnest wishes was to see Washington, the hero of America. He was then encamped at a short distance from us, and the Count de Rochambeau was kind enough to introduce me to him. Too often reality disappoints the expectations our imagination had raised, and admiration diminishes by a too near view of the object upon which it had been bestowed; but, on seeing General Washington, I found a perfect similarity between the impression produced upon me by his aspect, and the idea I had formed of him. His exterior disclosed, as it were, the history of his life: simplicity, grandeur, dignity, calmness, goodness, firmness, the attributes of his character, were also stamped upon his features, and in all his person. His stature was noble and elevated; the expression of his features mild and benevolent; his smile graceful and pleasing; his manners simple, without familiarity. . . . Washington, when I saw him, was forty-nine years of age. He endeavored modestly to avoid the marks of admiration and respect which were so anxiously offered to him, and yet no man ever knew better how to receive and to acknowledge them. He listened, with an obliging attention, to all those who addressed him, and the expression of his countenance had conveyed his answer before he spoke."

CHEVALIER DE SILLY (1781)

"Man is born with a tendency to pride and the further he progresses in his career in an elevated rank the more his self love nourishes this vice in him but so far this Washington although born with every superior quality adds to them an imposing modesty which will always cause him to be admired by those who have the good fortune to see him; as for esteem he has already drawn to himself that of all Europe even in the heart of his enemies and ours—'tandem oculi nostri, videuntur honorem et virtutem.'"

FRANCIS ADRIAN VAN DER KEMP
(1800)

"Washington's character was from his first entrance in public life through its whole course not only unimpeached but highly revered by all, who were admitted to his acquaintance. His active prudence was guided by his intrepid courage:—his vigilant mind, never appalled in the most distressing emergence, was always enliven'd by a manly devotion, and all these virtues, with a vivid sense of his own intrinsic value, were only equalled by his modesty. Remembering that he was a man, Washington made every reasonable allowance for the frailties of human nature, pardon'd its weaknesses, and pity'd her follies, as often they were not blackened by vices, or the Public welfare did not require the infliction of a severer punishment: . . .

"We wrong this eminent man M. H. [my hearers] in considering him alone as a General. Washington's claims, as a statesman, on our on Posterity's respectful regard, are equally solid. We Americans, assent with all heart to this self-evident truth. Lett Foreigners—to appreciate the solidity of our judgment, consider maturely Washington's admonitions—when he divested himself of the supreme command—dijudicate our Constitution, as a part of his egregious workmanship, and scrutinise his letter to the Individual states, as President of the Convention, and none of them will longer hesitate to go over in the steps of Columbia's sons. A constitution is adopted, and Washington unanimously chosen President of the United States. Here once more this great and good man sacrifices the delights of his retirement to the toils of a laborious life, for the benefit of his Country—with the same inimitable disinterestedness. What a large—what an immense field of glory for him, of stupefying amazement for us see I here opening!

"The sight of the General in his brightest glory is lost in the radiancy of this new Politic Luminary. Mine eyes are weakening—bedimmed—bedewed, but my heart in the same moment joyfully expanded by its benign all vivifying influence."

CHARLES VARLO (1784)

"I crossed the river from Maryland into Virginia, near the renowned General Washington's, where I had the honour to spend some time, and was kindly entertained with that worthy family. As to the General, if we may judge by the countenance, he is what the world says of him, a shrewd, good-natured, plain, humane man, about fifty-five years of age, and seems to wear well, being healthful and active, straight, well made, and about six feet high. He keeps a good table, which is always open to those of a genteel appearance. He does not use many Frenchified congees or flattering useless words without meaning, which savours more of deceit than an honest heart; but on the contrary, his words seem to point at truth and reason, and to spring from the fountain of a heart, which being good of itself, cannot be suspicious of others, till facts unriddle designs, . . .

"I have travelled and seen a great deal of the world, have conversed with all degrees of people, and have remarked that there are only two persons in the world which have every one's good word, and those are—the Queen of England and General Washington, which I never heard friend or foe speak slightly of."

HENRY WANSEY (1794)

"I confess, I was struck with awe and veneration, when I recollected that I was now in the presence of one of the greatest men upon earth—the GREAT WASHINGTON—the noble and wise benefactor of the world! . . . Whether we view him as a general in the field vested with unlimited authority and power, at the head of a victorious army; or in the cabinet, as the President of the United States; or as a private gentleman, cultivating his own farm; he is still the same great man, anxious only to discharge with propriety the duties of his relative situation. His conduct has always been so uniformly manly, honorable, just, patriotic, and disinterested, that his greatest enemies cannot fix on any one trait of his character that can deserve the least censure."

Selected Authorities

The biographies, biographical sketches, scenarios, addresses, and short comments on Washington run into the thousands; a classification of the most important of these will be found in Pamphlet 15 of this series. Comments printed during Washington's lifetime or soon after are, of course, long out of print and to be found usually only in the large libraries. Several of the books listed below bring together some of these early utterances; but for the most part, unless the tribute is in a work specially devoted to Washington, it is likely to be in a mass of unrelated material and not accessible. Hence the particular value of the present pamphlet. Three of the other books listed below are bibliographies, which will help to open up contemporary material for those desiring to search further.

George Washington and Religion

From a contemporary silhouette

YOUTHFUL EXPERIENCES

AN examination of the religion of George Washington should be unhampered by any allegiance to traditional reminiscences. While speculation in relation to certain controversial questions may be interesting, it is at best of doubtful value in arriving at definite historical conclusions and exerts an inevitable temptation to wander far afield in the realm of mere conjecture. The safe course in so important an investigation lies in consulting the incontestable evidences of religious faith left by George Washington himself. Therefore, in these pages the writer has carefully adhered to those references in relation to Washington's religion of established documentary authenticity.

George Washington was born on February 11, 1731 (old style calendar), or February 22, 1732 (new style calendar), and on April 5, a little less than two months later, was baptized in the orthodox Episcopalian manner; two god-fathers and one god-mother being recorded as standing for him.

After his baptism, George, in a religious way, disappears from view for a number of years, and when he again emerges he does so in a purely boyish character, for he scrawls his youthful signature over the title-page of his father's copy of the Sermons of the Bishop of Exeter. In this assault upon the title, or title-page, of a dignitary of the Established Church may be found, perhaps, the germ of the cherry tree and the I-cannot-tell-a-lie fable. Perhaps the cherry tree was really this book of sermons in arboreal disguise and the pen was the hatchet.

A man's religious ideas are peculiarly personal and to attempt an analysis of them after the man himself has passed off the stage of life is a difficult matter at best; but it does not solve the difficulty to present merely the laudatory opinions of his contemporaries. We cannot rest content with this in Washington's case and will try, therefore, to form an opinion by examining Washington's own self-record for: His personal record of church attendance; his estimate of the value of religious practices among the people at large; his desire and effort to encourage a recognition of God's goodness and to inculcate in the people a spirit of gratitude towards the Deity; and, lastly, his own expressions of opinion respecting God. An examination of these evidences as they develop in Washington's own writings will give a fairly balanced and accurate picture of Washington's religious attitude.

ON THE FRONTIER (1756)

The scanty material of his youthful days is relatively unimportant and the record practically starts with the time when he was commanding the Virginia troops on the western frontier, after Braddock's defeat. At Fort Loudoun, Winchester, at the age of twenty-four, this colonel of Virginia militia, on Saturday, September 18, 1756, ordered that "The men parade tomorrow morning at beating the long roll, with their arms and ammunition clean and in good order, and to be marched by the Sergeants of the respective companies to the Fort, there to remain until prayers are over." It is plain that the danger of an Indian surprise attack was a factor, as the men were sent to prayers under arms; also it is plain that Washington took it for granted that the officers would display some interest and was annoyed that they did not, for the next Saturday came a more pointed order: "The men are to parade at beating the long roll tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock; and to march as usual to the Fort to attend Divine Service. The officers are to be present at calling the roll, and see that the men do appear in the most decent manner they can." Every Sunday thereafter the men were marched to prayers and in the middle of November the Sunday service was made a standing order for the future.

CHURCH GOING (1759-1799)

We have no means of judging the effect of these rough, hard, and brutal years upon Washington's religious views, for there is nothing of value for this purpose in the record until after his marriage with Mrs. Custis and his settling down to a normal life at Mount Vernon. We cannot state positively that Washington became a church-goer, or a more consistent church-goer, after his marriage with Mrs. Custis, but scrutiny of the records induces the opinion that she was an influence in this respect. I have checked up, as closely as possible, his record of church attendance, from the earliest available date to the end of his life, and though there are unfortunate gaps which can never be filled, some interesting results are obtainable from the eighteen years for which data has survived.

After his marriage Washington attended church at Pohick, and, later, Christ Church, Alexandria, on an average of once a month. Both churches were distant from Mount Vernon so that it was something of a journey to reach them by coach and we find many entries in Washington's diaries of his being prevented from attending by the carriage being away from Mount Vernon, by his starting for church and having the carriage break down on the way (a commentary upon the state of the Virginia roads in colonial times), or of his nearly reaching Pohick, only to be met by a message that the minister was too sick to conduct the services. There are a few instances of Washington's illness and once he was held at home by the toothache.

A particularly interesting diary entry is that of May 4, 1760: "Set out for Fredk. to see my negroes that lay ill of the Small Pox. Took Church in my way to Coleman's." Most of us have forgotten that Washington rode post-haste, from Mount Vernon across the Blue Ridge, into the Shenandoah Valley to see that his slaves received proper care and attention. He collected doctors, nurses, medicines, and blankets and did everything humanly possible to aid. Of course the misanthrope will say that he was only interested in saving his property and that he ran no personal risk as he was immune from the disease; but if we grant this privilege to assign motives for actions, we are entitled to the same privilege ourselves and, in this case, we prefer to think that a decent humanity was an element of weight. If material welfare, the saving of slave property, was the main motive of this hurried journey, would it have risked an hour's delay? It seems reasonable to look upon this stop for church as a natural act of faith and trust in the Almighty.

The important point established by a close check up of Washington's church attendance is that throughout his public life, in times of political stress and strain, George Washington went to church oftener than he did in times of national calm and quiet. After the Stamp Act flurry subsided, Washington relapsed again into his once a month church attendance. On August 19, 1765, we have record of his taking the oath to conform to the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England "as by Law established" and during the year 1774, when political relations with the Mother Country were becoming dangerously strained and no one in the colonies was able to foresee the outcome, he went to church twice, and sometimes three times a month. It was on June 1, 1774, the day the Boston Port Bill went into effect, that he "went to Church and fasted all day." A very little knowledge of the times makes it plain that the outlook was dark and gloomy for the colonies and nowhere could they see ways and means of saving themselves from what they felt was tyranny. The political situation seemed to Washington beyond the power of man to control, but he was far from being "the bewildered giant" a recent biographer calls him; rather we incline to the opinion that Washington's more frequent attendance at church at this time shows the direct opposite of bewilderment.

REVOLUTIONARY PERIOD (1775-1783)

In the hectic days of the outbreak of the Revolutionary War, George Washington and religion do not appear together; so far as documentary evidence goes, beyond a statement in his letter to Martha, that he relied confidently "on that Providence which has heretofore preserved and been bountiful to me." In the manly speech with which he accepted the appointment of commander-in-chief of the army he made no reference to God or to heaven; but one month after taking command of the army reference to prayers and church service again appears in the general orders for August 5, 1775, at Cambridge. These orders directed that "the Church be cleared tomorrow and the Revd. Mr. Doyles will perform Divine Service therein at ten o'clock."

But it is the expedition against Canada, undertaken shortly thereafter, that first reveals the broadmindedness of Washington toward religion. It is difficult to see the path by which the commander-in-chief reached this attitude of mind, singular in its contrast to that of the majority of the patriot of 1775, both in the army and in the Continental Congress; but it reveals George Washington, even at this early date, as the remarkable man of the Revolution. The first article of the instructions which the commander-in-chief drew up for the guidance of Colonel Benedict Arnold reads: "You are immediately, on their march from Cambridge, to take command of the detachment of the Continental Army against Quebec and use all possible expedition as the winter season is now advancing and the Success of this Enterprise (under God) depends Wholly upon the Spirit with which it is pushed; and the favourable Disposition of the Canadians and Indians." And the 14th instruction is in these remarkable words: "As the Contempt of the Religion of a Country by ridiculing any of its Ceremonies or affronting its Ministers or Votaries has ever been deeply resented You are to be particularly careful to restrain every Officer and Soldier from such Imprudence and Folly and to punish every Instance of it. On the other hand as far as lays in your Power you are to protect and support the free Exercise of the Religion of the Country and the undisturbed Enjoyments of the Rights of Conscience in religious Matters with your utmost Influence and Authority." The letter to Arnold enclosing these instructions emphasized the point: "I also give it in charge to you to avoid all Disrespect or Contempt of the Religion of the Country and its Ceremonies. Prudence, policy and a true Christian Spirit will lead us to look with compassion upon their Errors without insulting them. While we are contending for our own Liberty, we should be very cautious of violating the Rights of Conscience in others, ever considering that God alone is the judge of the Hearts of men and to him only in this case, they are answerable." The delightful human egoism in that compassion for error is readily forgiven and more than canceled by the rights of conscience principle that follows it.

RELATIONS TO CANADA CAMPAIGN (1775)

A dominant reason for the emphatic warnings may be found in Washington's recognition of the prejudices against "popery" existing in New England in 1775, which had so valiantly assisted in ruining all chance of a Canadian alliance in the Congress of 1774. This same, militant Protestantism, two months after Arnold's instructions were drafted, drew from Washington a blast of anger which shows that the Virginia Episcopalian was a better man, a better patriot, and a better politician than the native sons of the colony that had started the rebellion. On November 5, the general orders announced that "The Commander in chief has been apprized of a design form'd for the observance of the ridiculous and childish custom of burning the Effigy of the pope. He cannot help expressing his surprise that there should be Officers and Soldiers in this army so void of common sense as not to see the impropriety of such a step at this juncture; at a time when we are soliciting and have really obtained the friendship of the people of Canada, whom we ought to consider as Brethren embarked in the same Cause: the defence of the general Liberty of America. At such a juncture and in such circumstances, to be insulting their Religion, is so monstrous, as not to be suffered or excused; indeed instead of offering the most remote insult, it is our duty to address public thanks to these our Brethren for every late happy Success over the common enemy in Canada." Needless to say Pope's Night was not celebrated in the army in 1775, nor at any time thereafter.

Just ten days later we find the announcement of the victory at St. John's, Canada, in these words: "The Commander in chief is confident the army under his immediate direction will show their gratitude to Providence for thus favoring the cause of Freedom and America by their thankfulness to God, and by their zeal and perseverance in this righteous cause, continue to deserve his future blessings." Next came the news, two weeks later, of the capture of Montreal and the orders announced that "The General hopes such frequent favours from divine Providence will animate every American to continue to exert his utmost in the defence of the Liberties of his Country, as it would now be the basest ingratitude to the Almighty and to their Country to shew any the least backwardness in the public cause."

The naiveté of this reasoning is of value as indicative of George Washington's mental attitude towards the Supreme Being and, regardless of other conclusions, there is in it a simple, childlike faith which commands respect. Was there ever a war since the Christian era when it was not claimed by both combatants that God was on their side? But George Washington has given the idea a distinctly American flavor by calling on the Continental soldier to help God.

RELiance ON PROVIDENCE (1776)

Then comes a personal note of soul humility in his letter to Joseph Reed in January, 1776: "I have scarcely," wrote Washington, "emerged from one difficulty before I have plunged into another. How it will end, God in his great goodness will direct. I am thankful for his protection to this time." One thing that speedily became clear to the mind of George Washington was that the military and governmental difficulties of America were not, and could not, be properly met without the help of God. They were too great and America was too feeble, in Washington's judgment, to admit of their successful solution without help from on high, and certainly the verdict of history as to the magnitude of these difficulties has confirmed Washington's judgment, though the muse is still too profane to admit the accuracy of his religious belief. Also, instead of becoming opinionated, instead of developing an ego, instead of becoming confident of his abilities as he succeeded in surmounting one difficulty after another, George Washington became more and more convinced that the hand of God was in those triumphs and greater and greater became his spiritual humility, although weak dependence on his Creator was no part of his character. This humility in success and willingness to accept failure without complaint is exemplified at the end of the siege of Boston. You recall the seizure and fortification of Dorchester Heights and how the British prepared for another Bunker Hill. They attempted to cross the bay and storm the works, and Bunker Hill would have been child's play compared to the slaughter that would have ensued. You recall also, that the red-coats were prevented from crossing the water by a sudden and violent storm which lasted so long that by the time it was over Howe felt that the works had become too strong for him, gave over the attempt and evacuated the town. Here is Washington's comment to his brother John on the occurrence: "That this remarkable interposition of Providence is for some wise purpose, I have not a doubt." And this was rather an extraordinary thing to say. With all preparations made, all contingencies provided for, and with a sufficiency of ammunition in the hands of the Americans conditions were different from those prevailing at Bunker Hill, and it is quite reasonable to assume that Howe's attempt would have resulted in the complete annihilation of the British army.

WORSHIP IN THE ARMY (1776-1777)

The setting up of the actual machinery of religion in the Continental Army affords some evidence of value for our purpose. The Congress authorized the employment of chaplains, after Washington had urged it, and the general orders of July 9, 1776, when the Army was in New York City, directed that: "The Colonels or commanding officers of each regiment are directed to procure for Chaplains accordingly, persons of good character and exemplary lives. To see that all inferior officers and soldiers pay them a suitable respect and attend carefully upon religious exercises. The blessing and protection of Heaven are at all times necessary but especially so in times of public distress and danger. The General hopes and trusts, that every officer and man will endeavor so to live and act as becomes a Christian Soldier defending the dearest rights and Liberties of his country." And in the announcement, in these same orders, of the Declaration of Independence, the commander-in-chief hoped that "this important Event will serve as a fresh incentive to every officer and Soldier to act with Fidelity and Courage as knowing that now the peace and safety of his Country depends (under God) solely on the success of our arms." Here again we have the phrase "under God" which was so important an impromptu addition to Abraham Lincoln's Gettysburg Address. Was Lincoln guilty of plagiarism? Or was it that the simple religious fervor of our two greatest Americans was closely akin?

In January, 1777, the Continental Army for the first time since the siege of Boston, established a permanent encampment base. This was at Morristown, New Jersey, and among the early things attended to was the practice of regular Sunday worship for the troops. On April 12, a Saturday, it was ordered that "All the troops in Morristown except the guards, are to attend divine worship tomorrow at the second Bell; the Officers commanding the Corps, are to take special care to have their men clean and decent, and that they are to march in proper order to the place of worship." For the next week, "All the troops in town (not on duty) to attend divine service tomorrow agreeable to the orders of the 12th instant." The convenience of a church building was an element in Morristown and the army paid due observance to Sunday. It may be noted, however, that only the troops in the town itself were ordered to church, for no building would have been large enough to hold the army encamped in the vicinity. When the encampment was shifted to Middlebrook the well-known order against profanity was issued on May 31. Washington characterized it as the "foolish and scandalous practice of profane swearing" and "As a means to abolish this and every other species of immorality Brigadiers are enjoined to take effectual care, to have divine service duly performed in their respective brigades." At Middlebrook, also, on June 28, the orders were "That all Chaplains are to perform divine service tomorrow and on every succeeding Sunday, with their respective brigades and regiments, where the situation will possibly admit of it. And the Commanding officers of corps are to see that they attend themselves with officers of all ranks setting the example. The Commander in chief expects an exact compliance with this order, and that it be observed in the future as an invariable rule of practice. And every neglect will be considered not only as a breach of orders, but a disregard to decency, virtue and religion."

THANKSGIVING (1777)

The announcement (at Peter Wentz's, Worcester Township, Pennsylvania, October 18, 1777) of the surrender of Burgoyne, concluded with the words: "Let every face brighten and every heart expand with grateful joy and praise to the supreme disposer of all Events, who has granted to us this signal success. The Chaplains of the army are to prepare short discourses, suit'd to the joyful occasion and to deliver them to their several corps and brigades at 5 o'clock this afternoon." Perhaps Washington's information as to the events in the north was such as convinced him that only God could have gained a victory for General Horatio Gates!

After the wearing campaign of 1777, when the battlescarred troops were on their march to Valley Forge for the winter, the commander-in-chief issued orders on December 17, for the observance of a thanksgiving day: "Tomorrow being the day set apart by the Honorable Congress for public Thanksgiving and Praise; and duty calling us devoutly to express our grateful acknowledgments to God for the manifold blessings he has granted us. The General directs that the Army remain in its present quarters and that the Chaplains perform divine service with their several corps and brigades. And earnestly exhorts all officers and soldiers whose absence is not indispensably necessary, to attend with reverence the solemnities of the day."

The suffering at Valley Forge, the terrible weather, and the activities needful to secure enough food for the troops explain, to some extent, why church services were not mentioned during that winter. Also many of the chaplains were absent from camp and there were a number of vacancies among them, as shown by the orders of May 2, 1778: "The Commander in chief directs that divine services be performed every Sunday at 11 o'clock in those brigades to which there are chaplains—those which have none to attend the places of worship nearest to them. It is expected that Officers of all Ranks will by their attendance set the example to their men. While we are zealously performing the duties of good citizens and Soldiers we certainly ought not to be inattentive to the higher duties of religion. To the distinguished character of Patriot it should be our highest glory to add the more distinguished character of Christian. The Signal instances of providential Goodness which we have experienced and which have now almost crowned our labours with complete success, demand from us in a peculiar manner the warmest returns of Gratitude and Piety to the Supreme Author of all Good."

GRATITUDE FOR THE FRENCH ALLIANCE (1778)

The statement that the cause of independence was almost crowned with complete success on May 2, 1778, may be considered slightly optimistic; but it raises the interesting question as to what were the rumors in the army, on that day, as to aid from France, for three days later the French alliance was announced: "It having pleased the Almighty Ruler of the Universe to defend the cause of the United American States, and finally to raise up a powerful friend among the princes of the Earth, to establish our liberty and independence upon a lasting foundation; it becomes us to set apart a day for gratefully acknowledging the divine goodness and celebrating the important event which we owe to his divine interposition." An echo of this feeling is found in Washington's letter to Governor Nelson, of Virginia, August 20, 1778. Writing from White Plains, New York, he said: "It is not a little pleasing, nor less wonderful to contemplate, that after two years manoeuvring and undergoing the strangest vicissitudes, that perhaps ever attended any one contest since creation, both armies are brought back to the very point they set out from and that the offending party at the beginning [the British] is now reduced to the use of the spade and pickaxe for defence. The hand of Providence has been so conspicuous in all this that he must be worse than an infidel that lacks faith, and more than wicked who has not gratitude enough to acknowledge his obligations." When we find touches of romance like this in Washington's writing it raises the question as to the accuracy of the prevailing concept of the man. Though the romance of this appealed to him, even as he wrote he added a little touch of human feeling that brings him nearer to us, in this deprecatory gesture: "But it will be time enough for me to turn preacher when my present appointment ceases." And in addition to this romance and human feeling we can see also a touch of dry humor which has been persistently denied to Washington, but which he had in measure.

SAINT PATRICK (1776-1780)

Twice during the Revolution the Continental Army honored Saint Patrick's Day by order of the commander-in-chief. The first time was immediately after the evacuation of Boston, when the countersign for March 17, 1776, was "Saint Patrick." And the second time was in 1780, when on March 16 the orders read: "The General congratulates the Army on the very interesting proceedings of the Parliament of Ireland and of the Inhabitants of that Country which have been lately communicated; not only as they appear calculated to remove those heavy and tyrannical oppressions on their trade but to restore to a brave and Generous People the ancient Rights and Freedom and by their operation to promote the cause of America—Desirous of impressing on the minds of the Army, transactions so important in their nature the General directs that all fatigue and working parties cease for tomorrow the 17th—a day held in particular regard by the People of that Nation. At the same time he orders this he persuades himself that the celebration of the day will not be attended by the least rioting or disorder. The Officers to be at their quarters in camp and the troops of each state line are to keep within their own encampment." The next day, March 17, the parole was "Saints" and the countersigns "Patrick" and "Shela."

Washington was well aware of the healthy recklessness of many of his stalwarts and knew the Irish liking for a good rough and tumble. There is in these orders also, a recognition of the existence of that feeling which had prompted the attempted celebration of Pope's Night in 1775, so it was wise caution that guarded against a possible Donnybrook Fair in camp.

Two more general orders should be noted. On the day after the surrender of Cornwallis, October 20, 1781, Washington's greatest military triumph of the war, he directed that "Divine Service is to be performed tomorrow in the several Brigades and Divisions. The Commander in chief earnestly recommends that the troops not on duty should universally attend with that seriousness of Deportment and gratitude of Heart which the recognition of such reiterated and astonishing interpositions of Providence demands of us."

THANKS FOR VICTORY (1783)

In the midst of this overwhelming victory George Washington's mind reverted to the repeated and astonishing interposition of Providence in behalf of America, though he can, by no means, be classed as a religious enthusiast. General George Washington ordered that the cessation of hostility should begin on April 19, 1783, eight years to the day from the commencement of hostilities at Lexington. It would have been just as easy for him to have ordered hostilities to cease on April 17, or April 18, or April 20, for that matter, but Washington, the cold, the austere, suddenly displays a sense of the poetic, in deliberately planning for this precise date. The orders for ceasing hostilities display some of those traits which have been ignored: "The Commander in chief orders the Cessation of Hostilities between the United States and the King of Great Britain to be publicly proclaimed tomorrow at the New Building and that the Proclamation which will be communicated herewith, be read tomorrow evening at the head of every regiment and corps of the army. After which the Chaplains with the several brigades will render thanks to Almighty God for all his mercies, particularly for his overruling the wrath of Man to his own glory and causing the rage of war to cease amongst the nations." After warning that no disorder or "licentiousness" will be tolerated he directed "An extra ration of liquor to be issued to every man tomorrow, to drink Perpetual Peace, Independence and Happiness to the United States of America."

WASHINGTON'S FAITH

No man knew better than Washington the frightfully thin ice over which the United States of America had skated to victory. Every weakness of the governmental and military machine had been laid bare before him at one time or another. Time after time he had seen the cause dragged back from the brink of ruin by an unexpected event, or an unforeseen happening, when he was well aware that no human effort could save it. That he himself had tried his utmost did not blind his eyes to the fact that this utmost, of itself, was not sufficient. The situation has its puzzle for us. Washington was the essence of practicality; but the instincts of his old horse-racing and fox-hunting days made him ever ready to take the sporting chance.

And sporting chances he took. Long Island was one. Trenton was another, Germantown another, and even Yorktown itself was largely a sporting chance. All of these chances, however, were backed by the most painstaking efforts. Yet the man declined to grant anything to the heathen god of Luck and, when the seemingly impossible became a success, when the weak spot in his plan, of which he was well aware, became strong through no apparent human arrangement, George Washington's firm belief in the righteousness of human liberty, drew from him frank acknowledgment of God's aid. Many times his plans failed; but when they did he merely assumed that Providence, for some inscrutable reason, had intervened. He accepted failure with calmness and began at once to build again for success. There is no trace of superstition in Washington; his faith was too strong and simple for that and it is this simplicity that makes analysis difficult. Napoleon's cynical remark that "Heaven is on the side of the heaviest artillery," and the claim that he was the man of destiny shrink to mere flippancies in comparison with George Washington's steadfast faith in God's aid to liberty. If ever there was a man who could rightfully claim to be a man of destiny it was George Washington; but he was the last man to entertain such a thought.

RELIGION IN WASHINGTON'S REPLIES TO ADDRESSES

There is a final group of papers among the Washington manuscripts which should be drawn upon in an effort to analyze Washington's religious ideas. Probably no President of the United States, certainly no American of lesser rank, ever received so many complimentary addresses as did Washington. He was scrupulous in answering them and in these answers we find much that is valuable for our purpose. We have seen Washington's mental attitude toward things religious during the colonial period; the General Orders of the Revolutionary War and the diaries give his attitude during the Revolution. But the replies to these addresses contain what may be considered as Washington's mature convictions, coming as they do in the last years of his life. I shall not quote many. The first is the clear, succinct statement in the reply to the General Committee of the United Baptist Churches in Virginia, in May, 1789: "I have often," he wrote, "expressed my sentiments that every man conducting himself as a good citizen, and being accountable to God alone for his religious opinions, ought to be protected in worshipping the Deity according to the dictates of his own conscience. . . . If I could have entertained the slightest apprehension that the Constitution framed in the Convention, where I had the honor to preside, might possibly endanger the religious rights of any ecclesiastical Society, certainly I would never have placed my signature to it; if I could now conceive that the general Government might ever be so administered as to render liberty of conscience insecure, I beg you will be persuaded that no one would be more zealous than myself to establish effectual barriers against the horrors of spiritual tyranny, and every species of religious persecution . . . be assured, Gentlemen, that I entertain a proper sense of your fervent supplications to God for my temporal and eternal happiness." This acknowledgment of appreciation of the value of prayer in obtaining temporal and eternal happiness is worth something in generalizing upon Washington's belief in an hereafter.

RELATION TO THE DENOMINATIONS

A note of interest is the diary entry for May 27, 1787, in Philadelphia: "Went to the Romish Church to high mass." This was old St. Mary's and Washington was then attending the sessions of the Constitutional Convention. Could there have been a little of the Greek idea here, the same that we find in St. Paul's address to the Athenians? Two years later, when President, Washington made the delightful entry at Pomfret, Connecticut (November 8, 1789), while touring the eastern states: "It being contrary to law and disagreeable to the People of this State (Connecticut) to travel on the Sabbath Day—and my horses, after passing through such intolerable roads, wanting rest, I stayed at Perkins' tavern (which, by-the-bye is not a good one,) all day—and a meeting house being within a few rods of the door, I attended morning and evening service, and heard very lame discourses from a Mr. Pond." The layman's hearty understanding and sympathy goes out to Washington in this experience and the recollection of it may help us, in the future, to bear similar ills with fortitude.

A month later, in New York City, we find a perfect example of the sense of duty: "November 26, Thursday: Being the day appointed for a thanksgiving, I went to St. Paul's Chapel, though it was most inclement and stormy—but few people at Church." This was the first national Thanksgiving Day under our present government and, as he had summoned the nation to give thanks, Washington felt that he had to brave the elements and appear in church in compliance with his own proclamation. It is difficult to disentangle Washington's strong sense of duty in this from his religious feeling; but the two things are properly interchangeable in this case and it is doubtful if Washington himself could have analyzed them.

The diary entry for July 3, 1791, at York, Pennsylvania, has a bit of dry humor in it from our viewpoint: "There being no Episcopal Minister resident in the place, I went to hear morning Service performed in the Dutch reformed Church—which, being in that language not a word of which I understood I was in no danger of becoming a proselyte to its religion by the eloquence of the Preacher."

THE QUAKERS

To the address of the Pennsylvania Quakers, Washington's reply was particularly plain and outspoken: "We have reason to rejoice in the prospect that the present national Government, which by the favour of Divine Providence, was formed by the common counsels and peaceably established with the common consent of the People will prove a blessing to every denomination of them. . . . The liberty enjoyed by the People of these States, of worshipping Almighty God agreeable to their consciences is not only among the choicest of their blessings but also of their rights. While men perform their social duties faithfully, they do all that Society or the State can with propriety demand or expect; and remain responsible only to their Maker for the religion or modes of faith which they may prefer to profess. Your principles and conduct are well known to me, and it is doing the people called Quakers no more than justice to say that (excepting their declining to share with others the burthen of the common defence) there is no denomination among us who are more exemplary or useful citizens. I assure you very explicitly that in my opinion the conscientious scruples of all men should be treated with delicacy and tenderness, and it is my wish and desire that the laws may always be as extensively accommodated to them, as a due regard to the Protection and essential interests of the Nation may justify and permit."

Here is the willingness of the broad-minded statesman to admit the rights of conscience in religious matters, but the practical administrator pointing out with inexorable logic that unless the government which guarantees those rights is supported, there can be neither rights nor government.

ADVICE TO CHURCHES

To this may be joined Washington's reply to the Ministers and Ruling Elders of the Churches of the Massachusetts and New Hampshire Presbyteries: "I am persuaded you will permit me to observe that the path of true piety is so plain as to require but little political direction. To this consideration we ought to ascribe the absence of any regulation respecting religion from the Magna Charta of our country. To the guidance of the ministers of the gospel this important object is perhaps, more properly committed. It will be your care to instruct the ignorant and to reclaim the devious and in the progress of morality and science, to which our government will give every furtherance, we may confidently expect the advancement of true religion and the completion of our happiness." This from an Episcopalian to Presbyterians of the 18th century may certainly be taken as indicative of Washington's belief in the value of religion in education. In this reply he also touches upon a point made sensitive by our recent experiences with the so-called "Fundamentalists," so it is perhaps tactful to leave the idea as Washington puts it, merely remembering that he believed that science as well as religion contributes a share to human happiness.

Catholics are interested naturally in Washington's reply to the address made to him in December, 1789. In that reply Washington expresses the hope "ever to see America among the foremost nations in examples of justice and liberality. And I presume," he wrote, "that your fellow citizens will not forget the patriotic part which you took in the accomplishment of their revolution and the establishment of their government; or the important assistance which they received from a nation in which the roman catholic religion is professed." Washington never completely mastered the personal pronouns and the tangle here should be ascribed properly to a weakness of the head rather than of the heart.

Washington's reply to the address of the Members of the New Church in Baltimore has more than passing interest: "We have abundant reason to rejoice that in this Land the light of truth and reason has triumphed over the power of bigotry and superstition and that every person may here worship God according to the dictates of his own heart. In this enlightened age and in this land of equal liberty it is our boast that a man's religious tenets will not forfeit the protection of the law, nor deprive him of the right of attaining and holding the highest offices that are known in the United States."

There will be noted throughout these extracts a consistent uniformity of expression, such an uniformity as could only be based upon a habit of mind. There is no evidence that Washington thought like the Virginian who is credited with saying that while he was quite willing to admit there were many different ways to heaven, he was quite sure that no gentleman would choose any other than the Episcopalian way; for we may recall Washington's letter to Lafayette, August 15, 1787: "I am not less ardent in my wish that you may succeed in your plan of toleration in religious matters. Being no bigot myself, I am disposed to indulge the professors of Christianity in the church with that road to Heaven, which to them shall seem most direct, plainest, easiest and least liable to exception."

ESSENTIALS OF WASHINGTON'S RELIGION

As a young man Washington probably thought as little about religion as any healthy, normal youth. There are indications that his half-brother Lawrence was of a religious turn of mind and George had a great deal of affection and admiration for Lawrence. At the age of twenty-three he counted the bullet-holes in his coat after Braddock's defeat and acknowledged, with common-sense practicality, that a power higher than man had saved him; the Revolutionary War taught him lessons he was too honest to deny and, as a result, Washington's belief in God became the simple faith of a child, confirmed and strengthened by the actual, living experience of a man. Beyond this point of a firm belief in God, of belief in his absolute justice and his "interposition" in the affairs of man there is little of a tangible nature; but is not this enough? We know that Washington's concepts of truth, honor, and justice were founded upon and woven into this belief in God, and we can find slight fault with George Washington's truth, honor, and justice. Can we, as individuals, demand that the religion of our neighbor do more than make that neighbor an honorable man and an upright citizen? Is it worth while to insist on knowing more than this about George Washington's religion? It is plain that the two great commandments were well obeyed by him, and his reply to the address of the Hebrew Congregation of Newport, Rhode Island, in August, 1790, is one of the best: "It is now no more that toleration is spoken of, as if it was by the indulgence of one class of people that another enjoyed the exercise of their inherent natural rights. For happily the Government of the United States, which gives to bigotry no sanction, to persecution no assistance, requires only that those who live under its protection should demean themselves as good citizens, in giving it, on all occasions, their effectual support. . . . May the Father of Mercies scatter light and not darkness on our paths, and make us all, in our several vocations useful here, and in his own due time and way everlastingly happy."

And now as a last quotation read this from the Farewell Address: "Morality is a necessary spring of popular government . . . let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle." Is not this satisfying? "The influence of refined education upon minds of peculiar structure" might almost refer to our Haeckels and our Spencers. And Washington knew that the Haeckels and the Spencers do not influence the mass of the people to any extent and he was sure, from his own experience with men, that refined education without religion could not produce the sterling virtue of rugged and uncompromising honesty.

On his deathbed, after nearly twenty-four hours of struggle for breath, he placed the final seal of courageous manhood upon his life and went to his Maker with his brave faith unshaken: "I felt from the first," he whispered, "that the disorder would prove fatal . . . but I am not afraid to go." These last half-dozen words tell the worth of his religion to George Washington.

Washington's Own Words on Religion

QUESTION OF A BISHOP (1769)

"After a tiresome, and in my opinion, a very unimportant Session, I returned home about the middle of last Month. . . . The expediency of an American Episcopate was long & warmly debated, and at length rejected. As a substitute, the House attempted to frame an Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, to be composed of a President and four other clergymen, who were to have full power and authority to hear and determine all matters and causes relative to the clergy, and to be vested with the [power] of Suspension, deprivation, & visitation. From this Jurisdiction an Appeal was to be had to a Court of Delegates, to consist of an equal number of Clergymen and Laymen; but this Bill, after much canvassing, was put to Sleep, from an opinion that the subject was of too much Importance to be hastily entered into at the end of a Session."

PRESBYTERIAN MEETING AND CATHOLIC SERVICE (1774)

"Went to the Presbyterian Meeting [at Philadelphia] in the forenoon and Romish Church in the afternoon. Dind at Bevan's."

MORALS (1776)

"The unhappy Fate of Thomas Hickey, executed this day for Mutiny, Sedition and Treachery, the General hopes will be a warning to every Soldier, in the Army, to avoid those crimes, and all others, so disgraceful to the character of a Soldier, and pernicious to his country, whose pay he receives and Bread he eats.—And in order to avoid those Crimes the most certain method is to keep out of temptation of them, and particularly to avoid lewd Women, who, by the dying Confession of this poor Criminal, first led him into practices which ended in an untimely and ignominious Death."

"The General is sorry to be informed that the foolish and wicked practice of profane cursing and swearing (a Vice heretofore little known in an American Army,) is growing into fashion; he hopes the officers will by example as well as influence endeavor to check it, and that both they and the men will reflect, that we can have little hopes of the Blessing of Heaven on our Arms if we insult it by our impiety and folly; added to this it is a vice so mean and low, without any temptation, that every man of sense and character, detests and despises it."

PROVIDENCE (1778)

"The violent gale . . . and the withdrawing of the Count d'Estaing to Boston, . . . I consider storms and victory under the direction of a wise providence who no doubt directs them for the best of purposes, and to bring round the greatest degree of happiness to the greatest number of his people."

PROTECTION OF THE ALMIGHTY (1783)

"I consider it an indispensable duty to close this last solemn act of my official life, by commending the Interests of our dearest country to the protection of Almighty God, and those who have the superintendence of them to his holy keeping."

TO THE GOVERNORS OF THE STATES (1783)

"The free cultivation of letters, the unbounded extension of commerce, the progressive refinement of manners, the growing liberality of sentiment, and above all, the pure and benign light of Revelation, have had a meliorating influence on mankind and increase the blessings of society. . . .

"I now make my earnest prayer, that God would have you and the States over which you preside, in his holy protection; that he would incline the hearts of the citizens to cultivate the spirit of subordination and obedience to government; to entertain a brotherly affection and love for one another, for their fellow citizens of the United States at large, and particularly for their brethren who have served in the field; and finally, that he would most graciously be pleased to dispose us all to do justice, to love mercy, and to demean ourselves with that charity, humility, and pacific temper of mind which were the characteristics of the Divine Author of our blessed religion, and without an humble imitation of whose example in these things we can never hope to be a happy nation."

SUNDAYS (1784, 1785)

September, 1784—Sunday, 19th—"Being Sunday, and the People living on my Land, apparently very religious, it was thought best to postpone going among them till tomorrow."

October, 1785—Sunday, 2d—"Went with Fanny Bassett, Burwell Bassett, Doctr. Stuart, G. A. Washington, Mr. Shaw and Nelly Custis to Pohick Church; to hear a Mr. Thompson preach, who returned home with us to Dinner, where I found the Revd. Mr. Jones, formerly a Chaplin in one of the Pennsylvania Regiments.

"After we were in Bed (about eleven O'clock in the Evening) Mr. Houdon, sent from Paris by Doctr. Franklin and Mr. Jefferson to take my Bust, in behalf of the State of Virginia, with three young men assistants, introduced by a Mr. Perin a French Gentleman of Alexandria, arrived here by Water from the latter place."

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM (1785)

"Although no man's sentiments are more opposed to any kind of restraint upon religious principles than mine are, yet I must confess, that I am not amongst the number of those, who are so much alarmed at the thoughts of making people pay towards the support of that which they profess, if of the denomination of Christians, or declare themselves Jews, Mahometans, or otherwise, and thereby obtain proper relief. As the matter now stands, I wish an assessment had never been agitated, and as it has gone so far, that the bill could not die an easy death; because I think it will be productive of more quiet to the State, than by enacting it into a law, which in my opinion would be impolitic, admitting there is a decided majority for it, to the disquiet of a respectable minority. In the former case, the matter will soon subside; in the latter, it will rankle and perhaps convulse the State."

THANKSGIVING TO GOD IN THE INAUGURAL (1789)

"Such being the impressions under which I have, in obedience to the public summons, repaired to the present station, it would be peculiarly improper to omit, in this first official act, my fervent supplications to that Almighty Being, who rules over the universe, who presides in the councils of nations, and whose providential aids can supply every human defect, that his benediction may consecrate to the liberties and happiness of the people of the United States a government instituted by themselves for these essential purposes, and may enable every instrument employed in its administration to execute with success the functions allotted to his charge.

"In tendering this homage to the great Author of every public and private good, I assure myself that it expresses your sentiments not less than my own; nor those of my fellow-citizens at large, less than either. No people can be bound to acknowledge and adore the invisible hand, which conducts the affairs of men, more than the people of the United States. Every step, by which they have advanced to the character of an independent nation, seems to have been distinguished by some token of providential agency.

"And, in the important revolution just accomplished in the system of their united government, the tranquil deliberations and voluntary consent of so many distinct communities, from which the event has resulted, cannot be compared with the means by which most governments have been established, without some return of pious gratitude along with an humble anticipation of the future blessings which the past seem to presage. These reflections, arising out of the present crisis, have forced themselves too strongly on my mind to be suppressed. You will join with me, I trust, in thinking that there are none, under the influence of which the proceedings of a new and free government can more auspiciously commence."

"Having thus imparted to you my sentiments, as they have been awakened by the occasion that brings us together, I shall take my present leave; but not without resorting once more to the benign Parent of the human race, in humble supplication, that, since he has been pleased to favor the American people with opportunities for deliberating in perfect tranquillity, and dispositions for deciding with unparalleled unanimity on a form of government for the security of their union and the advancement of their happiness, so his divine blessing may be equally conspicuous in the enlarged views, the temperate consultations, and the wise measures, on which the success of this government must depend."

SUPPORT OF THE ALMIGHTY (1789)

"GENTLEMEN, I thank you for your address, in which the most affectionate sentiments are expressed in the most obliging terms. The coincidence of circumstances, which led to this auspicious crisis, the confidence reposed in me by my fellow-citizens, and the assistance I may expect from counsels, which will be dictated by an enlarged and liberal policy, seem to presage a more prosperous issue to my administration, than a diffidence of my abilities had taught me to anticipate. I now feel myself inexpressibly happy in a belief, that Heaven, which has done so much for our infant nation, will not withdraw its providential influence before our political felicity shall have been completed; and in a conviction that the Senate will at all times co-operate in every measure which may tend to promote the welfare of this confederated republic.

"Thus supported by a firm trust in the great Arbiter of the universe, aided by the collected wisdom of the Union, and imploring the divine benediction on our joint exertions in the service of our country, I readily engage with you in the arduous but pleasing task of attempting to make a nation happy."

CHRISTIANITY (1789)

"It affords edifying prospects indeed to see Christians of every denomination dwell together in more charity, and conduct themselves in respect to each other with a more Christian-like spirit than ever they have done in any former age or in any other nation."

SUNDAY VISITS TO STRANGERS (1789)

"On the seventh, now called the first day, for want of a place of Worship (within less than nine miles) such letters as do not require immediate acknowledgment I give answer to. . . . But it hath so happened, that on the two last Sundays—call them the first or the seventh as you please, I have been unable to perform the latter duty on account of visits from Strangers, with whom I could not use the freedom to leave alone, or recommend to the care of each other, for their amusement."

THANKSGIVING PROCLAMATION (1789)

"It is the duty of all nations to acknowledge the providence of Almighty God, to obey His will, to be grateful for His benefits, and humbly to implore His protection and favor, . . . that great and glorious Being who is the beneficent Author of all the good that was, and is, and is to come."

TO BALTIMORE (1789)

"I know the delicate nature of the duties incident to the part I am called to perform. I feel my incompetence without the singular assistance of Providence to discharge them in a satisfactory manner."

TO PHILADELPHIA (1789)

"When I contemplate the interposition of Providence as it was manifested in guiding us through the Revolution, in preparing us for the reception of a general government, and in conciliating the good-will of the people of America towards one another after its adoption, I feel myself oppressed and almost overwhelmed with a sense of the divine munificence."

TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (1789)

"It is not necessary for me to conceal the satisfaction I have felt upon finding that my compliance with the call of my country, and my dependence upon the assistance of Heaven to support me in my arduous undertakings, have, so far as I can learn, met the universal approbation of my countrymen. I reiterate the profession of my dependence upon Heaven as the source of all public and private blessings."

TO THE BISHOPS OF THE METHODIST CHURCH (1789)

"It always affords me satisfaction when I find a concurring sentiment and practice between all conscientious men in acknowledgment of homage to the great Governor of the universe, and in professions of support to a just civil government. . . . I shall always strive to be a faithful and impartial patron of genuine vital religion. . . . I take in the kindest part the promise you make of presenting your prayers at the throne of grace for me, and I likewise implore the divine benediction on yourselves and your religious community."

TO MASSACHUSETTS (1789)

"For the benedictions you have been pleased to implore of the Parent of the universe on my person and family, I have a grateful heart, and the most ardent wish that we may all, by rectitude of conduct and a perfect reliance on His beneficence, draw the smiles of Heaven on ourselves and posterity to the latest generation."

TO THE SYNOD OF THE REFORMED DUTCH CHURCH (1789)

"If such talents as I possess have been called into action by great events, and those events have terminated happily for our country, the glory should be ascribed to the manifest interposition of an overruling Providence. . . . You, gentlemen, act the part of pious Christians and good citizens by your prayers and exertions, etc. I beseech the Almighty to take you and yours under His special care."

TO CONNECTICUT (1789)

"I was but the humble agent of favoring Heaven, whose benign interference was so often manifested in our behalf, and to whom the praise of victory alone is due."

TO THE ROMAN CATHOLICS OF THE UNITED STATES (1789)

"May the members of your society in America, animated alone by the pure spirit of Christianity, and still conducting themselves as the faithful subjects of our free government, enjoy every temporal and spiritual felicity."

TO VIRGINIA (1790)

"In looking forward to that awful moment when I must bid adieu to sublunary scenes, I anticipate the consolation of leaving our country in a prosperous condition; and while the curtain of separation shall be drawing, my last breath will, I trust, expire in a prayer for the temporal and eternal felicity of those who have not only endeavored to gild the evening of my days with unclouded serenity, but extended their desires to my happiness hereafter in a brighter world."

TO THE HEBREW CONGREGATION OF SAVANNAH (1790)

"May the same wonder-working Deity who long since delivered the Hebrews from their Egyptian oppressors, and planted them in the promised land, whose providential agency has lately been conspicuous in establishing these United States as an independent nation, still continue to water them with the dews of heaven, and to make the inhabitants of every denomination participate in the temporal and spiritual blessings of that people whose God is Jehovah."

CHURCH UNIVERSAL

"Of all the animosities which have existed among mankind, those which are caused by difference of sentiments in religion appear to be the most inveterate and distressing, and ought most to be deprecated. I was in hopes, that the lightened and liberal policy, which has marked the present age, would at least have reconciled Christians of every denomination so far, that we should never again see their religious disputes carried to such a pitch as to endanger the peace of society."

DIVINE INTERPOSITION (1792)

"There never was a people, who had more reason to acknowledge a divine interposition in their affairs, than those of the United States; and I should be pained to believe that they have forgotten that agency, which was so often manifested during our revolution, or that they failed to consider the omnipotence of that God who is alone able to protect them."

TO CONGRESS (1793)

"I humbly implore that Being on whose will the fate of nations depends to crown with success our mutual endeavors for the general happiness."

TO CONGRESS (1794)

"Let us unite, therefore, in imploring the Supreme Ruler of nations to spread His holy protection over these United States: . . . to perpetuate to our country that prosperity which His goodness has already conferred, and to verify the anticipations of this government being a safeguard to human rights."

TO CONGRESS (1795)

"I derive peculiar satisfaction from your concurrence with me in the expression of gratitude to Almighty God which a review of the auspicious circumstances that distinguish our happy country have excited. . . . The sentiments we have mutually expressed of profound gratitude to the Source of those numerous blessings, the Author of all good, and pledges of our obligations to unite our sincere and zealous endeavors, as the instruments of divine Providence, to preserve and perpetuate them."

THANKSGIVING PROCLAMATION (1795)

"It is in an especial manner our duty as a people with devout reverence and affectionate gratitude to acknowledge our many and great obligations to Almighty God, and to implore Him to continue and confirm the blessings we experience, . . . at the same time humbly and fervently to beseech the kind Author of those blessings graciously to prolong them to us, and to imprint upon our hearts a deep and solemn sense of our obligations to Him for them."

TO CONGRESS (1796)

"I find ample reason for a renewal of that gratitude to the Ruler of the universe which a continued series of prosperity has so often and so justly called forth. . . .

"I cannot omit the occasion now to repeat my fervent supplication to the Supreme Ruler of the universe and Sovereign Arbiter of nations, that His providential care may still be extended to the United States."

TO THE CLERGY OF DIFFERENT DENOMINATIONS, PHILADELPHIA (1797)

"Believing as I do that religion and morality are the essential pillars of civil society, I view with unspeakable pleasure that harmony and brotherly love which characterize the clergy of different denominations, as well in this as in other parts of the United States, exhibiting to the world a new and interesting spectacle, at once the pride of our country and the surest basis of universal harmony."

"That your labors for the good of mankind may be crowned with success, that your temporal enjoyments may be commensurate with your merits, and that the future reward of good and faithful servants may be yours, I shall not cease to supplicate the divine Author of life and felicity."

Part I

Washington in Colonial Politics (1755-1775)

GEORGE WASHINGTON

This portrait, known as the "Gibbs-Channing portrait," was painted in 1795 by Gilbert Stuart

WASHINGTON AS A CANDIDATE (1755-1758)

WASHINGTON'S experience as a politician began in 1755. That year he became a candidate for election as Burgess for Frederick County, at that time covering the northern half of Virginia, west of the Blue Ridge, with Winchester as the county seat. He was defeated, partly, it is said, because he would not resort to the usual method of canvassing and his opposition to tipling houses in the garrison town. There is evidence, however, that at the same time he stood or had ideas of standing for Fairfax County within which were both Alexandria and Mount Vernon. He wrote his brother: "I should be glad if you could discover

[their] . . . real sentiments on this head; . . . without disclosing much of mine, . . . If they seem inclinable to promote my interest, and things should be drawing to a crisis, you then may declare my intention, and beg their assistance. If, on the contrary, you find them more inclined to favour some other, I would have the affair entirely dropped. . . . sound their pulse . . . with an air of indifference and unconcern; after that, you may regulate your conduct according to circumstances." Evidently, though, the sounding, if attempted, was not favorable. In July, 1758, while himself absent with the Forbes expedition he was again a candidate for Frederick and this time successful, his agent being chaired through the street with much enthusiasm, the reason for which is made somewhat evident by Washington's bill for election expenses. This in a gross of £39.6s included 118 gallons of liquor in various forms, besides one hogshead, one barrel, and ten bowls of punch, and £3 for a "dinner for your Friends." He wrote his thanks to the agent, including a promise to the constituents such as nowadays would be made before the election: "If thanks flowing from a heart replete with joy and Gratitude can in any Measure compensate for the fatigue, anxiety and Pain you had at my Election, be assured you have them; 'tis a poor, but I am convinced, welcome tribute to a generous Mind. Such, I believe yours to be. How shall I . . . acknowledge my sense of obligations to the People in general for their choice of me, I am at a loss to resolve on. But why? Can I do it more effectually than by making their Interest (as it really is) my own, and doing everything that lyes in my little Power for the Honor and welfare of the Country? I think not; and my best endeavors they may always command. I promise this now, when promises may be regarded, before they might pass as words of course."

WASHINGTON ON THE STAMP ACT (1765)

His attendance began on February 22, 1759, and he continued to be a member of the House until 1775 through several re-elections, first for Frederick County and then for Fairfax. Our interest in this service is its relation to his later political policies, especially as in it originated the principles for which he fought during the Revolution.

The Stamp Act agitation was the first influence. September 20, 1765, Washington wrote: "The Stamp Act, imposed on the colonies by the Parliament of Great Britain, engrosses the conversations of the speculative part of the colonists, who look upon this unconstitutional method of taxation, as a direful attack upon their liberties and loudly exclaim against the violation. What may be the result of this, and of some other (I think I may add) ill-judged measures, I will not undertake to determine; but this I may venture to affirm, that the advantage accruing to the mother country will fall greatly short of the expectations of the ministry; for certain it is, that our whole substance does already in a manner flow to Great Britain, and that whatsoever contributes to lessen our importations must be hurtful to their manufacturers. And the eyes of our people, already beginning to open, will perceive, that many luxuries, which we lavish our substance in Great Britain for, can well be dispensed with, whilst the necessities of life are (mostly) to be had within ourselves. This, consequently, will introduce frugality, and be a necessary stimulation to industry. If Great Britain, therefore, loads her manufacturies with heavy taxes, will it not facilitate these measures? They will not compel us, I think, to give our money for their exports, whether we will or not; and certain, I am, none of their traders will part from them without a valuable consideration. Where, then, is the utility of these restrictions? As to the Stamp Act, taken in a single view, one and the first bad consequence attending it, I take to be this, our courts of judicature must inevitably be shut up; for it is impossible (or next of kin to it), under our present circumstances, that the act of Parliament can be complied with, were we ever so willing to enforce the execution; for, not to say, which alone would be sufficient, that we have not money to pay the stamps, there are many cogent reasons to prevent it; and if a stop be put to our judicial proceedings, I fancy the merchants of Great Britain, trading to the colonies, will not be among the last to wish for a repeal of it." July 25, 1767, he added: "Those . . . who . . . were instrumental in securing the repeal . . . are . . . deservedly entitled to the thanks of the well-wishers to Britain and her colonies, . . . Mine they accordingly have, and always shall have for their opposition to any act of oppression; and that act could be looked upon in no other light by every person, who would view it in its proper colors."

WASHINGTON ON NON-IMPORTATION (1769-1770)

Four years later after the Townshend Acts had become law he had a correspondence with his neighbor George Mason in April, 1769, the outgrowth of which was the Virginia Non-importation Association of May 18, adopted at a meeting of Burgesses just after they had been dissolved by the governor for voting the Virginia Resolves. The Association was drafted by Mason; Washington was a member of the committee. Washington in his letter of April 5, wrote: "At a time, when our lordly masters in Great Britain will be satisfied with nothing less than the deprivation of American freedom, it seems highly necessary that something should be done to avert the stroke, and maintain the liberty, which we have derived from our ancestors. But the manner of doing it, to answer the purpose effectually, is the point in question. That no man should scruple, or hesitate a moment, to use a-ms in defence of so valuable a blessing, on which all the good and evil of life depends, is clearly my opinion. Yet a-ms, I would beg leave to add, should be the last resource, the dernier resort. Addresses to the throne, and remonstrances to Parliament, we have already, it is said, proved the inefficacy of. How far, then, their attention to our rights and privileges is to be awakened or alarmed, by starving their trade and manufactures, remains to be tried. . . ."

"The more I consider a scheme of this sort, the more ardently I wish success to it, because I think there are private as well as public advantages to result from it,—the former certain, however precarious the other may prove. For in respect to the latter, I have always thought, that by virtue of the same power, (for here alone the authority derives) which assumes the right of taxation, they may attempt at least to restrain our manufactories, especially those of a public nature, the same equity and justice prevailing in the one case as the other, it being no greater hardship to forbid my manufacturing, than it is to order me to buy goods of them loaded with duties, for the express purpose of raising a revenue. But as a measure of this sort would be an exertion of arbitrary power, we cannot be worsted, I think, but by putting it to the test."

His deeds lived up to his words and in his orders to his English agents he was careful to specify in August, 1770, that: "You will perceive, in looking over the several invoices, that some of the goods there required, are upon condition, that the act of Parliament imposing a duty on tea, paper, &c. for the purpose of raising a revenue in America, is totally repealed; and I beg the favor of you to be governed strictly thereby, as it will not be in my power to receive any articles contrary to our non-importation agreement, which I have subscribed, and shall religiously adhere to, and should, if it were, as I could wish it to be, ten times as strict."

WASHINGTON ON THE BOSTON PORT BILL (1774)

Excellent authorities assure us that but for the insistent agitation by certain of the American radicals and the wrong-headedness of certain English leaders, particularly the King, affairs might have resumed the normal condition, Parliament being satisfied with placing on record its right to control the colonies while the latter continued virtually to govern themselves. However, the attempt to force taxed tea through the colonial ports, the general resistance of this, and the subsequent coercive acts against Massachusetts, because she had been most active in the decade of resistance, precipitated the conflict. When the news reached Williamsburg of the enactment of the Boston Port Bill the Burgesses voted on May 24, 1774, that June 1, when the act became operative, should be a day of fasting and prayer in Virginia. Lord Dunmore, the governor, dissolved the House in order to prevent more drastic resolves, which Richard Henry Lee intended to introduce. Once more the Burgesses resorted to a private meeting, May 25, drew up another Association and recommended an intercolonial congress. Several days later twenty-five of them met again, and not considering that so few of them should take the further action deemed essential, proposed that the Burgesses meet in convention on August 1. Washington was one of these twenty-five. He was becoming weary of half measures, of ignored addresses, petitions, and humble approaches to the Throne.

The letter he wrote his loyalist friend, Bryan Fairfax, July 4, 1774, shows this: "As to your political sentiments, I would heartily join you in them, so far as relates to a humble and dutiful petition to the throne, provided there was the most distant hope of success. But have we not tried this already? Have we not addressed the Lords, and remonstrated to the Commons? And to what end? Did they deign to look at our petitions? Does it not appear, as clear as the sun in its meridian brightness, that there is a regular, systematic plan formed to fix the right and practice of taxation upon us? Does not the uniform conduct of Parliament for some years past confirm this? Do not all the debates, especially those just brought to us, in the House of Commons on the side of government, expressly declare that America must be taxed in aid of the British funds, and that she has no longer resources within herself? Is there any thing to be expected from petitioning after this? Is not the attack upon the liberty and property of the people of Boston, before restitution of the loss to the India Company was demanded, a plain and self-evident proof of what they are aiming at? Do not the subsequent bills (now I dare say acts), for depriving the Massachusetts Bay of its charter, and transporting offenders into other colonies or to Great Britain for trial, where it is impossible from the nature of the thing that justice can be obtained, convince us that the administration is determined to stick at nothing to carry its point? Ought we not, then, to put our virtue and fortitude to the severest test?"

Before the meeting of the Convention there were various conferences with his neighbor, George Mason, which resulted in meetings of the citizens of the county on July 5 and 18, when Washington presided and Mason's famous Fairfax County Resolves, which undoubtedly had been moulded into shape at the discussions between the two leaders, were adopted, but considered as Mason's work.

WASHINGTON IN THE FIRST VIRGINIA CONVENTION (1774)

The first Virginia Convention met at Williamsburg, August 1-6. Washington attended not only as a Burgess but as a delegate appointed at the Fairfax County meeting to present that meeting's resolves. The journals of the Convention show no special activity by him; but John Adams, in his diary, at second or third hand, accredits him with making the most eloquent speech in the gathering: "I will raise one thousand men, subsist them at my own expense, and march myself at their head for the relief of Boston." Silas Deane makes a somewhat similar statement, so it was evidently one of the current stories among the delegates of the Continental Congress that autumn. On the fifth Washington was elected a delegate to the Continental Congress, and this was the beginning of his intercolonial and later political career. Continuing his correspondence with Fairfax, he exposed the attitude with which he approached the larger meeting, writing August 24: "I have no new lights to throw upon the subject, or any other arguments to offer in support of my own doctrine, than what you have seen; and could only in general add, that an innate spirit of freedom first told me, that the measures, which administration hath for some time been and now are most violently pursuing, are repugnant to every principle of natural justice; whilst much abler heads than my own hath fully convinced me, that it is not only repugnant to natural rights, but subversive of the laws and constitution of Great Britain itself, in the establishment of which some of the best blood in the kingdom hath been spilt. . . . For my own part, I shall not undertake to say where the line between Great Britain and the colonies should be drawn; but I am clearly of opinion, that one ought to be drawn, and our rights clearly ascertained. I could wish, I own, that the dispute had been left to posterity to determine, but the crisis is arrived when we must assert our rights, or submit to every imposition that can be heaped upon us, till custom and use shall make us as tame and abject slaves, as the blacks we rule over with such arbitrary sway. . . . if you disavow the right of Parliament to tax us, (unrepresented as we are) we only differ in respect to the mode of opposition, and this difference principally arises from your belief, that they—the Parliament, I mean,—want a decent opportunity to repeal the acts; whilst I am as fully convinced, as I am of my own existence, there has been a regular, systematic plan formed to enforce them, and that nothing but unanimity in the colonies (a stroke they did not expect) and firmness, can prevent it. . . . P. S. Pray what do you think of the Canada Bill?"

He was giving much thought, evidently, to the approaching session, for he asked for authentic lists of exports and imports annually, more especially to and from Great Britain, and there were further conferences. The night before he started for Philadelphia, Henry and Pendleton, fellow delegates, as well as Mason, were with him over night.

WASHINGTON IN THE FIRST CONTINENTAL CONGRESS (1774)

The meetings of what is usually called the "First" Continental Congress began on September 5 and ended on October 26. Washington was not a member of any committee. His position in the gathering is best known through Henry's tribute: "If you speak of eloquence, Mr. Rutledge of South Carolina is by far the greatest orator, but if you speak of solid information and sound judgment, Colonel Washington is unquestionably the greatest man on that floor." Silas Deane wrote that he "speaks very modestly and in cool but determined style and accent."

The published letters of members of Congress make but slight reference to him. He was, however, profiting by the intercourse with leaders from other colonies, weighing their desires with those of his own region, and solidifying his principles. When a former companion of the French War, now an officer of the British troops in Boston, made accusations against the Massachusetts leaders, Washington "Spent the afternoon with the Boston Gentn.," and then made a warm reply to Mackenzie on October 9: "I conceive, when you condemn the conduct of the Massachusetts people, you reason from effects, not causes; otherwise you would not wonder at a people, who are every day receiving fresh proofs of a systematic assertion of an arbitrary power, deeply planned to overturn the laws and constitution of their country, and to violate the most essential and valuable rights of mankind, being irritated, and with difficulty restrained from acts of the greatest violence and intemperance. For my own part, I confess to you candidly, that I view things in a very different point of light from the one in which you seem to consider them; and though you are led to believe by venal men,—for such I must take the liberty of calling those new-fangled counsellors, who fly to and surround you, and all others, who, for honors or pecuniary gratifications, will lend their aid to overturn the constitution, and introduce a system of arbitrary government,—although you are taught, I say, by discoursing with such men, to believe, that the people of Massachusetts are rebellious, setting up for independency, and what not, give me leave, my good friend, to tell you, that you are abused, grossly abused. This I advance with a degree of confidence and boldness, which may claim your belief, having better opportunities of knowing the real sentiments of the people you are among, from the leaders of them, in opposition to the present measures of the administration, than you have from those whose business it is, not to disclose truths, but to misrepresent facts in order to justify as much as possible to the world their own conduct. Give me leave to add, and I think I can announce it as a fact, that it is not the wish or interest of that government, or any other upon this continent, separately or collectively, to set up for independence; but this you may at the same time rely on, that none of them will ever submit to the loss of those valuable rights and privileges, which are essential to the happiness of every free state, and without which, life, liberty, and property are rendered totally insecure. These, Sir, being certain consequences, which must naturally result from the late acts of Parliament relative to America in general, and the government of Massachusetts Bay in particular, is it to be wondered at, I repeat, that men, who wish to avert the impending blow, should attempt to oppose it in its progress, or prepare for their defence, if it cannot be averted? Surely I may be allowed to answer in the negative; and again give me leave to add as my opinion, that more blood will be spilled on this occasion, if the ministry are determined to push matters to extremity, than history has ever yet furnished instances of in the annals of North America, and such a vital wound will be given to the peace of this great country, as time itself cannot cure, or eradicate the remembrance of."

WASHINGTON'S FINAL ACTIONS AS A VIRGINIAN (1775)

Washington's final public actions as a Virginia colonial gentleman were reviews of various independent companies. He wrote his brother, March 25, 1775, promising to review the latter's company in Shenandoah Valley: "I . . . shall very cheerfully accept the honor of commanding it, if occasion requires it to be drawn out, as it is my full intention to devote my life and fortune in the cause we are engaged in, if needful." He attended the second Virginia Provincial Convention at Richmond on March 20-27, and was reelected to the Continental Congress. Again at Mount Vernon, the conferences went on. Mason, the Lees, and others with whom he undoubtedly discussed the situation were his guests, and it is significant that he also entertained Charles Lee and Horatio Gates, both of whom were soon to be generals in the Continental Army. He left his home, which he was not to see again for more than six strenuous years, on May 4, 1775. The second session of Congress began at Philadelphia on May 10, and he was appointed to the committees on fortifying New York, ammunition, army rules, and raising money. Before this, however, the news of the battle of Lexington and Concord was received; and on May 3 he had written his friend George William Fairfax, then in England: "Unhappy it is, though, to reflect, that a brother's sword has been sheathed in a brother's breast, and that the once happy and peaceful plains of America are either to be drenched with blood or inhabited by slaves. Sad alternative! But can a virtuous man hesitate in his choice?"

There could be no more hesitation, the issues were finally joined; and with his mind made up he saw that it was his duty to accept the command of the army when on June 15 Congress offered it to him. This did not withdraw him from politics; rather it made it sharply needful to bear in mind both political and military necessity and to strive to reconcile the two opposing elements. It became his task to make an often reluctant Congress, jealous of its own entirely self-ordained rights, realize facts; a task of wise and patient statecraft. This phase of his career during the Revolution is often lost sight of; but its importance was scarcely less than success on the field; indeed, the latter was dependent upon the other.

This relationship with Congress began with his commission and instructions. Although he was "vested with full power and authority to act as you shall think for the good and welfare of the service," he was also "punctually to observe and follow such orders and directions, from time to time, as you shall receive from this, or a future Congress." Congress intended to hold the strings.

Part II

Washington's Relation to Congress

(1775-1786)

WASHINGTON ON UNITY OF MILITARY AUTHORITY

Washington's military relations with Congress have been summed up by Van Tyne as "handicapped by the most unwieldy superior council that ever hampered a military chieftain." Yet Washington considered from the first that the power of Congress was paramount within the colonies, at least in military affairs. He wrote Governor Trumbull, July 18, 1775: "As the army is upon a general establishment, their right, to supersede and control a Provincial one, must be unquestionable." At the same time he began the incessant effort to induce Congress to put the army upon a unified and secure basis; the first problem being the right of the colonies to appoint all the officers under generals for the troops raised in each. "I submit," he wrote Rodney, August 30, "that as the whole troops are now taken into the pay of the United Colonies, the Congress . . . ought to reserve the filling up of all vacancies themselves, in order that volunteers from every government may have an equal chance of preferment, instead of confining all officers to a few governments to the total exclusion of the rest." At that time almost all the troops before Boston were from New England. This desire for a strong, active, central government runs through all his wartime correspondence; he did not need the evidence of the weakness of the later Confederation to form his mind; that merely strengthened his position.

INEFFICIENCY OF CONGRESS

The realization that Congress was not the instrument for such a government must have come to him early. September 21, 1775, it gave him "great pain to be obliged to solicit the attention of the honorable Congress to the state of this army, in terms which imply the slightest apprehension of being neglected. But my situation is inexpressibly distressing." Nonetheless he welcomed the first committee from Congress, consisting of Franklin, Lynch of South Carolina, and his friend Harrison from Virginia, who were at camp in October, sent there as President Hancock wrote Washington, that "Congress, before they come to a final Determination," might have the "Advantage of your experience and Knowledge." Congress might show much lack of strength, but it was the chosen instrument, and since he could not alter it, Washington at all times was ready to consult with it and its committees and to do the best he could with its decisions—or lack of them. However severe the trials, the rule that he made for his subordinates applied equally to himself. "The retirement of a General Officer . . . appears to me to be big with fatal consequences both to the public cause and his own reputation, . . . in such a cause as this, when the object is neither glory nor extent of territory, but a defence of all that is dear and valuable in private and public life, surely every post ought to be deemed honorable in which a man can serve his country."

There were too many divergencies, social and economic, among the colonial regions, as well as among the individual colonies, for Congress ever to become a harmonious body. Lynch wrote Washington in December: "One of our members of Congress [John Adams] set out today for New England. Whether his intents are wicked or not, I doubt much; he should be watched." Adams himself wrote: "It is almost impossible to move anything, but you instantly see private friendships and enmities, and provincial views and prejudices intermingle in the consultation." This was early in the contest, while enthusiasm was yet high and there had been no military reverses, and while the men in Congress were more distinctly the leaders than later. Washington was aware of the difficulty, and this inter-colonial and interstate jealousy in and out of Congress was one of his problems, one that helped materially to broaden his own outlook and to prepare him for his later high civil authority. He wrote that his chief wish was "to make my conduct coincide with the wishes of mankind, as far as I can consistently; I mean, without departing from that great line of duty, which, though hid under a cloud for some time, from a peculiarity of circumstances, may nevertheless bear a scrutiny." This was a large order, especially when there was a lack of accord in the wishes of mankind of his world; and not being phlegmatic, he was severely tried at times.

POLICY OF ENLISTMENTS

One of the main problems of the army and one upon which he never succeeded in getting Congress to agree with him was that of the term of enlistments. The matter, so far as it affected military operations belongs to another article, but as it was a cardinal element in his relations with Congress, an early statement of his position in the matter, while the army was yet before Boston, and after the troubles accompanying the first reenlistment, is of value here. "The evils arising from short, or even any limited inlistment of the troops, are greater, and more extensively hurtful than any person (not an eye-witness to them) can form an idea of. It takes you two or three months to bring new men in any tolerable degree acquainted with their duty; it takes a longer time to bring a people of the temper and genius of these into such a subordinate way of thinking as is necessary for a soldier. Before this is accomplished, the time approaches for their dismissal, and you are beginning to make interest with them for their continuance for another limited period; in the doing of which you are obliged to relax in your discipline, in order as it were to curry favor with them, by which means the latter part of your time is employed in undoing what the first was accomplishing, and instead of having men always ready to take advantage of circumstances, you must govern your movements by the circumstances of your Inlistments. This is not all; by the time you have got men arm'd and equip'd, the difficulty of doing which is beyond description, and with every new sett you have the same trouble to encounter, without the means of doing it.—In short, the disadvantages are so great and apparent to me, that I am convinced, uncertain as the continuance of the war is, that Congress had better determine to give a bounty of 20, 30, or even 40 Dollars to every man who will Inlist for the whole time, be it long or short."

INDEPENDENCE AND UNION

The successful termination of the siege of Boston transferred the theater of war to New York. Meanwhile the question of independence was in agitation. As early as February 10, 1776, Washington showed his own change of view, writing Reed: "I have never entertained an idea of an accommodation, since I heard of the measures, which were adopted in consequence of the Bunker's Hill fight. . . . I would tell them . . . that we had done every thing which could be expected from the best of subjects, that the spirit of freedom beat too high in us to submit to slavery, and that, if nothing else could satisfy a tyrant and his diabolical ministry, we are determined to shake off all connexions with a state so unjust and unnatural. This I would tell them, not under covert, but in words as clear as the sun in its meridian brightness."

He advanced the "liberty and union" thought in a letter to Adams, April 15: "I have ever thought, and am still of opinion, that no terms of accommodation will be offered by the British ministry, but such as cannot be accepted by America. We have nothing, my dear Sir, to depend upon but the protection of a kind Providence, and unanimity among ourselves." Again, he wrote Reed, April 23: "Your letter . . . descriptive of the jealousies and uneasinesses which exist among the Members of Congress is really alarming—if the House is divided, the fabrick must fall, and a few Individuals perish in the Ruins." At the end of May he was "very glad to find that the Virginia Convention have passed so noble a vote [for independence], and with so much unanimity;" but his comment to the President of Congress on the Declaration itself is rather trite: "I perceive that Congress have been employed in deliberating on measures of the most interesting nature. It is certain, that it is not with us to determine in many instances what consequences will flow from our counsels; but yet it behoves us to adopt such, as, under the smiles of a gracious and all-kind Providence, will be most likely to promote our happiness. I trust the late decisive part they have taken is calculated for that end, and will secure us that freedom and those privileges, which have been and are refused us, contrary to the voice of nature and the British constitution." There is, however, more spirit and hope in the general order of July 9, announcing the Declaration to the army: "The General hopes this important Event will serve as a fresh incentive to every officer and soldier, to act with Fidelity and Courage, as knowing that now the peace and safety of his Country, depends (under God) solely on the success of our Arms: And that he is now in the service of a State, possessed of sufficient power to reward his merit, and advance him to the highest Honors of a free Country." Here, as in many other cases, Washington's public utterances were more optimistic than his private reasoning; he did not lack the political sense.

NEW YORK AND NEW JERSEY CAMPAIGNS (1776)

The latter half of 1776, the period of the New York and New Jersey campaigns, was one that "tried men's souls." For Congress and the General it began when President Hancock wrote Washington, May 16, the request "that you will repair to Philada. as soon as you can conveniently, in order to consult with Congress, upon such Measures as may be necessary for the carrying on the ensuing Campaign;" which, being done, Hancock, June 3, bestowed "the Thanks of that Body to you, for the unremitted Attention you have paid to your important Trust; and in particular for the Assistance they have derived from your military Knowledge and Experience, in adopting the best Plans for the Defence of the United Colonies." It ended with Congress in flight from Philadelphia and Washington in possession of temporary dictatorial military power, "vested with full, ample and complete powers . . . for and during the term of six months . . . unless sooner determined by Congress."

With the retirement of the American army to Harlem Heights and the general demoralization that ensued, both Congress and the General went on record to shift responsibility. John Adams, noticing the general condition, procured from Congress on September 19 a resolution: "That the commander in chief of the forces of these states in the several departments, be directed to give positive orders to the brigadier generals and colonels, and all other officers in their several armies, that the troops, under their command, may, every day, be called together, and trained in arms, in order that officers and men may be perfected in the manual exercise and manœuvres, and inured to the most exemplary discipline, and that all officers be assured, that the Congress will consider activity and success, in introducing discipline into the army, among the best recommendations for promotion." It was this same Adams who in debate the next winter is credited by a fellow delegate with saying: "I have been distressed to see some members of this house disposed to idolise an image which thier own hands have molten. I speak here of the superstitious veneration that is sometimes paid to General Washington. Altho' I honour him for his good qualities, yet in this house I feel myself his Superior." One of the delegates at this time wrote, "to the Grief of Congress the Genl has wrote several (they think) too gloomy Letters. some speak with great Resolution."

CONGRESS AND THE ARMY (1776)

Washington probably had received the above resolution before he wrote one of these "gloomy" letters on September 24: "We are now, as it were, upon the eve of another dissolution of our army. The remembrance of the difficulties, which happened upon that occasion last year, and the consequences, which might have followed the change if proper advantages had been taken by the enemy, added to a knowledge of the present temper and situation of the troops, reflect but a very gloomy prospect in the appearances of things now, and satisfy me beyond the possibility of a doubt, that, unless some speedy and effectual measures are adopted by Congress, our cause will be lost. It is in vain to expect, that any more than a trifling part of this army will again engage in the service on the encouragement offered by Congress."

He was far milder than some of his generals considered that the occasion justified. Greene wrote: "The policy of Congress has been the most absurd and ridiculous imaginable, pouring in militia—men who come and go every month. A military force established on such principles defeats itself." While Lee, who had no love for or exalted opinion of Washington, wrote: "Inter nos Congress seems to stumble at every step. I have been very free in delivering my opinion of them. General Washington is much to blame in not menacing them with resignation, unless they refrain from unhinging the army by their absurd interference."

The letter however had its effect. Congress tried to make reforms; it planned a new army, directed the states to furnish their quotas to serve during the war, but was powerless to make the states do so. New articles of war were also adopted.

WASHINGTON AND POSTERITY

Washington did not intend that posterity should be ignorant of his case. He wrote Lund Washington, September 30: "In short, such is my situation that if I were to wish the bitterest curse to an enemy on this side of the grave, I should put him in my stead with my feelings; and yet I do not know what plan of conduct to pursue. I see the impossibility of serving with reputation, or doing any essential service to the cause by continuing in command, and yet I am told that if I quit the command inevitable ruin will follow from the distraction that will ensue. In confidence I tell you that I never was in such an unhappy, divided state since I was born. To lose all comfort and happiness on the one hand, whilst I am fully persuaded that under such a system of management as has been adopted, I cannot have the least chance for reputation, nor those allowances made which the nature of the case requires; and to be told, on the other, that if I leave the service all will be lost, is, at the same time that I am bereft of every peaceful moment, distressing to a degree. But I will be done with the subject, with the precaution to you that it is not a fit one to be publicly known or discussed. If I fall, it may not be amiss that these circumstances be known, and declaration made in credit to the justice of my character."

The retreat across New Jersey began November 20, the army dwindling with every march, until, December 8, it finally stood on the western bank of the Delaware River a mere skeleton, and that made up of men whose term of enlistment was already expired or about to expire, and with the general's letters continuing his unremittent urgings upon Congress, and nearer despair than at any other time during the war. He voiced this to Lund Washington on December 17: "Our only dependence now is upon the speedy enlistment of a new army. If this fails, I think the game will be pretty well up." Yet, "under the full persuasion of the justice of our cause, I cannot entertain an Idea, that it will finally sink, tho' it may remain for some time under a cloud." But that cloud, and without a new army, he removed by the brilliant operations at Trenton and Princeton, making winter quarters at Morristown, New Jersey, with that state recovered and the British again confined to the immediate vicinity of New York City and Long Island.

IMPRACTICABLE CONGRESSIONAL ORDERS

Congress meanwhile, somewhat recovered from its scare, but not yet returned to Philadelphia from Baltimore because of the fear of a new British movement against the Quaker city, was energetic—in debate, and took the field—on paper, in spite of the dictatorial power which was, presumably, still active. It resolved that it would be "agreeable to Congress," if the troops under Heath were called over to the main army, that the general-in-chief "order all the continental troops that are at Providence, immediately to join him," that troops enlisted march immediately to join the army, and that the authorities of New Jersey and Pennsylvania order their militia to the same front; since it was the "earnest desire of Congress to make the army under the immediate command of General Washington, sufficiently strong, not only to curb and confine the enemy within their present quarters, and prevent them from drawing support of any kind from the country, but by the divine blessing, totally to subdue them before they can be reinforced." Burke of North Carolina in his notes on this debate wrote: "This [last] pompous Paragraph was very much Condemned by some gentlemen as an unworthy Gasconade, and it was warmly debated. North Caroli[na] observed that Threats were unbecoming a Private Gentleman, and much more unbecoming a Political Body. That this pompous boast if not realised would render the Congress exceedingly ridiculous, and there was great reason to fear it would not, that our vigor ought to appear by Efforts, not Words, that at best it was an useless superfluity and ought to be expunged. the Question was put and Jersey Pennsylvania North Carolina and South Carolina voted for expunging, the rest for retaining. . . . there appeared upon the whole debate a great desire in the Delegates of the Eastern States, and in one of New Jersey to insult the General."

Washington's comment, March 14, on the resolutions is pathetic: "Could I accomplish the important objects so eagerly wished by Congress, . . . I should be happy indeed. But what prospect or hope can there be of my effecting so desirable a work at this time? The enclosed return, to which I solicit the most serious attention of Congress, comprehends the whole force I have in Jersey. It is but a handful, and bears no proportion, in the scale of numbers, to that of the enemy. Added to this, the major part is made up of militia. The most sanguine in speculation cannot deem it more than adequate to the least valuable purposes of war. The reinforcements mentioned to be drawn from General Heath were merely ideal; nearly the whole of the eastern troops, who were with him, being here before. They were only engaged till to-day; and to-day they leave the camp. . . . What prospect there may be of immediate succors from other quarters, I know not; . . . I confess, Sir, I feel the most painful anxiety when I reflect on our situation and that of the enemy. Unless the levies arrive soon, we must before long experience some interesting and melancholy events. . . . On recurring to the last promotions of brigadiers, I find the number appointed to be short of what I took the liberty to recommend, and not competent to the exigencies of the service, supposing the whole in office before, and those lately created, consent to act, which I have reason to believe will not be the case."

PROBLEM OF GENERAL OFFICERS

Congress retaining the power to appoint general officers, even under the resolves giving the virtual—if temporary—dictatorship, its action in this matter was a fertile cause of discontent on the part of officers who did not receive the rewards their merits—on their own estimation of the same—deserved; and it was, of course, to Washington that the complaints and threats of resignation were made. Sullivan was piqued because he did not have a "separate" command. Arnold was passed over in the appointment of major-generals—the beginning of the discontent that ended in treason—and on April 3, 1777, Washington acknowledged his surprise but advised against "any hasty step," adding: "General Greene . . . was informed, that the members from each State seemed to insist upon having a proportion of general officers, adequate to the number of men which they furnish, and that, as Connecticut had already two major-generals, it was their full share. I confess this is a strange mode of reasoning; but it may serve to show you, that a promotion, which was due to your seniority, was not overlooked for want of Merit in you."

The attitude of Congress was consistent with that expressed by John Adams: "I will vote upon the general principles of a republic for a new election of General Officers annually." He had "no fear from the resignation of Officers if junior Officers are preferred to them. If they have virtue they will continue with us. If not, their resignation will not hurt us."

PHILADELPHIA CAMPAIGN (1777)

Howe's campaign of 1777 having finally disclosed its objective as Philadelphia, Congress again went into retirement. On August 22 it voted that it wished "the General . . . to proceed in such manner, as shall appear to him most conducive to the general interest," and on the next day, that the President should "inform General Washington, that Congress never intended by any commission hitherto granted by them, or by the establishment of any department whatever, to supersede or circumscribe the power of General Washington as the commander in chief of all the continental land force within the United States." On September 17, after the battle of Brandywine and when the fall of Philadelphia impended, it again bestowed high powers on the general for sixty days, and later continued them to March 1. Congress adjourned to Lancaster, met there one day, September 27, and then crossed the Susquehanna to York. Having neglected once more to make adequate preparations, partly, indeed, because it was without the power to move the states into action even when convinced of the need, it left the commander and the fragmentary army to bear the consequences, which in this particular case included the winter cantonment at Valley Forge, with the breakdown of both the commissary and quartermaster departments. Congress, December 10, reproved Washington for not making requisitions, being able to "impute his forbearance . . . to a delicacy in exerting military authority on the citizens of the states; a delicacy, which though highly laudable in general, may, on critical exigencies, prove destructive to the army and prejudicial to the general liberties of America." This was what Lovell, Massachusetts delegate, called rapping "a Demi G -- over the Knuckles." Washington confessed that he felt "greatly embarrassed with respect to a vigorous exercise of military power," because the people at large "have ever looked with a jealous and suspicious eye" on the acts of military authority.

CONGRESSIONAL INTRIGUE (1777-1778)

Between Washington and Congress, however, the most important matter as respects its possible effect on American history was the intrigues, and especially the Conway Cabal. Congressional opposition to Washington had been growing during 1777. Henry Laurens writing to his son John, who was on Washington's staff, reported on these growlings as early as October, and his later letters throw new light on the matter. The Cabal itself, which according to Burnett, is still partly a mystery, was only one phase of the opposition, of what Burnett terms the "whines and whiffing criticisms, the nagging tactics, the snaps and snarls of small-fry politicians in Congress." Washington, perhaps not unconscious that he was a chosen instrument, kept silent until he was able to demolish the conspiracy with a single phrase.

That ended the only attempt to displace him as the head of the army, since the Cabal could not stand exposure. Yet the backbiting, in which Lovell was prominent, went on. Lovell complained of the "privy Counsellors of one great Man whom no citizen shall dare even to talk about, say Gentlemen of the Blade." In the end the caviling died down. This was inevitable, for it lacked public support. Burnett says: "In viewing this episode of our history in which a severe indictment stands against many members of Congress, sometimes indeed against a majority of them, it should not be forgotten that there remained nevertheless in Congress many hearts that were right and heads with wisdom to perceive that with Washington they might win, without him they must lose. . . . And this conviction not only took deeper and deeper hold upon the minds of Congress, it speedily gripped the mind and heart of the nation. It does to this day."

WASHINGTON ON THE INTRIGUE

Washington, besides his effective stifling of the Cabal, made other references that showed his scorn of the whole affair and of the wider opposition. He wrote Laurens privately, January 31: "I was not unapprized, that a malignant faction had been for some time forming to my prejudice; which, conscious as I am of having ever done all in my power to answer the important purposes of the trust reposed in me, could not but give me some pain on a personal account. But my chief concern arises from an apprehension of the dangerous consequences, which intestine dissensions may produce to the common cause. As I have no other view than to promote the public good, and am unambitious of honors not founded in the approbation of my country, I would not desire in the least degree to suppress a free spirit of inquiry into any part of my conduct, that even faction itself may deem reprehensible. . . . My enemies take an ungenerous advantage of me. They know the delicacy of my situation, and that motives of policy deprive me of the defence I might otherwise make against their insidious attacks. They know I cannot combat their insinuations, however injurious, without disclosing secrets, which it is of the utmost moment to conceal."

CARTEL INCIDENT (1778)

One of the affronts put upon him by the prevailing spirit of Congress was in connection with a general cartel. This had been a serious and long standing problem, which seemed about to be solved. Washington's letters to the President of Congress tell the story. March 7, 1778, he wrote: "I was about to send commissioners to meet those appointed by General Howe . . . but, yesterday morning, . . . I found that a resolution had been made on the 26th of February, calling for all accounts against prisoners in our hands, and declaring that no exchange should take place, till the balance due thereon to the United States is discharged. . . . This resolution I cannot consider as an intended infraction of my engagements with General Howe; yet its operation is diametrically opposite both to the spirit and letter of the propositions made on my part, and acceded to on his. I supposed myself fully authorized 'by the instructions and intentions' of Congress to act as I did; and I now conceive, that the public as well as my own personal honor and faith are pledged for the performance. . . . it is much to be feared, if the exchange should be deferred till the terms of the last resolve were fulfilled, that it would be difficult to prevent our being generally accused of a breach of good faith." He wrote again, April 4: "It gives me pain to observe they appear to contain several implications by which my sensibility is not a little wounded."

This letter caused a furore in Congress. Burke of North Carolina in his account of it declared that an important phase was the exchange of Lee, which might not be effected by the military agreement but upon which Congress was determined. It is a valid presumption that the malcontents expected to find in him a new leader against Washington. Burke wrote that Washington "recommends that the Laws be suffered to sleep . . . and that a rule of practice be adopted directly contrary to them; but this proposal met with very great and almost general opposition and indignation in Congress." The proposed letter to the General and the debate on it were so virulent that Laurens wrote his son, April 9: "I am greatly distressed by circumstances now in agitation respecting your friend. I think I once said 'I hope he will never afford him or them his own consent to hurt him,' meaning, thereby, forcing him to resign. The letter as reported bore these statements: "by strictly attending to their Resolutions you will find they are founded in Humanity as well as Policy, and invariably regard the Dignity, Safety and Independence of these States. . . . It is the unalterable Determination of Congress, that unless this Point [the preliminary exchange of Lee] is acceded to, all further Negotiations . . . should cease, it being in their Opinion more eligible that no Cartel should take Place, than that the honor of these States should be sullied, and their Wisdom impeached, . . . I am further directed, Sir, by Congress to inform you, that in their opinion, the late Conduct and Correspondence of General Howe, render a strict Attention to the Support of the Dignity of these Free and Independent States, at this time peculiarly necessary; and that they esteem that Dignity Injured by permitting the Enemy's Officers . . . to go on Parole, before ours are sent out: a Practice admitting an Imputation of a want of good Faith on our Part, and a Perfect Confidence in an enemy whom we cannot trust: . . . they therefore doubt not from your Zeal for the Honor of these States, that you will pay a strict Attention to this Matter, as nothing can tend to sink us both in our Estimation and in that of all the World, than a patient Submission to that Insolent Superiority, which our Enemies affect in carrying on this War."

This, however, was too much for Burke who, by absenting himself, prevented a quorum, and the obnoxious matter was later cut out of the letter. The letter as sent, contained the following expression: "Congress with great Concern perceive that your Sensibility is wounded by their Resolutions. Placing the finest Confidence in your Prudence, Abilities and Integrity, they wish to preserve that Harmony with you, which is essential to the general Weal: you may be assured that far from any Intention to give you Pain, their Resolutions have no other Motive or End, but the public Good; they, therefore hope that you will not in future be distressed by Apprehensions, as injurious to their Honor, as they are to your own Feelings."

WASHINGTON AND THE FRENCH ALLIANCE (1778)

North's proposals for reconciliation were under consideration during 1778. Washington urged that Congress be not misled by them, since "nothing short of independence, it appears to me, can possibly do," taking the initiative in a manner that is suggestive not only of the real leadership but also of a realization of it on his part; but Congress was in complete harmony with the general's view and the affair had no influence upon their mutual relations. The same is true as to the French alliance, though he gave warning early of the danger of a let-down from too great expectations and dependence on it. It is questionable, however, whether he realized how great that danger was, though he was aware of the possible political effect. In the matter of the Canadian expedition which Congress had voted, he wrote November 11, 1778: "I am sorry to say that the plan proposed . . . does not appear to me to be eligible under our present circumstances," giving military reasons for it. But three days later he wrote Laurens privately: "The question of the Canadian expedition, in the form it now stands, appears to me one of the most interesting that has hitherto agitated our national deliberations. I have one objection to it, untouched in my public letter, which is, in my estimation, insurmountable, and alarms all my feelings for the true and permanent interests of my country. This is the introduction of a large body of French troops into Canada, and putting them in possession of the capital of that Province, attached to them by all the ties of blood, habits, manners, religion, and former connexion of Government. I fear this would be too great a temptation to be resisted by any power actuated by the common maxims of national policy." Under such circumstances he welcomed the direction of Congress to repair to Philadelphia in order to confer on the next campaign and military problems in general. The Canadian expedition was dropped; but by 1781 Washington himself was ready, in his instructions to John Laurens who was being sent to France, to implore for a liberal financial aid and more troops, as "indispensable" to the "safety of the United States."

ATTEMPTED ARMY REFORMS (1780)

The clash over the necessity of an adequate army continued. In the summer of 1780 he went over the whole ground with the Congressional Committee of Co-operation, evidently with conviction. He also once more admonished Congress, "we are again relapsing into the same Chaos." But the committee on its return to Philadelphia met with such a reception as gave Washington "much pain," as he wrote Delegate Mathews, who had been a member of the committee, October 4: "At a time when public harmony was so essential, when we should aid and assist each other with all our abilities, when our hearts should be open to information and our hands ready to administer relief, to find distrusts and jealousies taking possession of the mind, and a party spirit prevailing, is a most melancholy reflection, and forbodes no good."

And to Delegate Duane, the same day: "I should have been happy in the information you give me, that some progress had been made in the business of raising a permanent army, had it not been intimated to me, through other channels, that in the resolutions framed on this article, the fatal alternative of for one year has been admitted. . . . The present juncture is, in my opinion, peculiarly favorable to a permanent army, and I regret that an opening is given for a temporary one. It also gives me pain to find, that the pernicious State system is still adhered to, by leaving the reduction and incorporation, &c., of the regiments to the particular States. This is one of the greatest evils of our affairs. . . . The history of the war is a history of false hopes and temporary expedients. Would to God they were to end here!"

But Congress as well as the General had begun to realize their relative positions, so the military plan as adopted was referred to Washington. He replied, courteously as always, October 11: "I am much obliged to Congress for the honor they do me by the fresh mark of their attention and confidence, conferred upon me in the reference they have been pleased to make. My wish to concur in sentiment with them, and a conviction that there is no time to be lost in carrying the measures relative to the army into execution, make me reluctantly offer any objections to the plan, that has been adopted; but a sense of what I owe to Congress, and a regard to consistency, will not permit me to suppress the difference of opinion, which happens to exist upon the present occasion, on points that appear to me far from unessential. In expressing it, I can only repeat the ideas, which I have more than once taken the liberty to urge."

WASHINGTON AND POLITICAL REFORM (1778)

Thereupon, as Steuben reported October 23, "the plan of arrangement for the army, which your Excellency sent to Congress, has been agreed to without any alteration." Not that it was carried out; the political situation did not permit, and by the end of 1778, Washington had begun to express freely the realization that he must have had much earlier, of the necessity of political amendment. He wrote Harrison, December 18: "What may be the effect of such large and frequent emissions, of the dissensions,—parties,—extravagance, and a general lax of public virtue, Heaven alone can tell! I am afraid even to think of it. But it appears as clear to me as ever the Sun did in its meridian brightness, that America never stood in more eminent need of the wise, patriotic, and spirited exertions of her Sons than at this period; and if it is not a sufficient cause for genl. lamentation, my misconception of the matter impresses it too strongly upon me, that the States, separately, are too much engaged in their local concerns, and have too many of their ablest men withdrawn from the general council, for the good of the common weal. In a word, I think our political system may be compared to the mechanism of a clock, and that our conduct should derive a lesson from it; for it answers no good purpose to keep the smaller wheels in order, if the greater one, which is the support and prime mover of the whole, is neglected. . . .

"I have seen nothing since I came here [Philadelphia] . . . to change my opinion of Men or Measrs., but abundant reason to be convinced that our affairs are in a more distressed, ruinous, and deplorable condition than they have been in since the commencement of the War. . . . If I was to be called upon to draw a picture of the times and of Men, from what I have seen, and heard, and in part know, I should in one word say that idleness, dissipation & extravagance seems to have laid fast hold of most of them.—That speculation—peculation—and an insatiable thirst for riches seems to have got the better of every other consideration and almost of every order of Men.—That party disputes and personal quarels are the great business of the day whilst the momentous concerns of an empire—a great and accumulated debt—ruined finances—depreciated money—and want of credit (which in their consequences is the want of everything) are but secondary considerations and postponed from day to day—from week to week as if our affairs wear the most promising aspect—after drawing this picture, which from my Soul I believe to be a true one, I need not repeat to you that I am alarmed and wish to see my Countrymen aroused."

WASHINGTON AND POLITICAL AFFAIRS (1779)

He wrote Jay, President of Congress, March 1, 1779: "I have been a little surprised, that the several important pieces of intelligence lately received from Europe . . . have not been given to the public in a manner calculated to attract the attention and impress the minds of the people. . . . I have taken the liberty to trouble you with this hint, as sometimes things the most obvious escape attention." Again, April 23: "In one of your former letters you intimate, that a free communication of sentiments will not be displeasing to you. If, under this sanction, I should step beyond the line you would wish to draw, and suggest ideas, and ask questions, which are improper to be answered, you have only to pass them by in silence. I wish you to be convinced, that I do not desire to pry into measures, the knowledge of which is not necessary for my government as an executive officer [he does not say military!], or the premature discovery of which might be prejudicial to the plans in contemplation." Then he proceeds to make suggestions about the navy, Bermudian trade, and state of the currency. These were scarcely military matters. On September 7 he gave Jay his opinions on the European situation. Another indication was the greater frequency with which he wrote directly to the state authorities, ignoring Congress, the self-chosen medium for such communications. He had even appealed directly to the inhabitants of the middle states on February 18, 1778, though he might have justified that by his then existing enlarged direct powers. He corresponded directly with the French ministers; he issued circular letters to the states; he wrote to the commissioners at Paris. He may not have been conscious of the change, but it was there; the instinct of leadership was arousing and preparing to move into larger quarters.

WASHINGTON ON STATE RESPONSIBILITY (1780)

By 1780 the experience with a Congress that had no power to uphold its decrees, which could order by what Washington called "a timid kind of recommendations" but never enforce obedience upon the states, which had indeed no legal position other than that of wartime acceptance, showed clearly in Washington's writings. In a letter to Duane, May 13, 1780, he welcomed the "endeavors to accomplish the Confederation;" and wrote Joseph Jones, another delegate, that same month: "Certain I am, unless Congress speak in a more decisive tone, unless they are vested with powers by the several States competent to the great purposes of war, or assume them as matter of right, and they and the States respectively act with more energy than they hitherto have done, that our cause is lost. We can no longer drudge on in the old way. By ill timing the adoption of measures, by delays in the execution of them, or by unwarrantable jealousies, we incur enormous expenses and derive no benefit from them. One State will comply with a requisition of Congress; another neglects to do it; a third executes it by halves; and all differ either in the manner, the matter, or so much in point of time, that we are always working up hill, and ever shall be; and, while such a system as the present one or rather want of one prevails, we shall ever be unable to apply our strength or resources to any advantage. This, my dear Sir, is plain language to a member of Congress; but it is the language of truth and friendship. It is the result of long thinking, close application, and strict observation. I see one head gradually changing into thirteen. I see one army branching into thirteen, which, instead of looking up to Congress as the supreme controlling power of the United States, are considering themselves as dependent on their respective States. In a word, I see the powers of Congress declining too fast for the consideration and respect, which are due to them as the great representative body of America, and I am fearful of the consequences."

And in his circular to the states on the new army plan, October 18, he was very explicit in his condemnation of their recalcitrant attitude. "Every motive which can arise from a consideration of our circumstances, either in a domestic or foreign point of view, calls upon us to abandon temporary expedients and substitute something durable, systematic, and substantial. This applies as well to our civil administration as to our military establishment. It is as necessary to give Congress, the common head, sufficient powers to direct the common forces, as it is to raise an army for the war; but I should go out of my province to expatiate on civil affairs."

WASHINGTON'S CONSTRUCTIVE CRITICISM (1781)

His constructive criticism of Congress became even more direct, as in a letter to Sullivan, then a delegate, November 20: "This leads me to a remark, which I could wish never to make, and which is, that the multiplicity of business, in which Congress are engaged, will not let them extend that seasonable and provident care to many matters, which private convenience and public œconomy indispensably call for, and proves, in my opinion, the evident necessity of committing more of the executive business to small boards or responsible characters, than is practised at present; for I am very well convinced, that, for want of system in the execution of business, and a proper timing of things, that our public expenditures are inconceivably greater than they ought to be."

This was probably merely an expression of a general opinion; nevertheless it is interesting to note that on February 7, 1781, which was before the consent of Maryland made the Articles of Confederation active, a plan for executive departments—finance, war, and marine—was agreed to, a department of foreign affairs having been previously established. Washington welcomed these departments: "Proper Powers to and a judicious choice of men to fill these departments, will soon lead us to system, order, & œconomy—without which our affairs, already on the brink of ruin, would soon have passed redemption." And he remonstrated against the delay in making the appointments.

INADEQUACY OF THE CONFEDERATION

It is significant, however, that his comment on the Articles of Confederation going into operation was merely that it would "undoubtedly enable Congress to speak with more decision in their requisitions on the respective States." Evidently he did not consider the Articles as effecting the political reforms he desired; he wrote Custis just before they became active on March 1, 1781, of the necessity of vesting Congress with competent powers. "A nominal head which at present is but another name for Congress, will no longer do. That honorable body, after hearing the interests and views of the several States fairly discussed and explained by their respective representatives, must dictate, and not merely recommend and leave it to the States afterwards to do as they please, which, as I have observed before, is in many cases to do nothing at all."

To Harrison, March 4, 1783, he was even more vehement: "What, my dear Sir, could induce the State of Virginia to rescind their assent to the Impost Law? . . . The Alarm Bell which has been rung with such tremendous sound of the danger of entrusting Congress with the money is too selfish & futile to require a serious answer—Who are Congress, but the People?—do they not return to them at certain short periods?—Are they not amenable at all times to them for their Conduct—& subject to recall?—What interests therefore can a man have under these circumstances distinct from his Constituents?—Can it be supposed, that with design, he would form a junto—or dangerous Aristocracy that would operate against himself in less than a Month perhaps after it should be established?—I can have no conception of it. But from the observations I have made in the course of this war—and my intercourse with the States both in their united and separate capacities have afforded ample opportunities of judging—I am decidedly of opinion that if the Powers of Congress are not enlarged, and made competent to all general purposes that the blood that has been spilt—the Expenses which have been incurred—and the distresses which we have undergone will avail us nothing—and that the band which at present holds us together, by a very feeble thread, will soon be broken when anarchy & confusion must ensue."

NEWBURGH ADDRESSES (1783)

After Yorktown victory was in the air, though he wrote in June, 1782, that the "end of our warfare is not to be obtained but by vigorous exertions"; and the concern turned from how to get and use an army to what to do with the army already on hand. With approaching peace and the inevitable result to discipline of inaction, the troops began to think more than ever of their past hardships, present prospects, and future rewards, and threatened not to disband until they had received justice.

The discontent of the officers culminated in the Newburgh Addresses; the principal one was later claimed by Armstrong, Gates's aide, but possibly Hamilton and Gouverneur Morris engineered the movement. Hamilton had urged Washington to take the lead in the army's plan for redress, but under cover, and even suggested Knox as a proper dummy. Washington's reply to the Addresses, March 15, 1783, prevented the crisis. Madison wrote: "The steps taken by the General to avert the gathering storm, and his professions of inflexible adherence to his duty to Congress and to his country, excited the most affectionate sentiments towards him." In that reply, the general gave the expression of his final public opinion of the wartime Congress: "I cannot, in justice to my own belief, and what I have great reason to conceive is the intention of Congress, conclude this address without giving it as my decided opinion, that that honorable body entertain exalted sentiments of the services of the army, and, from a full conviction of its merits and sufferings, will do it complete justice. That their endeavors to discover, and establish funds for this purpose have been unwearied, and will not cease, till they have succeeded, I have no doubt; but, like all other large bodies, where there is a variety of different interests to reconcile, their deliberations are slow. Why then should we distrust them; and, in consequence of that distrust, adopt measures, which may cast a shade over that glory, which has been so justly acquired, and tarnish the reputation of an army, which is celebrated through all Europe for its fortitude and patriotism? And for what is this done? To bring the object we seek nearer? No! Most certainly, in my opinion, it will cast it at a greater distance. For myself . . . I . . . declare in this public and solemn manner, that, in the attainment of complete justice for all your toils and dangers, and in the gratification of every wish, so far as may be done consistently with the great duty I owe to my country, and those powers we are bound to respect, you may freely command my services to the utmost extent of my abilities."

But his private letters to Jones and Harrison show his realization that even if Congress were willing nothing would result from his efforts unless the states did their duty by providing the funds. It was much of a grandstand play after all, which only his great prestige made successful, for a letter written soon after to Hamilton showed clearly that he had no expectation of progress until there had been a radical change in the basis of the union.

OFFER OF KINGSHIP (1782)

So it happened that when he surrendered his commission to Congress at Annapolis at the end of the year, the army had already dispersed. An earlier episode is worthy of notice and it is interesting to speculate whether it would not have been much more important if he had not used his great influence to soothe the officers. This was the suggestion of kingship. Col. Lewis Nicola, who was the medium of the suggestion, had been in 1782 selected by the officers to confer with Washington about their grievances; he addressed to the general, possibly at the instigation of others, possibly not, a paper in which he spoke of the weakness of republics and ended, "I believe strong arguments might be produced for admitting the title of King, which I conceive would be attended with some material advantages." Washington's reaction was immediate and explicit. His reply to the colonel was written on May 22, and he deemed it so important that he had Humphreys and Trumbull, aide and secretary, certify to the exactness of the copy he kept. "With a mixture of great surprise and astonishment, I have read with attention the sentiments you have submitted to my perusal. Be assured, Sir, no occurrence in the course of the war has given me more painful sensations, than your information of there being such ideas existing in the army, as you have expressed, and I must view with abhorrence and reprehend with severity. For the present the communicatn. of them will rest in my own bosom, unless some further agitation of the matter shall make a disclosure necessary. I am much at a loss to conceive what part of my conduct could have given encouragement to an address, which to me seems big with the greatest mischiefs, that can befall my Country. If I am not deceived in the knowledge of myself, you could not have found a person to whom your schemes are more disagreeable. . . . Let me conjure you, then, if you have any regard for your Country, concern for yourself or posterity, or respect for me, to banish these thoughts from your mind, and never communicate, as from yourself or any one else, a sentiment of the like nature."

SURRENDER OF COMMISSION (1783)

The surrender of the commission to Congress was the occasion of mutual felicitations as well as much natural emotion. Washington might well have passed in review in his mind his repeated admonitions and prophecies of irretrievable ruin unless certain reforms were made, which never were made. How did it happen that in spite of all his forebodings the army kept the field, the obvious weakness of Congress was not fatal, the recalcitrancy of the states did not utterly destroy, and a successful war brought independence? Washington does not attempt an explanation unless a characteristic statement in his farewell to the army may be so considered: "The singular interpositions of Providence in our feeble condition were such, as could scarcely escape the attention of the most unobserving; while the unparalleled perseverance of the armies of the United States, through almost every possible suffering and discouragement for the space of eight long years, was little short of a standing miracle." The proper summing up of the reasons has yet to be made, and in the recent death of Professor Van Tyne history has been deprived of the scholar probably best equipped to make it. Many factors entered into it: foreign aid and European conditions were a fundamental element; a greater determination on the part of the people than Washington suspected was probably there and it rose to meet crises; British mistakes; development of American generalship; the Allies' temporary control of the sea; even the militia did its appreciable part in such emergencies as the Burgoyne and Yorktown campaigns, and in the harrowing of the British army in the South; above all, Washington probably did not realize the power of his own great example and influence.

One change which he made in his farewell address to Congress is of interest. Originally he wrote, "Happy in the confirmation of our Independence and Sovereignty, as well as in the contemplation of our prospects of national happiness," but as delivered the second phrase had become, "and pleased with the opportunity afforded the United States of becoming a respectable nation." He had written Hamilton on March 31 that he had a great inclination "to contribute my mite to pointing out all the defects of the present constitution"; and to Greene, Theodorick Bland, William Gordon, and others he continued to show the need of the reforms; as he expressed it, "all my private letters have teemed with these sentiments," and they continued to do so after his retirement.

CIRCULAR LETTER TO THE STATES (1783)

In his last circular letter to the states, June 8, 1783, he summed up his public utterances: "There are four things, which, I humbly conceive, are essential to the well-being, I may even venture to say, to the existence of the United States, as an independent power.

"First. An indissoluble union of the States under one federal head.

"Secondly. A sacred regard to public justice.

"Thirdly. The adoption of a proper peace establishment; and

"Fourthly. The prevalence of that pacific and friendly disposition among the people of the United States, which will induce them to forget their local prejudices and policies; to make those mutual concessions, which are requisite to the general prosperity; and, in some instances, to sacrifice their individual advantages to the interest of the community. . . .

"Under the first head, . . . That, unless the States will suffer Congress to exercise those prerogatives they are undoubtedly invested with by the constitution, every thing must very rapidly tend to anarchy and confusion. That it is indispensable to the happiness of the individual States, that there should be lodged somewhere a supreme power to regulate and govern the general concerns of the confederated republic, without which the Union cannot be of long duration. That there must be a faithful and pointed compliance, on the part of every State, with the late proposals and demands of Congress, or the most fatal consequences will ensue. . . . It is only in our united character, as an empire, that our independence is acknowledged, that our power can be regarded, or our credit supported, among foreign nations. The treaties of the European powers with the United States of America will have no validity on a dissolution of the Union. . . .

"If, after all, a spirit of disunion, or a temper of obstinacy and perverseness should manifest itself in any of the States; if such an ungracious disposition should attempt to frustrate all the happy effects that might be expected to flow from the Union; if there should be a refusal to comply with the requisition for funds to discharge the annual interest of the public debts; and if that refusal should revive again all those jealousies, and produce all those evils, which are now happily removed, Congress, who have, in all their transactions, shown a great degree of magnanimity and justice, will stand justified in the sight of God and man; and the State alone, which puts itself in opposition to the aggregate wisdom of the continent, and follows such mistaken and pernicious counsels, will be responsible for all the consequences."

REFORM THROUGH EXPERIENCE ONLY

In a letter to Lafayette, April 5, 1783, he makes the interesting statement that the reforms would probably be brought about only through the experience of their need: "We stand, now, an Independent People, and have yet to learn political Tactics. We are placed among the nations of the Earth, and have a character to establish; but how we shall acquit ourselves, time must discover. The probability (at least I fear it), is that local or State politics will interfere too much with the more liberal and extensive plan of government, which wisdom and foresight, freed from the mist of prejudice, would dictate; and that we shall be guilty of many blunders in treading this boundless theatre, before we shall have arrived at any perfection in this art; in a word, that the experience, which is purchased at the price of difficulties and distress, will alone convince us that the honor, power, and true Interest of this Country must be measured by a Continental scale, and that every departure therefrom weakens the Union, and may ultimately break the band which holds us together." Certainly the first years of peace furnished sufficient experience.

POPULAR RESPONSIBILITY (1786)

He not only continued to see the danger, but now he began to fear that the necessary reforms would not take place. He wrote Jay, who was then Foreign Secretary, May 18, 1786: "I shall find myself happily mistaken if the remedies are at hand. We are certainly in a delicate situation; but my fear is, that the people are not yet sufficiently misled to retract from error. To be plainer, I think there is more wickedness than ignorance mixed in our councils. Under this impression I scarcely know what opinion to entertain of a general convention. That it is necessary to revise and amend the articles of confederation, I entertain no doubt; but what may be the consequences of such an attempt is doubtful. Yet something must be done, or the fabric must fall, for it certainly is tottering . . . From the high ground we stood upon, from the plain path which invited our footsteps, to be so fallen! so lost! it is really mortifying. But virtue, I fear, has in a great degree taken its departure from our land, and the want of a disposition to do justice is the source of the national embarrassments; . . ."

It is noticeable here that his reference has turned from the states to the people; and this idea is also in a letter to Lafayette, May 10, 1786, which, in addition shows that he did not entirely despair: "It is one of the evils of democratical government, that the people, not always seeing and frequently misled, must often feel before they can act right; but then evils of this nature seldom fail to work their own cure."

SHAYS REBELLION (1786)

He was to have his patience yet further tried, however, as in the final failure of the impost amendment and in the popular tumults, of which the most serious was the Shays Rebellion in Massachusetts. His comments on this are almost the last of those caused by, or at least under, the weak Confederation. He expressed his mind to Henry Lee, October 31, 1786: "You talk, my good Sir, of employing influence to appease the present tumults in Massachusetts. I know not where that influence is to be found, or, if attainable, that it would be a proper remedy for the disorders. Influence is no government. Let us have one by which our lives, liberties, and property will be secured, or let us know the worst at once. Under these impressions, my humble opinion is, that there is a call for decision. Know precisely what the insurgents aim at. If they have real grievances, redress them if possible; or acknowledge the justice of them, and your inability to do it in the present moment. If they have not, employ the force of government against them at once. If this is inadequate, all will be convinced, that the superstructure is bad, or wants support."

Also to Knox, December 26: "I feel, my dear General Knox, infinitely more than I can express to you, for the disorders, which have arisen in these States. Good God! Who, besides a Tory, could have foreseen, or a Briton predicted them? Were these people wiser than others, or did they judge of us from the corruption and depravity of their own hearts?" But even in this letter there is mention of the new interest, of the proposed Federal Convention, which was to turn the speculations upon evils, the need of remedies, and the bemoaning of the failure of inadequate, half-spirited, piecemeal efforts at reform, to the consideration of an active, general attempt to sweep away the old hampered government in favor of an entirely new plan. His interest and promotion of this is the subject of another article.

Preliminaries of the Convention

GEORGE WASHINGTON

From the Gilbert Stuart "Athenaeum" Portrait

INFLUENCE OF POTOMAC NAVIGATION (1772-1785)

WASHINGTON'S first link in the chain of the Federal Convention was his interest in the improvement of the Potomac River navigation. Development of a route into the West had long been under consideration. It was a concern of the original Ohio Company, in which the Washington family was active; and George's early surveying and western journeys and campaigns, with the attendant acquirement of land, gave him both information and reason to advance the project. This improvement as a commercial and engineering matter is treated elsewhere in this series; here the concern is with its political relation. Through Washington's efforts Virginia in 1772 passed an act "empowering Trustees . . . to raise money . . . for the purpose of opening and extending the Navigation of Potowmack from the Tide water to Fort Cumberland." Nothing was accomplished, however, until the close of the Revolution, when the general's enthusiasm for the project became great; and his western trip in 1784 was in part an inspection of possible water routes or of combined water and land routes over the mountains.

His concern was not entirely economic. He realized that the developing West had a natural trade outlet down the Mississippi, and in order to counteract this tendency and to keep that distant region loyal to the yet fragile Union such an eastern route as he proposed was essential. He wrote Humphreys, July 25, 1785: "My attention is more immediately engaged in a project, which I think big with great political, as well as commercial consequences to these States, especially the middle ones; it is by removing the obstructions and extending the inland navigation of our rivers, to bring the States on the Atlantic in close connexion with those forming to the westward, by a short and easy transportation. Without this, I can easily conceive they will have different views, separate interests, and other connexions. I may be singular in my ideas, but they are these; that, to open a door to, and make easy the way for, those settlers to the westward (which ought to progress regularly and compactly) before we make any stir about the navigation of the Mississippi, and before our settlements are far advanced towards that river, would be our true line of policy.

"It can, I think, be demonstrated, that the produce of the western territory, (if the navigations which are now in hand succeed, and of which I have no doubt,) as low down the Ohio as the Great Kanhawa, I believe to the Falls, and between the parts above and the Lakes, may be brought either to the highest shipping port on this or James river, at a less expense, with more ease, (including the return,) and in a much shorter time, than it can be carried to New Orleans, if the Spaniards, instead of restricting, were to throw open their ports and invite our trade. But if the commerce of that country should embrace this channel, and connexions be formed, experience has taught us, and there is a very recent proof with great Britain, how next to impracticable it is to divert it; and, if that should be the case, the Atlantic States, (especially as those to the westward will in a great degree fill with foreigners,) will be no more to the present Union, except to excite perhaps very justly our fears, than the country of California, which is still more to the westward, and belonging to another power."

RIVALRY OF VIRGINIA AND MARYLAND (1784-1785)

The Potomac was the boundary between Virginia and Maryland; indeed the waters were in the jurisdiction of the latter, Virginia had only reserved her right of navigation; so that an agreement between the two states was essential. Jefferson shared in Washington's desire for the development, and so did Thomas Johnson, formerly Governor of Maryland. Washington wrote Jefferson, who was then in Congress at Annapolis, March 29, 1784: "The plan, however, was in a tolerably good train, when I set out for Cambridge in 1775, and would have been in an excellent way, had it not been for the difficulties, which were met with in the Maryland Assembly from the opposition which was given (according to report) by the Baltimore merchants, who were alarmed, and perhaps not without cause, at the consequence of water transportation to Georgetown of the produce, which usually came to their market by land. The local interest of that place, joined to the short-sighted politics or contracted views of another part of that Assembly, gave Mr. Thomas Johnson, who was a warm promoter of the scheme on the north side of the Potomac, a great deal of trouble. . . . It appears to me, that the interest and policy of Maryland are proportionably concerned with those of Virginia, to remove obstructions, and to invite the trade of the western country into the channel you have mentioned. You will have frequent opportunities of learning the sentiments of the principle characters of that State, respecting this matter; and I wish, if it should fall in your way, that you would discourse with Mr. Thomas Johnson, formerly Governor of Maryland, on this subject."

At this same time Madison was writing to Jefferson concerning methods of an agreement with Maryland on the use of the river; suggesting as best "a mutual appointment of Commissioners for the general purpose of preserving a harmony and efficacy in the regulations on both sides." Accordingly, he carried through a resolution in the Virginia Assembly, June 28, 1784, for such a joint commission to "frame such liberal and equitable regulations concerning said river as may be mutually advantageous." Maryland agreed and the meeting was to take place in March, 1785.

Meanwhile Washington took his last trip over the mountains and returned more than ever persuaded of the need and possibility of the communication. He wrote Governor Harrison, October 10, a long letter on the subject, pointing out the efforts which Pennsylvania and New York were making, and the political consideration, "which is of still greater importance," since the "western settlers (I speak now from my own observation) stand as it were upon a pivot. . . . A combination of circumstances makes the present conjuncture more favorable for Virginia, than for any other State in the Union, to fix these matters. . . . One thing more remains, . . . the supposed difficulty of obtaining a passage through the State of Pennsylvania. How an application to its legislature would be relished, in the first instance, I will not undertake to decide."

After his return from this journey a mass meeting was held in Alexandria, November 15, 1784, attended by gentlemen from both Maryland and Virginia. It is to be presumed that Washington was there. The newspaper report on the meeting contains this interesting sentence: "This is perhaps a work of more political than commercial consequence, and it will be one of the grandest chains for preserving the Federal Union."

ARRANGEMENTS FOR A CONFERENCE (1784-1785)

Here then was a commercial project in active contemplation, which would involve the interests of at least three of the states. Washington sent to Richmond and also to Annapolis a bill to incorporate the company he desired, which passed both legislatures; but a conference was necessary to iron out differences. Washington headed the Virginia delegation. He wrote Knox, January 5, 1785: "I am just returned from Annapolis to which place I was requested to go by our Assembly (with my bosom friend Genl. G-tes, who being at Richmond contrived to edge himself into the commission) for the purpose of arranging matters, and forming a Law which should be similar in both States, so far as it respected the river Potomack, which separates them. I met the most perfect accordance in that legislature; and the matter is now reported to ours, for its concurrence."

The recommendations made were later approved by the two legislatures. Madison in commenting on the matter wrote, December 25, 1784, that there would probably be provision made "for a survey of the different routes for a communication between the waters of Elizabeth River and those of North Carolina." The Virginia Legislature adopted a resolution directing the commissioners who were to meet those from Maryland the next summer to join "in a representation to Pennsylvania on the subject of the waters of the Ohio within her limits." Also it was well known that Maryland desired a canal connecting the waters of the Chesapeake and Delaware, which would involve yet one more state in the commercial agitation.

The Maryland-Virginia joint commission on the navigation of the Potomac met in Alexandria on March 20, 1785, and continued its meeting at Mount Vernon where the compact was signed, March 28. Madison on July 26 spoke of the "urgency of General Washington in the late negotiation with Maryland." The outcome is a part of national history. Both legislatures ratified the compact, but Maryland, November 21, on the motion of Stone, who had been a signer of the document, asked for a further conference and proposed the inclusion of Pennsylvania and Delaware. Both these states accepted and Maryland appointed new commissioners.

PROPOSAL OF A GENERAL CONVENTION (1786)

Meanwhile, a resolution went very quickly through the Virginia Legislature, January 21, 1786, which ignored Congress and appointed commissioners to meet with such other commissioners as should be appointed by any of the states to consider the trade of the Union. These Virginia delegates, of whom Madison was the leader, issued invitations which were generally accepted; but delegates from only five states met at Annapolis in September, 1786. A report was prepared by Hamilton and a new convention was proposed to meet in Philadelphia the next May. This call was addressed directly to the states, but a copy was sent to Congress; that body in the end ignored the particular summons but issued an invitation of its own for the same place and time. Thus the Federal Convention of 1787 is linked up with the question of transportation to the West.

Washington had no public share in any of these preliminary matters, but his interest was active. Madison was a frequent visitor at Mount Vernon at this time, staying over night or several days at a time. Mason and Edmund Randolph, as well as prominent men of other colonies, were also Washington's guests. The comments in his letters begin with one to Lafayette, May 10, 1786: ". . . whilst a measure, in which this State has taken the lead at its last session, will, it is to be hoped, give efficient powers to that body for all commercial purposes. This is a nomination of some of its first characters to meet other commissioners from the several States, in order to consider of and decide upon such powers, as shall be necessary for the sovereign power of them to act under; which are to be reported to the respective legislatures at their autumnal sessions, for, it is to be hoped, final adoption; thereby avoiding those tedious and futile deliberations, which result from recommendations and partial concurrences, at the same time that it places it at once in the power of Congress to meet European nations upon decisive and equal ground. All the legislatures, which I have heard from, have come into the proposition, and have made very judicious appointments. Much good is expected from this measure, and it is regretted by many, that more objects were not embraced by the meeting. A general convention is talked of by many for the purpose of revising and correcting the defects of the federal government; but whilst this is the wish of some, it is the dread of others, from an opinion that matters are not yet sufficiently ripe for such an event."

After the Annapolis Convention had adjourned and its recommendation was before the Virginia Legislature, Washington wrote Madison, November 5: "No morn ever dawned more favorably than ours did; and no day was ever more clouded than the present. Wisdom and good examples are necessary at this time to rescue the political machine from the impending storm. Virginia has now an opportunity to set the latter, and has enough of the former, I hope, to take the lead in promoting this great and arduous work."

WOULD WASHINGTON ATTEND THE CONVENTION (1786)?

Madison, in his reply, brought directly to the general the problem of breaking his retirement once more. He wrote, November 8: "The expediency of complying with the recommendation from Annapolis in favor of a general revision of the federal system, was unanimously agreed to. A bill for the purpose is now depending, and in a form which attests the most federal spirit. As no opposition has been yet made, and it is ready for the third reading, I expect it will soon be before the public. It has been thought advisable to give this subject a very solemn dress, and all the weight which could be derived from a single State. This idea will also be pursued in the selection of characters to represent Virginia in the federal convention. You will infer our earnestness on this point from the liberty, which will be used, of placing your name at the head of them. How far this liberty may correspond with the ideas, by which you ought to be governed, will be best decided when it must ultimately be determined. In every event, it will assist powerfully in marking the zeal of our legislature, and its opinion of the magnitude of the occasion."

For the next few months the struggle between Washington's wishes and his sense of public responsibility engrossed his correspondence. He wrote Madison, December 16, stating that he had already refused to attend the meeting of the Cincinnati, also called for Philadelphia in May, and this alone would seem to preclude his attending the other convention; but adding: "That the present moment is pregnant of great and strange events, none who will cast their eyes around them can deny. What may be brought forth between this and the first of May, to remove the difficulties, which at present labor in my mind against the acceptance of the honor, which has lately been conferred on me by the Assembly, is not for me to predict; but I should think it incompatible with that candor, which ought to characterize an honest mind, not to declare, that, under my present view of the matter, I should be too much embarrassed by the meeting of these two bodies in the same place at the same moment, after what I have written to be easy in my situation, and therefore that it would be improper to let my appointment stand in the way of another. Of this, you, who have had the whole matter before you, will judge; for, having received no other than private intimation of my election, and unacquainted with the formalities, which are or ought to be used on these occasions, silence may be deceptive, or considered as disrespectful. This imputation of both or either I would wish to avoid."

ADVICE OF FRIENDS (1786)

Madison persisted in his urging: "But I am still inclined to think, that the posture of our affairs, if it should continue, would prevent any criticism on the situation, which the contemporary meetings would place you in; and wish that at least a door could be left open for your acceptance hereafter, in case the gathering clouds should become so dark and menacing, as to supersede every consideration but that of our national existence or safety."

The retired warrior, anxious to know his duty, appealed then to Humphreys, his former aide, December 26: "That the federal government is nearly if not quite at a stand, none will deny. The first question then is, shall it be annihilated or supported? If the latter, the proposed convention is an object of the first magnitude, and should be sustained by all the friends of the present constitution. In the other case, if, on a full and dispassionate revision, the continuance shall be adjudged impracticable or unwise, as only delaying an event which must ere long take place, would it not be better for such a meeting to suggest some other, to avoid if possible civil disorder or other impending evils? I must candidly confess, as we could not remain quiet more than three or four years in time of peace, under the constitutions of our own choosing, which it was believed, in many States at least, were formed with deliberation and wisdom, I see little prospect either of our agreeing upon any other, or that we should remain long satisfied under it if we could. Yet I would wish any thing and every thing essayed to prevent the effusion of blood, and to avert the humiliating and contemptible figure we are about to make in the annals of mankind."

"If this second attempt to convene the States, for the purposes proposed by the report of the partial representation at Annapolis in September, should also prove abortive, it may be considered as an unequivocal evidence, that the States are not likely to agree on any general measure, which is to pervade the Union, and of course that there is an end of federal government. The States, therefore, which make the last dying essay to avoid these misfortunes, would be mortified at the issue, and their deputies would return home chagrined at their ill success and disappointment. This would be a disagreeable circumstance for any one of them to be in, but more particularly so for a person in my situation."

WASHINGTON ADVOCATES THE CONVENTION (1787)

Knox, too, was taken into his confidence; he wrote February 3, 1787: "Thus the matter stands, which is the reason of my saying to you in confidence, that at present I retain my first intention not to go. In the mean while, as I have the fullest conviction of your friendship for and attachment to me, know your abilities to judge, and your means of information, I shall receive any communication from you on this subject with thankfulness. My first wish is to do for the best, and to act with propriety. You know me too well to believe, that reserve or concealment of any opinion or circumstance would be at all agreeable to me. The legality of this convention I do not mean to discuss, nor how problematical the issue of it may be. That powers are wanting none can deny. Through what medium they are to be derived will, like other matters, engage the attention of the wise. That, which takes the shortest course to obtain them, in my opinion will, under present circumstances, be found best; otherwise, like a house on fire, whilst the most regular mode of extinguishing the flames is contended for, the building is reduced to ashes. My opinion of the energetic wants of the federal government are well known. My public announcements and private declarations have uniformly expressed these sentiments; and, however constitutional it may be for Congress to point out the defects of the federal system, I am strongly inclined to believe, that it would not be found the most efficacious channel for the recommendations, more especially the alterations, to flow, for reasons too obvious to enumerate."

WASHINGTON'S ESTIMATE OF THE DIFFICULTIES

Given the advisability of the convention, he was not inclined to stress the question of unconstitutionality: "I would fain try what the wisdom of the proposed convention will suggest, and what can be effected by their counsels. It may be the last peaceable mode of essaying the practicability of the present form, without a greater lapse of time, than the exigency of our affairs will allow. In strict propriety, a convention so holden may not be legal. Congress, however, may give it a coloring by recommendation, which would fit it more to the taste, without proceeding to a definition of the powers. This, however constitutionally it might be done, would not in my opinion be expedient."

Still, as he wrote Humphreys again, March 8, the action of Congress in the matter somewhat eased his troubles: "I am still indirectly and delicately pressed by many to attend this meeting; and a thought has run thro' my mind of late attended with more embarrassment than any former one. It is whether my not doing it will not be considered as an implied dereliction to Republicanism—nay more, whether (however injurious the imputation) it may not be ascribed to other motives. My wish is I confess to see this Convention tied [tried?]; after which, if the present form is not made efficient, conviction of the propriety of a change will pervade all ranks, and many [may] be effected by peace. Till then, however necessary it may appear to the more discerning part of the community, my opinion is, that it cannot be accomplished without great contention and much confusion for reasons too obvious to enumerate. It is one of the evils, perhaps not the smallest, of democratical governments that they must feel before they will see or act under this view of matters, and not doubting but you have heard the sentiments of many respectable characters since the date of your letter of the 20th of January on this subject, and perhaps since the business has been moved in Congress of the propriety or impropriety of my attendance, let me pray you, my dear Sir, to give me confidentially the public opinion and expectation as far as it has come to your knowledge of what it is supposed, I will or ought to do on this occasion."

QUESTION OF MONARCHY

The letter of March 31 to Madison is of unusual interest, because therein he spoke directly of the monarchical possibility at which he merely hinted in the letters to Humphreys: "I think the reasons in favor have the preponderancy over those against it. It is idle in my opinion to suppose that the Sovereign can be insensible to the inadequacy of the powers under which they act, and that, seeing it, they should not recommend a revision of the federal system; especially when it is considered by many as the only constitutional mode by which the defects can be remedied. Had Congress proceeded to a delineation of the powers, it might have sounded an alarm; but, as the case is, I do not conceive that it will have that effect. . . .

"I am fully of opinion that those, who lean to a monarchical government, have either not consulted the public mind, or that they live in a region, which (the levelling principles in which they were bred being entirely eradicated) is much more productive of monarchical ideas, than are to be found in the southern States, where, from the habitual distinctions which have always existed among the people, one would have expected the first generation and the most rapid growth of them. I am also clear, that, even admitting the utility, nay, necessity of the form, yet that the period is not arrived for adopting the change without shaking the peace of this country to its foundation. That a thorough reform of the present system is indispensable, none, who have capacities to judge, will deny; and with hand [and heart] I hope the business will be essayed in a full convention.

"After which, if more powers and more decision is not found in the existing form, if it still wants energy and that secrecy and despatch (either from the nonattendance or the local views of its members), which is characteristic of good government, and if it shall be found (the contrary of which, however, I have always been more afraid of than of the abuse of them), that Congress will, upon all proper occasions, exert the powers which are given, with a firm and steady hand, instead of frittering them back to the States, where the members, in place of viewing themselves in their national character, are too apt to be looking,—I say, after this essay is made, if the system proves inefficient, conviction of the necessity of a change will be disseminated among all classes of the people. Then, and not till then, in my opinion, can it be attempted without involving all the evils of civil discord.

"I confess, however, that my opinion of public virtue, is so far changed, that I have my doubts whether any system, without the means of coercion in the sovereign, will enforce due obedience to the ordinances of a general government; without which every thing else fails. Laws or ordinances unobserved, or partially attended to, had better never have been made; because the first is a mere nihil, and the second is productive of much jealousy and discontent. But what kind of coercion, you may ask. This indeed will require thought, though the non-compliance of the States with the late requisition is an evidence of the necessity."

Of interest in the light of the proceedings of the Federal Convention, in this insistence on the power of coercion in the central government, though there is no indication that he had in mind at this time at least the eventual solution of direct action of the federal government upon the people. It is interesting, too, to contrast the above statement with his indignant rejection of Nicola's suggestion of kingship in 1782.

COUNSELS ON ATTENDING THE CONVENTION (1787)

These and other letters produced replies that in general urged his attendance. Knox had no doubts, and was almost prophetic in his reply: "I imagine that your own satisfaction, or chagrin, and that of your friends, will depend entirely on the result of the convention. For I take it for granted, that, however reluctantly you may acquiesce, you will be constrained to accept of the president's chair. Hence the proceedings of the convention will more immediately be appropriated to you than to any other person. Were the convention to propose only amendments and patchwork to the present defective confederation, your reputation would in a degree suffer. But, were an energetic and judicious system to be proposed with your signature, it would be a circumstance highly honorable to your fame, in the judgment of the present and future ages; and doubly entitle you to the glorious republican epithet, The Father of your Country.

"But, the men generally chosen being of the first information, great reliance may be placed on the wisdom and vigor of their counsels and judgment, and therefore the balance of my opinion preponderates greatly in favor of your attendance. I am persuaded, that your name has had already great influence to induce the States to come into the measure, that your attendance will be grateful, that your presence would confer on the assembly a national complexion, and that it would more than any other circumstance induce a compliance with the propositions of the convention."

Humphreys personally thought Washington's attendance unwise. He wrote his General, January 20, 1787: "The personal character of yourself and some other Gentlemen would have a weight on individuals—but on democratic Assemblies & the bulk of the People, your opinions & your eloquence would be 'trifles light as air.' After the abominable neglects, with which your recommendations of the Army have been treated; he must indeed have faith to remove mountains, who can believe in the good dispositions of the Country." However, he later acknowledged that Gouverneur Morris and others had wished him to use whatever influence he might have to induce Washington to attend. "I could not have promised this without counteracting my own judgment. I will not, however, hesitate to say, that I do not conceive your attendance can hazard such personal ill consequences, as were to be apprehended before the proposed meeting had been legitimated by the sanction of Congress."

WASHINGTON AGREES TO ATTEND (1787)

In the end Washington decided to attend the Convention, writing Governor Randolph March 28: "I apprehend, too much cause to arraign my conduct with inconsistency in again appearing on a public theatre, after a public declaration to the contrary, and because it will, I fear, have a tendency to sweep me back into the tide of public affairs, when retirement and ease is so essentially necessary for and is so much desired by me. However, as my friends, with a degree of solicitude which is unusual, seem to wish for my attendance on this occasion, I have come to a resolution to go, if my health will permit."

The spirit with which he looked forward to the Convention was not very hopeful. To Madison he wrote in the letter above quoted, March 31: "It gives me great pleasure to hear, that there is a probability of a full representation of the States in convention; but if the delegates come to it under fetters, the salutary ends proposed will in my opinion be greatly embarrassed and retarded, if not altogether defeated. I am desirous of knowing how this matter is, as my wish is that the convention may adopt no temporizing expedients, but probe the defects of the constitution to the bottom, and provide a radical cure, whether they are agreed to or not. A conduct of this kind will stamp wisdom and dignity on their proceedings, and hold up a light which sooner or later will have its influence."

To Randolph he sounded the more personal note, April 9: "I very much fear that all the States will not appear in convention, and that some of them will come fettered so as to impede rather than accelerate the great object of their convening; which, under the peculiar circumstances of my case, would place me in a more disagreeable situation than any other member would stand in. As I have yielded, however, to what appeared to be the earnest wishes of my friends, I will hope for the best."

Part II

Results of the Convention

OPENING OF THE CONVENTION (MAY, 1787)

Washington set out for the Convention on May 9; on the 13th was met at Chester by Generals Knox, Mifflin, and Varnum, Humphreys, Major Jackson, who was to become secretary of the Convention, and other former army officers. "At Gray's Ferry the city light horse . . . met me, and escorted me in by the artillery officers who stood arranged and saluted as I passed. . . . kindly pressed by Mr. and Mrs. Robert Morris to lodge with them, I did so. . . . Waited on the President, Doctr. Franklin, as soon as I got to Town. On my arrival, the Bells were chimed." For lack of a quorum the Convention did not meet until May 25, "when by a unanimous vote I was called up to the chair as President." Meetings were secret; Washington respected this so thoroughly that "nothing being suffered to transpire, no minutes of the proceedings has been, or will be inserted in this diary." There is an anecdote that when one member happened to drop his copy of the proceedings, luckily found by another member and given to the president, Washington's criticism was so scathing that the papers were never reclaimed.

VOTES AND ATTITUDE IN CON- VENTION (1787)

Since Washington followed his usual habit of making no use of his diary as a record of consultations or arguments, purposely confining the entries in this crisis to very brief notes on social engagements, we are dependent upon fellow members for knowledge of the participation and personal influence of the president of the Convention. So far as known he made but one speech in the Convention; Madison's notes give this as a plea, in the final hours of the meeting, in favor of a more liberal ratio of representation. The eloquent brief speech with which he is accredited during the early dark days is apocryphal. It appears first in Gouverneur Morris's funeral oration on Washington, and must be classed with the address on independence put in Adams's mouth by Webster, and Lincoln's tariff speech as imagined by Robert Ingersoll. His only known votes were: (1) in favor of a single executive; (2) against the election of the executive by Congress; (3) in favor of an export tax requiring a two-thirds vote; (4) ratification by seven states; (5) and against overruling the veto by a two-thirds vote. He was originally opposed to restricting the introduction of money bills to the lower house, but receded from that stand for the sake of harmony, not deeming it important. Luther Martin declared that in committee of the whole he advocated a strong centralized government, which is very likely.

In the pamphlet on his earlier politics an attempt has been made in the quotations from his letters to give his thoughts on the proper form of government; and a study of these and other utterances in the present article will show points that throw light on his probable attitude toward the various problems in the Convention. Certain points deserve special attention. John Corbin, in a recent study of Washington's constitutional influence, points out that the basic principle of his polity was republican and not democratic: that is, government of the people, for the people, but by the constituted authorities. Washington believed in representative government. When his nephew Bushrod informed him of the formation of a local patriotic society to keep a check on its legislator, a sort of early local substitute for the initiative and referendum, Washington replied, September 30, 1786: "I am no friend to institutions, except in local matters, which are wholly or in a great measure confined to the county of the delegates. To me it appears much wiser and more politic to choose able and honest representatives, and leave them, in all national questions to determine from the evidence of reason, and the facts which shall be adduced, when internal and external information is given to them in a collective state. What certainty is there that societies in a corner or remote part of a State can possess that knowledge which is necessary for them to decide on many important questions which may come before an Assembly? . . . What figure then must a delegate make, who comes there with his hands tied, and his judgment forestalled?"

BASIS OF SOUND GOVERNMENT (1785-1787)

Washington believed in the absolute necessity of the federal government possessing coercive power, although he was uncertain of the form that power should take. This appears in his letter to Madison, March 31, 1786, previously quoted; and in various other places, such as a letter to Jay, August 1, 1786. On May 20 and again on November 5, 1785, Noah Webster was a visitor at Mount Vernon and remained over night in both cases. In this year Webster published his Plan for the Union of the American States which, though it probably made little impression at the time, contains thoughts on the need of coercion and direct application of the federal government—ideas upon which he and Washington undoubtedly exchanged opinions. Knox wrote Washington, January 4, 1787, offering some suggestions on government, including a separation of powers and also: "All national objects, to be designed and executed by the general government, without any reference to the local governments." Washington replied, February 3: "The system on which you seem disposed to build a national government, is certainly . . . in every point of view more desirable than the present, which . . . having the legislative, executive, and judiciary branches concentrated, is exceptionable." This shows not only that he had placed before him ideas from which the Law-of-the-Land principle might have originated, but this last quotation shows also his belief in the separation of powers.

Washington believed in a bicameral Congress. In the letter to his nephew he commented upon the Shays movement in Massachusetts, declaring as some evidences of its evil: "Why, they have declared the senate useless, many other parts of the constitution unnecessary, salaries of public officers burdensome, &c." He believed in a federal court. As early as 1775 he was urging the necessity of establishing without loss of time proper courts for the decision of property rights and the legality of seizures. As a result of this and other promptings, Congress first established a prize committee and later a fixed Court of Appeals in Cases of Capture, which Dr. Jameson considers "may be justly regarded not simply as the predecessor, but as one of the origins of the Supreme Court of the United States."

The Massachusetts Constitution of 1780 was nearer a model of the Federal Constitution than any other of the early constitutional documents. John Adams, who was the chief author of it, wrote a Defence of the Constitutions of the Government of the United States, which was originally published in London, but the first part of which was available in Philadelphia during the Federal Convention. Washington possessed a copy of it but we do not know from his accounts whether or not it came into his hands during the Convention.

WASHINGTON'S INFLUENCE IN THE CONVENTION

We know that he was acquainted with the Virginia Plan in advance. Madison wrote, April 16: "Having been lately led to resolve the subject which is to undergo the discussion of the Convention, and formed some outlines of a new system, I take the liberty of submitting them without apology to your eye." Undoubtedly, too, he attended the preliminary meetings of the Virginia delegation which discussed the plan.

Of his great influence in the Convention we get a few sidelights from other correspondence, especially on the subject of the presidency. Pierce Butler, who was a delegate, wrote, May 5, 1788: "Nor, Entre Nous, do I believe they would have been so great had not many of the members cast their eyes towards General Washington as President; and shaped their Ideas of the Powers to be given to a President by their opinions of his Virtue. So that the Man, who by his Patriotism and Virtue, Contributed largely to the Emancipation of his Country, may be the Innocent means of its being, when He is lay'd low, oppressed." This clearly indicates a belief in a presidential life tenure; and Jefferson wrote, August 12, 1788: "Another defect, the perpetual reeligibility of the same President, will probably not be cured during the life of General Washington. His merit has blinded our countrymen to the danger of making so important an office re-eligible. I presume there will not be a vote against him in the United States." An unknown writer, October 11, 1787, probably addressing Jefferson, supports this view: "I may pronounce that it will be adopted. General Washington lives; and as he will be appointed President, jealousy on this head vanishes."

Monroe wrote Jefferson, July 27, 1787, expressing a common opinion: "The convention is an expedient that will produce a decisive effect. It will either recover us from our present embarrassments or complete our ruin; for I do suspect that if what they recommend shod. be rejected this wod. be the case. But I trust that the presence of Genl. Washington will have great weight in the body itself so as to overawe and keep under the demon of party, & that the signature of his name to whatever act shall be the result of their deliberations will secure its passage thro' the union."

WASHINGTON ON THE COMPROMISES OF THE CONSTITUTION (1787)

Through our present knowledge of the proceedings we can read between the lines of Washington's letters during the Convention. Thus he undoubtedly had the compromises in mind when he wrote Stuart, July 1: "I have had no wish more ardent, through the whole process of this business, than that of knowing what kind of government is best calculated for us to live under. No doubt there will be a diversity of sentiments on this important subject; and, to inform the judgment, it is necessary to hear all arguments that can be advanced. To please all is impossible, and to attempt it would be vain. The only way, therefore, is, under all the views in which it can be placed, and with a due consideration to circumstances, habits, &c., &c., to form such a government as will bear the scrutinizing eye of criticism, and trust it to the good sense and patriotism of the people to carry it into effect."

Hamilton, who was a New York delegate, had at this time withdrawn temporarily, because his colleagues had left in protest. When Washington wrote him, July 10, the Convention was in a critical state, having then under special consideration the proposition of the grand committee in favor of an equal state vote in the Senate, with the House to control the origin of money bills. This, which was being debated, seemed to involve a setback for the big states and for the advocates of a strong central government, men like King, Hamilton, Wilson; Madison, and Washington. The great Law-of-the-Land solution, by which the federal government was to operate directly on the people, had not yet been wrought out. Washington wrote: "When I refer you to the state of the counsels, which prevailed at the period you left this city, and add that they are now if possible in a worse train than ever, you will find but little ground on which the hope of a good establishment can be formed. In a word, I almost despair of seeing a favorable issue to the proceedings of our convention, and do therefore repent having had any agency in the business. The men who oppose a strong and energetic government, are in my opinion narrow-minded politicians, or are under the influence of local views. The apprehension expressed by them, that the people will not accede to the form proposed, is the ostensible, not the real cause of opposition. But, admitting that the present sentiment is as they prognosticate, the proper question ought nevertheless to be, Is it, or is it not, the best form that such a country as this can adopt? If it be the best, recommend it, and it will assuredly obtain, maugre opposition. I am sorry you went away. I wish you were back. The crisis is equally important and alarming, and no opposition, under such circumstances, should discourage exertions till the signature is offered."

CLOSE OF THE CONVENTION (SEPTEMBER, 1787)

These doubts vanished with the successful accomplishment of the task. As Alexander wrote to Jefferson in November: "I never saw him so keen for anything in my life as he is for the adoption of the new scheme of government." Happy he was in being able to agree with Franklin that the device on the back of the president's chair was a rising and not a setting sun. Washington's Diary records the final session: "Monday [Sept.] 17th. Met in Convention, when the Constitution received the unanimous assent of 11 States and Colo. Hamilton's from New York (the only delegate from thence in Convention), and was subscribed to by every Member present except Govr. Randolph and Colo. Mason from Virginia, and Mr. Gerry from Massachusetts.

"The business being thus closed, the Members adjourned to the City Tavern, dined together and took a cordial leave of each other; after which I returned to my lodgings, did some business with, and received the papers from the Secretary of the Convention, and retired to meditate on the momentous w[or]k which had been executed, after not less than five, for a large part of the time Six, and sometimes 7 hours sitting every day, [except] sundays and the ten days adjournment to give a comee. opportunity and time to arrange the business, for more than four months."

WASHINGTON'S INFLUENCE ON THE RATIFICATION CONTEST (1787-1788)

Washington took no public part in the agitation for ratification, but from Mount Vernon there proceeded a stream of private support and advice that filtered through various channels to public information. The mere knowledge that this venerated character had presided over the Convention and signed the drafted Constitution was one of the most powerful reasons in public opinion why it was worthy of acceptance. He was provoked because some "hasty and indigested sentiments" in a letter from him to Charles Carter got into the newspapers in a distorted form, even though Madison thought that on the whole "it may have been of service, notwithstanding the scandalous misinterpretations of it which have been attempted."

Never before, not even during the pre-revolutionary excitement, had there been so extensive and virulent use of newsletters and pamphlets. Washington's opinions, even rumors of them, were too good copy to be passed over even at his desire. Hamilton in some conjectures about the prospects of ratification wrote soon after the Convention adjourned: "The new Constitution has in favour of its success these circumstances—very great weight of influence of the persons who framed it, particularly in the universal popularity of General Washington."

This was a valuable factor, but actual expressions from the mouth or pen of the great hero would be of still greater value; so much so that after ratification had been secured Washington wrote: "I did not incline to appear as a partisan in the interesting subject, that has agitated the public mind since the date of my last letter to you. For it was my sincere wish, that the constitution, which had been submitted to the people, might, after a fair and dispassionate investigation, stand or fall according to its merits or demerits. Besides, I found from disagreeable experience, that almost all the sentiments extracted from me in answer to private letters, or communicated orally, by some means or another found their way into the public gazettes, as well as some other sentiments ascribed to me, which never had an existence in my imagination."

SUPPORT OF WASHINGTON AND FRANKLIN (1787)

Even the objectors considered it necessary to explain away the fact that Washington and Franklin had endorsed the constitutional plan. Thus an "Officer in the Late Continental Army," in a newsletter, November 3, 1787, wrote: "The great names of Washington and Franklin have been taken in vain and shockingly prostituted to effect the most infamous purposes. What! because our august chieftain has subscribed his name in his capacity of president of the convention . . . will any one infer from this that it has met with . . . [his] entire approbation, and that . . . [he considers] it as a masterpiece of human wisdom? I am apt to think the contrary, as I have good reason to ground my opinion on."

"Centinel," who was probably Samuel Bryan, explained at greater length: "I would be very far from insinuating that the two illustrious personages alluded to, have not the welfare of their country at heart; but that the unsuspecting goodness and zeal of the one has been imposed upon, in a subject of which he must be necessarily inexperienced, from his other arduous engagements; and that the weakness and indecision attendant on old age, has been practiced on the other. . . . Is it derogating from the character of the illustrious and highly revered Washington, to suppose him fallible on a subject that must be in a great measure novel to him? As a patriotic hero, he stands unequalled in the annals of time, . . . In despair they are weakly endeavoring to screen their criminality by interposing the shield of the virtues of a Washington, in representing his concurrence in the proposed system of government as evidence of the purity of their intentions; but this impotent attempt to degrade the brightest ornament of his country to a base level with themselves will be considered as an aggravation of their treason, who have too much discernment not to make a just discrimination between the honest mistaken zeal of the patriot and the flagitious machinations of an ambitious junto, and will resent the imposition that Machiavelian arts and consummate cunning have practiced upon our illustrious chief."

WASHINGTON'S ANALYSIS OF THE SITUATION (1788)

Washington did not consider the plan flawless but, as he wrote Mrs. Macaulay-Graham, November 16, 1787: "I think it is much to be wondered at that any thing could be produced with such unanimity as the Constitution proposed."

To Lafayette he wrote with more freedom, February 7, 1788: "It appears to me, then, little short of a miracle, that the delegates from so many different States (which States you know are also different from each other), in their manners, circumstances, and prejudices, should unite in forming a system of national government, so little liable to well-founded objections. . . . With regard to the two great points (the pivots upon which the whole machine must move) my creed is simply,

"1st. That the general government is not invested with more powers, than are indispensably necessary to perform the functions of a good government; and consequently, that no objection ought to be made against the quantity of power delegated to it.

"2ly. That these powers, (as the appointment of all rulers will for ever arise from, and at short, stated intervals recur to, the free suffrage of the people,) are so distributed among the legislative, executive, and judicial branches, into which the general government is arranged, that it can never be in danger of degenerating into a monarchy, an oligarchy, an aristocracy, or any other despotic or oppressive form, so long as there shall remain any virtue in the body of the people.

"I would not be understood, my dear Marquis, to speak of consequences, which may be produced in the revolution of ages, by corruption of morals, profligacy of manners, and listlessness for the preservation of the natural and unalienable rights of mankind, nor of the successful usurpations, that may be established at such an unpropitious juncture upon the ruins of liberty, however providently guarded and secured; as these are contingencies against which no human prudence can effectually provide. It will at least be a recommendation to the proposed constitution, that it is provided with more checks and barriers against the introduction of tyranny, and those of a nature less liable to be surmounted, than any government hitherto instituted among mortals hath possessed. We are not to expect perfection in this world; but mankind, in modern times, have apparently made some progress in the science of government. Should that, which is now offered to the people of America, be found on experiment less perfect than it can be made, a constitutional door is left open for its amelioration."

His idea of the probable opposition and the proper answer to the candid portion of it he gives in a letter to Knox, October, 1787: "The constitution is now before the judgment-seat. It has, as was expected, its adversaries and supporters. Which will preponderate is yet to be decided. The former more than probably will be most active, as the major part of them will, it is to be feared, be governed by sinister and self-important motives, to which every thing in their breasts must yield. The opposition from another class of them may perhaps, (if they should be men of reflection, candor, and information,) subside in the solution of the following simple questions. 1. Is the constitution, which is submitted by the convention, preferable to the government, (if it can be called one,) under which we now live? 2. Is it probable that more confidence would at the time be placed in another convention, provided the experiment should be tried, than was placed in the last one, and is it likely that a better agreement would take place therein? What would be the consequences if these should not happen, or even from the delay, which must inevitably follow such an experiment? Is there not a constitutional door open for alterations or amendments? and is it not likely that real defects will be as readily discovered after as before trial? and will not our successors be as ready to apply the remedy as ourselves, if occasion should require it? To think otherwise will, in my judgment, be ascribing more of the amor patriae, more wisdom and more virtue to ourselves, than I think we deserve."

WASHINGTON'S OPPOSITION TO A SECOND CONVENTION (1788)

Later when the movement for a second convention was actively advanced, especially by Patrick Henry, Washington was quick to point out the weakness of the proposition in a letter to Randolph, January 8, 1788: "The various passions and motives, by which men are influenced, are concomitants of fallibility, engrafted into our nature for the purposes of unerring wisdom; but, had I entertained a latent hope, (at the time you moved to have the constitution submitted to a second convention,) that a more perfect form would be agreed to, in a word, that any constitution would be adopted under the impressions and instructions of the members, the publications, which have taken place since, would have eradicated every form of it. How do the sentiments of the influential characters in this State, who are opposed to the constitution, and have favored the public with their opinions, square with each other? Are they not at variance on some of the most important points? If the opponents in the same State cannot agree in their principles, what prospect is there of a coalescence with the advocates of the measure, when the different views and jarring interests of so wide and extended an empire are to be brought forward or combated? To my judgment it is more clear than ever, that an attempt to amend the constitution, which is submitted, would be productive of more heat and greater confusion than can well be conceived."

Being not at all fearful of the result of a thorough public discussion into the merits of the Plan, he wrote Humphreys, October 10, 1787: "Much will depend however upon literary abilities, and the recommendation of it by good pens should be openly, I mean, publicly afforded in the Gazettes." This was after Congress had submitted the draft to the states, which action received the General's comment in a letter to Madison, who was in Congress: "I am better pleased that the proceedings of the convention are submitted from Congress by a unanimous vote, feeble as it is, than if they had appeared under strong marks of approbation without it. This apparent unanimity will have its effect. Not every one has opportunities to peep behind the curtain; and, as the multitude are often deceived by externals, the appearance of unanimity in that body on this occasion will be of great importance."

WASHINGTON ON THE FEDERALIST (1788)

He followed carefully the course of the public discussion, writing Stuart, who later was elected a delegate to the Virginia Convention, November 30: "I have seen no publication yet, that ought in my judgment to shake the proposed constitution in the mind of an impartial and candid public. In fine, I have hardly seen one, that is not addressed to the passions of the people, and obviously calculated to alarm their fears. Every attempt to amend the constitution at this time is in my opinion idle and vain. . . . That there are some writers, and others perhaps who may not have written, that wish to see this union divided into several confederacies, is pretty evident.

"As an antidote to these opinions, and in order to investigate the ground of objections to the constitution which is submitted, the Federalist, under the signature of PUBLIUS, is written. . . . They are, I think I may venture to say, written by able men; and before they are finished will, or I am mistaken, place matters in a true point of light. Although I am acquainted with the writers, who have a hand in this work, I am not at liberty to mention names, nor would I have it known, that they are sent by me to you for promulgation."

Later, when the battle had been won, he expressed again, this time to Hamilton, the chief author, his opinion on the merits of The Federalist: "As the perusal of the political papers under the signature of PUBLIUS has afforded me great satisfaction, I shall certainly consider them as claiming a most distinguished place in my library. I have read every performance, which has been printed on one side and the other of the great question lately agitated (so far as I have been able to obtain them); and, without an unmeaning compliment, I will say, that I have seen no other so well calculated, in my judgment, to produce conviction on an unbiased mind as the production of your triumvirate. When the transient circumstances and fugitive performances, which attended this crisis, shall have disappeared, that work will merit the notice of posterity, because in it are candidly and ably discussed the principles of freedom and the topics of government, which will be always interesting to mankind, so long as they shall be connected in civil society."

PERSONAL DISCUSSIONS ON RATIFICATION (1788)

Washington seems to have been optimistic during most of the ratification contest. Throughout the whole period of ratification his residence continued to be "a well resorted tavern," and with such men as Madison, the Lees, Robert and Gouverneur Morris, Carrington, Dulany, Humphreys, Harrison of Maryland, Powell of Pennsylvania, Jones of North Carolina, and many other visitors, there must have been lively discussions over the dinner table. These visitors not only carried home but later voiced the general's impressions. Henry Lee wrote, December 7, 1787: "Genl. Washington . . . continues firm as a rock." Washington himself wrote Carter at this time, "My decided opinion of the matter is that there is no alternative between the adoption of it and anarchy"; and to Jay, March 3, 1788, "for myself I have never entertained much doubt of its adoption." This last statement was after the plan had successfully passed its first real test, in the Massachusetts Convention. The only large state which had previously ratified had been Pennsylvania, and there a species of dragoonage had checked the opposition.

Washington did not approve of the Massachusetts "concomitants" — the proposed amendments; but nevertheless he wrote Lincoln, February 28, 1788: "The full and fair discussion, which you gave the subject in your convention, was attended with the happiest consequences. It afforded complete information to all those, who went thither with dispositions to be informed, and at the same time gave an opportunity to confute and point out the fallacy of those specious arguments, which were offered in opposition to the proposed government. Nor is this all. The conciliating behavior of the minority will strike a damp on the hopes, which opponents in other States might otherwise have formed from the smallness of the majority, and must be greatly influential in obtaining a favorable determination in those States, which have not yet decided upon it."

DANGER IN ADJOURNMENTS (1788)

The ratification by Massachusetts was the sixth. The New Hampshire convention convened but adjourned. Though this action was really a measure to prevent rejection, since a majority of the convention were instructed against acceptance, it alarmed Washington. He wrote Knox, March 30: "The conduct of the State of New Hampshire has baffled all calculation, and has come extremely malapropos for a favorable decision on the proposed constitution in this State; for, be the real cause of the late adjournment what it may, the anti-federal party with us do not scruple to pronounce, that it was done to await the issue of this convention before it would decide, and add, that, if this State should reject it, all those who are to follow will do the same, and consequently that it cannot obtain, as there will be only eight States in favor of the measure."

When later the Maryland convention met he warned Thomas Johnson: "I take the liberty of expressing a single sentiment on the occasion. It is, that an adjournment, if attempted, of your convention, to a later period than the decision of the question in this State, will be tantamount to the rejection of the constitution. I have good reasons for this opinion, and am told it is the blow which the leading characters of the opposition in the next State [to meet in convention] have meditated, if it shall be found that a direct attack is not likely to succeed in yours. If this be true it cannot be too much deprecated and guarded against. The postponement in New Hampshire, (although it made no reference to the convention of this State, but proceeded altogether from the local circumstances of its own,) is ascribed by the opposition here to complaisance towards Virginia, and great use is made of it. An event similar to this in Maryland would have the worst tendency imaginable; for indecision there would certainly have considerable influence upon South Carolina, the only other State, which is to precede Virginia, and submits the question almost wholly to the determination of the latter. The pride of the State is already touched upon this string, and will be raised much higher if there is fresh cause."

INFLUENCE OF WASHINGTON ON THE VIRGINIA CONVENTION (1788)

Success or failure would turn probably on the action of Virginia, where the opposition was led by the Lees, Patrick Henry, Mason, Grayson, and Harrison. Washington wrote James Wilson, April 4, "It is impossible to say, with any degree of certainty, what will be the determination of the convention in this State upon the proposed plan of government." When the Virginia Convention met, eight states had acceded; if that state ratified, the Constitution could go into operation. To Washington's Federalistic mind there could be no question of the duty of the Convention. He wrote Madison, who, with Randolph and Marshall, was to be a leading proponent in the Convention: "The decision of Maryland and South Carolina by so large majorities, and the almost certain adoption of the proposed constitution by New Hampshire, will make all, except desperate men, look before they leap into the dark consequences of rejection. The ratification by eight States without a negative, by three of them unanimously, by six against one in another, by three to one in another, by two to one in two more, and by all the weight of abilities and property in the other, is enough, one would think, to produce a cessation of opposition. I do not mean, that this alone is sufficient to produce conviction in the mind, but I think it ought to produce some change in the conduct of any man, who distrusted his infallibility."

The effects of rejection must also be considered, as he had written his nephew in the previous November: "Let the opponents of the proposed constitution in this State be asked, and it is a question they certainly ought to have asked themselves, what line of conduct they would advise to adopt, if nine other States, of which I think there is little doubt, should accede to the constitution. Would they recommend, that it should stand single? Will they connect it with Rhode Island? Or even with two others checkerwise, and remain with them, as outcasts from the society, to shift for themselves? Or will they return to their dependence on Great Britain? Or, lastly, have the mortification to come in when they will be allowed no credit for doing so?"

CRITICAL ACTION OF VIRGINIA (1788)

Maryland had been the seventh state to ratify. The procession at Baltimore in celebration included a miniature ship fifteen feet long, fully rigged. Later, June 9, this was navigated down the Chesapeake and up the Potomac to Mount Vernon by Capt. Joshua Barney and presented to Washington. On July 24 it sank in a gale; but the event could no longer be taken as an omen, for by that time South Carolina, New Hampshire, and Virginia had ratified. Even if, as then seemed likely, rejection by New York should separate New England from the rest of the states, that difficulty probably would not prevent the new government going into operation.

The Virginia Convention met on June 2, 1788. Washington followed with great interest the reports of the proceedings by which Madison and others kept him informed. By a small majority ratification was accomplished. Alexandria celebrated with a dinner, June 28. Washington wrote C. C. Pinckney the same day: "Thus the citizens of Alexandria, when convened, constituted the first public company in America, which had the pleasure of pouring libation to the prosperity of the ten States, that had actually adopted the general government. The day itself is memorable for more reasons than one. It was recollected, that this day is the anniversary of the battles of Sullivan's Island and Monmouth. I have just returned from assisting at the entertainment, and mention these details, unimportant as they are in themselves, the rather because I think we may rationally indulge the pleasing hope, that the Union will now be established upon a durable basis, and that Providence seems still disposed to favor the members of it with unequalled opportunities for political happiness."

PROSPECTS IN THE LAST THREE STATES (1788)

As to prospects in North Carolina, New York, and Rhode Island, he continued in the letter to Pinckney: "From the local situation, as well as the other circumstances of North Carolina, I should be truly astonished if that State should withdraw itself from the Union. On the contrary, I flatter myself with a confident expectation, that more salutary counsels will certainly prevail. At present there is more doubt how the question will be immediately disposed of in New York; for it seems to be understood, that there is a majority in the convention opposed to the adoption of the new federal system. Yet it is hardly to be supposed, (or rather in my judgment it is irrational to suppose,) they will reject a government, which, from an unorganized embryo ready to be stifled with a breath, has now in the maturity of its birth assumed a confirmed bodily existence. Or, to drop the metaphor, the point in debate has at least shifted its ground from policy to expediency. The decision of ten States cannot be without its operation. Perhaps the wisest way in this crisis will be not to attempt to accept or reject, but to adjourn until the people in some parts of the State can consider the magnitude of the question, and of the consequences involved in it, more coolly and deliberately. After New York shall have acted, then only one little State will remain. Suffice it to say, it is universally believed, that the scales are ready to drop from the eyes, and the infatuation to be removed from the heart, of Rhode Island. May this be the case before that inconsiderate people shall have filled up the measure of iniquity, before it shall be too late."

WASHINGTON SUGGESTED FOR PRESIDENT (1788)

After New York ratified he expressed his thankfulness and praise with characteristic gallantry to Mrs. Stockton, August 31: "I can never trace the concatenation of causes, which led to these events, without acknowledging the mystery and admiring the goodness of Providence. To that Superintending Power alone is our retraction from the brink of ruin to be attributed. A spirit of accomodation was happily infused into the leading characters of the Continent and the minds of men were gradually prepared, by disappointment, for the reception of a good government. Nor would I rob the fairer sex of their share in the glory of a revolution so honorably to human nature, for, indeed, I think you ladies are in the number of the best Patriots America can boast."

Even before any of the States had ratified, Washington was being informed of the necessity, the inevitableness, of his being President. Among the characteristic predictions was that of Hamilton: "If the government be adopted, it is probable General Washington will be President of the United States—This will insure a wise choice of men to administer the government and a good administration." Humphreys wrote his former chief, September 28, 1787: "Your good Angel, I am persuaded will not desert you. What will tend, perhaps, more than any thing to the adoption of the new System, will be an universal opinion of your being elected President of the United States, and an expectation that you will accept it for a while." Gouverneur Morris a month later added his plea: "I have observed that your Name to the new Constitution has been of infinite Service. Indeed I am convinced that if you had not attended the Convention, and the same Paper had been handed out to the World, it would have met with a colder Reception. . . . As it is, should the Idea prevail that you would not accept of the Presidency it would prove fatal in many Parts. . . . Your cool steady Temper is indispensibly necessary to give a firm and manly Tone to the new Government. . . . The Horses once trained may be managed by a Woman or a Child; not so when they first feel the Bit. . . . You therefore must I say must mount the Seat."

At that time Washington seems to have ignored the matter, at least so far as his published correspondence shows; though Alexander Donald's letter to Jefferson in November shows that the subject was also one of discussion by visitors: "As the eyes of all America are turned towards this truly Great and Good man, for the First President, I took the liberty of sounding him upon it, He appears to be greatly against going into Publick Life again, . . . but . . . I am fully of opinion he may be induced to appear once more on the Publick Stage of Life—I form my opinion from what passed between us in a very long & serious conversation, as well as from what I could gather from Mrs. Washington on the same subject."

After Virginia had ratified, Monroe wrote Jefferson, July 12: "The conduct of Genl. Washington upon this occasion has no doubt been right and meritorious. . . . To forsake the honorable retreat to which he had retired & risque the reputation he had so deservedly acquir'd, manifested a zeal for the publick interest, that could after so many and illustrious services, & at this stage of his life, scarcely have been expected from him."

... Be assured his influence carried this Government." And, as he had so successfully emerged from his retreat at the call of public duty, so this same call would not permit him to retire again.

PRESSURE TO ACCEPT THE PRESIDENCY (1788)

After ratification was accomplished, the burden of letters from all over the Union was that Washington must be President. Such men as Knox, Lincoln, Trumbull, Morris, Hamilton, Thomas Johnson, Henry Lee, Madison, and Lafayette united in their plea. Hamilton's urgency and Henry Lee's are characteristic. It will be noticed that in them not only duty but the effect of refusal upon the general's own reputation are stressed. The former wrote: "I should be deeply pained, my dear Sir, if your scruples in regard to a certain station should be matured into a resolution to decline it; though I am neither surprised at their existence, nor can I but agree in opinion that the caution you observe in deferring the ultimate determination is prudent. I have, however, reflected maturely on the subject, and have come to a conclusion (in which I feel no hesitation), that every public and personal consideration will demand from you an acquiescence in what will certainly be the unanimous wish of your country.

"First; in a matter so essential to the well being of society as the prosperity of a newly instituted government, a citizen of so much consequence as yourself to its success has no option but to lend his services if called for. Permit me to say, it would be inglorious, in such a situation, not to hazard the glory, however great, which he might have previously acquired.

"Secondly; your signature to the proposed system pledges your judgment for its being such an one as upon the whole was worthy of the public approbation. If it should miscarry, (as men commonly decide from success or the want of it) the blame will in all probability be laid on the system itself. And the framers of it will have to encounter the disrepute of having brought about a revolution in government, without substituting any thing that was worthy of the effort; they pulled down one Utopia, it will be said, to build up another. This view of the subject, if I mistake not, my dear Sir, will suggest to your mind greater hazard to that fame, which must be and ought to be dear to you, in refusing your future aid to the system, than in affording it. I will only add, that in my estimate of the matter, that aid is indispensable."

Henry Lee declared, September 13: "Solicitous for our common happiness as a people, and convicted as I continue to be, that our peace and prosperity depends on the proper improvement of the present period, my anxiety is extreme, that the new govt. may have an auspicious beginning—To effect this & perpetuate a nation formed under your auspices, it is certain that again you will be called forth—"

WASHINGTON ON THE PRESIDENCY (1788)

Washington's reluctance was not assumed. To Hamilton he wrote, August 28: "On the delicate subject with which you conclude your letter, I can say nothing, because the event alluded to may never happen, and because, in case it should occur, it would be a point of prudence to defer forming one's ultimate and irrevocable decision, so long as new data might be afforded for one to act with the greater wisdom and propriety. I would not wish to conceal my prevailing sentiment from you; for you know me well enough, my good Sir, to be persuaded, that I am not guilty of affectation when I tell you, that it is my great and sole desire to live and die in peace and retirement on my own farm."

As the pressure increased, he enlarged on his reasons to Henry Lee, September 22: "The principal topic of your letter is to me a point of great delicacy indeed, insomuch that I can scarcely without some impropriety touch upon it. In the first place, the event to which you allude may never happen; among other reasons, because, if the partiality of my fellow citizens conceive it to be a means by which the sinews of the new government would be strengthened, it will of consequence be obnoxious to those, who are in opposition to it, many of whom unquestionably will be placed among the electors.

"This consideration alone would supersede the expediency of announcing any definite and irrevocable resolution. You are among the small number of those, who know my invincible attachment to domestic life, and that my sincerest wish is to continue in the enjoyment of it solely until my final hour. But the world would be neither so well instructed, nor so candidly disposed, as to believe me uninfluenced by sinister motives, in case any circumstance should render a deviation from the line of conduct I had prescribed to myself indispensable.

"Should the contingency you suggest take place, and (for argument's sake alone let me say it) should my unfeigned reluctance to accept the office be overcome by a deference for the reasons and opinions of my friends, might I not, after the declarations I have made (and Heaven knows they were made in the sincerity of my heart), in the judgment of the impartial world and of posterity, be chargeable with levity and inconsistency, if not with rashness and ambition? Nay farther, would there not even be some apparent foundation for the two former charges? Now justice to myself and tranquility of conscience require, that I should act a part, if not above imputation, at least capable of vindication. Nor will you conceive me to be too solicitous for reputation. Though I prize as I ought the good opinion of my fellow citizens, yet, if I know myself, I would not seek or retain popularity at the expense of one social duty or moral virtue.

"While doing what my conscience informed me was right, as it respected my God, my country, and myself, I could despise all the party clamor and unjust censure, which must be expected from some, whose personal enmity might be occasioned by their hostility to the government. I am conscious, that I fear alone to give any real occasion for obloquy, and that I do not dread to meet with unmerited reproach. And certain I am, whensoever I shall be convinced the good of my country requires my reputation to be put in risk, regard for my own fame will not come in competition with an object of so much magnitude. If I declined the task, it would lie upon quite another principle. Notwithstanding my advanced season of life, my increasing fondness for agricultural amusements, and my growing love of retirement, augment and confirm my decided predilection for the character of a private citizen, yet it would be no one of these motives, nor the hazard to which my former reputation might be exposed, nor the terror of encountering new fatigues and troubles, that would deter me from an acceptance; but a belief, that some other person, who had less pretence and less inclination to be excused, could execute all the duties full as satisfactorily as myself."

To Hamilton he acknowledged, October 3, that: "I will not suppress the acknowledgment, my dear Sir, that I have always felt a kind of gloom upon my mind, as often as I have been taught to expect I might, and perhaps must, ere long, be called to make a decision. You will, I am well assured, believe the assertion, (though I have little expectation it would gain credit from those who are less acquainted with me,) that, if I should receive the appointment, and if I should be prevailed upon to accept it, the acceptance would be attended with more diffidence and reluctance than I ever experienced before in my life. It would be, however, with a fixed and sole determination of lending whatever assistance might be in my power to promote the public weal, in hopes that at a convenient and early period my services might be dispensed with, and that I might be permitted once more to retire, to pass an unclouded evening after the stormy day of life, in the bosom of domestic tranquillity."

WASHINGTON ACCEPTS THE PRESIDENCY (1789)

Duty won. Although not legally informed of his unanimous election until April 14, 1789, when Charles Thomson, who had been Secretary of the Continental Congress throughout almost the whole of its life, reached Mount Vernon with the notification, it was a foregone conclusion long before. His preparation for the new dignity included borrowing some money: "Under this statement, I am inclined to do what I never expected to be driven to, that is, to borrow money on Interest. Five hundred pounds would enable me to discharge what I owe in Alexandria, &c., and to leave the State (if it shall not be in my power to remain at home in retirement) without doing this, would be exceedingly disagreeable to me." Also he had a foretaste of the bitter cup of politics, in finding it necessary to refuse applicants for offices while still awaiting his election. To one of these requests from Benjamin Harrison, destined to be the ancestor of two Presidents, and who had opposed ratification, he replied: "I will go to the chair under no pre-engagement of any kind or nature whatsoever. But, when in it, I will, to the best of my judgment, discharge the duties of the office with that impartiality and zeal for the public good, which ought never to suffer connections of blood or friendship to intermingle so as to have the least sway on decisions of a public nature. I may err, notwithstanding my most strenuous efforts to execute the difficult trust with fidelity and unexceptionably; but my errors shall be of the head, not of the heart. For all recommendations and appointments, so far as they may depend upon or come from me, a due regard shall be had to the fitness of characters, the pretensions of different candidates, and, so far as is proper, to political consideration. These shall be invariably my governing motives."

INAUGURATION OF WASHINGTON (1789)

April 16, 1789, with feelings, as he wrote Knox, April 1, "not unlike those of a culprit, who is going to the place of his execution," he left Mount Vernon for New York, the temporary capital. The journey was one long triumphal procession; but according to an entry in a diary which Irving used but which is now lost, he remarked, after describing the crossing to New York and the reception there: "The display . . . filled my mind with sensations as painful (considering the reverse of this scene, which may be the case after all my labor to do good) as they are pleasing." On April 30, on the balcony of the New York City Hall, where now a statue stands before the sub-treasury, at the acme of his popularity though not of his fame, he took the oath: "I will faithfully execute the Office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my Ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States." And the multitude shouted, "Long live George Washington, President of the United States."

Washington's Domestic Policy (1789-1797)

GEORGE WASHINGTON
From the Edward Savage Portrait

TRADITIONS OF GOVERNMENT

THE colonial tradition of the relation of the executive to the legislative branch was that of opposition and friction; but the royal governors were always between two fires: the British government (which appointed governors for all the colonies except Rhode Island, Connecticut, and the three proprietary colonies), and the colonial legislatures, which were frequently at odds. The whole trend of colonial effort for fifty years before the Revolution was to hedge the governor in as much as possible and to weaken his prestige. From the early charters to the outbreak of the Revolution there was a running fight between the colonial assemblies and the colonial governors.

Hence Washington had little to learn about executive government from the pre-revolutionary experience of the Americans. On the other hand, in all the colonies there was a system of legislative committees exercising or seizing upon executive power.

Upon those committees the organization of the first revolutionary governments was based. The Continental Congress started with a system of standing committees. Later there was a postmaster general and also boards, such as those of war and treasury, with outside officials. Finally, just before the Articles of Confederation became active, departments with single executive heads were provided for the management of foreign, finance, war, and marine affairs, but no secretary for marine was even appointed. This system was not changed by the Articles of Confederation, which merely gave to Congress a general power to "appoint such . . . committees and civil officers as may be necessary for managing the general affairs of the United States under their direction."

The basis of that government in 1789 was modest. The total population was only four millions, of whom 700,000 were negro slaves. The arguments and influence of the leading statesmen, of whom Washington was the chief, brought about the adoption of the Federal Constitution. Up to the going into effect of that Constitution in 1789 there had been no national system of taxation or of commerce or regulation of interstate affairs.

The energies of the new nation were divided between two fields, military and financial. Most of the promising and active young men had gone into the military service and had left their plantations and their businesses behind them. When peace made efforts for private economic recuperation possible, public conditions under the feeble Confederation hampered recovery greatly. The colonies had enjoyed the protection and privileges of the British Acts of Trade, as well as been subjected to the annoyances; but the war had dislocated this normal trend of commerce, and as independent states the colonies were now, under the prevailing mercantile system, cut off from what had previously been their main market. Such great questions as the settlement of the national debt, the provision of a national revenue, the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, had to be faced and settled after the Constitution went into effect.

FIRST ELECTION OF PRESIDENT (1788-1789)

In this critical period the whole country turned to George Washington as the most sagacious, most experienced, and ablest man. His views on public questions and the methods of government which he favored, quickly became a part of the history of the United States. During the eight years of his presidency no serious national question arose in which Washington's convictions and decisions were not essential. He was the center of all the great legislation during his presidency; and he had the opportunity to lay down the principles of such vital questions as public revenue, public debt, the civil and criminal law of the federation, the admission of new states, the treatment of the Indians, the system of taxation, the protection of life and property. Though he vetoed but two bills as President, his influence was felt on every important act of Congress. The first of the vetoes, in 1792, was of a bill for the apportionment of representatives, because not in harmony with the constitutional requirement. The second one, at the end of his administration, related to the provision for cavalry in the military establishment. Neither bill was passed over the veto.

As has been shown in the preceding pamphlet, Washington had at first strongly deprecated the idea that he should become the first President; but, as ever, he recognized the call of duty, and when forced to the realization that it was necessary that he should once more emerge from private life, he bent all his energies to his new task. His election was unanimous, and his journey from Mount Vernon to New York was a triumphal tour.

The first inauguration of Washington, April 30, 1789, took place on the portico of the New York City Hall of that period. An Official eyewitness of this scene was Senator Maclay, of Pennsylvania, who felt it to be his duty to criticise anything that seemed to him undemocratic.

"The President advanced between the Senate and Representatives, bowing to each. He was placed in the chair by the Vice-President; the Senate with their president on the right, the Speaker and the Representatives on his left. The Vice-President rose and addressed a short sentence to him. The import of it was that he should now take the oath of office as President. He seemed to have forgot half what he was to say, for he made a dead pause and stood for some time, to appearance, in a vacant mood. He finished with a formal bow, and the President was conducted out of the middle window into the gallery, and the oath was administered by the Chancellor. . . .

"As the company returned into the Senate chamber, the President took the chair and the Senators and Representatives their seats. He rose, and all arose also, and addressed them. This great man was agitated and embarrassed more than ever he was by the leveled cannon or pointed musket. He trembled, and several times could scarce make out to read, though it must be supposed he had often read it before. . . . When he came to the words all the world, he made a flourish with his right hand, which left rather an ungainly impression. . . . He was dressed in deep brown, with metal buttons, with an eagle on them, white stockings, a bag, and sword."

PRESIDENT WASHINGTON'S SOCIAL LIFE

Washington was a grand gentleman. He had a large property; and though at times short for ready money, as was often the case with landed proprietors, he had a salary which was certainly the largest amount then paid to any man in America for personal services. First in New York and then in Philadelphia he lived in a handsome house (at his own expense) and held formal receptions open to members of Congress and senators, to executive officials, to foreign representatives and to substantial citizens and accredited visitors from overseas. To be a guest at the state dinners was an event to remember and record, as did Senator Maclay as follows:

"Senate adjourned early. At a little after four I called on Mr. Bassett, of the Delaware State. We went to the President's to dinner. . . . The President and Mrs. Washington sat opposite each other in the middle of the table; the two secretaries, one at each end. It was a great dinner, and the best of the kind I ever was at. The room, however, was disagreeably warm. . . .

"It was the most solemn dinner ever I sat at. Not a health drank; scarce a word said until the cloth was taken away. Then the President, filling a glass of wine, with great formality drank to the health of every individual by name round the table. Everybody imitated him, charged glasses, and such a buzz of 'health, sir,' and 'health, madam,' and 'thank you, sir,' and 'thank you, madam,' never had I heard before. Indeed, I had liked to have been thrown out in the hurry; but I got a little wine in my glass, and passed the ceremony. The ladies sat a good while, and the bottles passed about; but there was a dead silence almost. Mrs. Washington at last withdrew with the ladies.

"I expected the men would now begin, but the same stillness remained. The President told of a New England clergyman who had lost a hat and wig in passing a river called the Brunks. He smiled, and everybody else laughed. He now and then said a sentence or two on some common subject, and what he said was not amiss. . . . The President kept a fork in his hand, when the cloth was taken away, I thought for the purpose of picking nuts. He ate no nuts, however, but played with the fork, striking on the edge of the table with it.

We did not sit long after the ladies retired. The President rose, went up-stairs to drink coffee; the company followed. I took my hat and came home."

PROBLEMS OF ORGANIZATION (1789-1793)

Looking back a hundred and forty years the process of putting the machinery of the federal government into action looks simple and easy. We have no verbatim debates of Congress; but the accounts below the surface of the proceedings in both houses of Congress show exceedingly lively discussions. Regular political parties did not develop till after 1793. The necessary machinery of government was easily set in motion. Some of the states had two-house legislatures; and the general principles of parliamentary law and procedure were developed in colonial times. No colony or state, however, ever had formed a legislature of two about equally powerful houses. Deadlocks would have occurred in the new Federal Congress, but for the balance wheel—the President.

One of the most efficient men in Congress, and at first a cordial supporter and friend of the President, was James Madison of Virginia. Congress contained many men of experience. In a few months acts for the executive departments were passed and Washington began not only to require the written opinions of the principal officers, as permitted by the Constitution, but to hold meetings with them in cabinet, which was the origin of this extra-constitutional body. The executive post of most importance was the headship of the department of foreign affairs, which Washington filled with a great Virginian, Thomas Jefferson. Another Virginian, Edmund Randolph, was appointed Attorney General. The important office of Secretary of the Treasury was filled by Alexander Hamilton, a young man, allied by marriage to the wealthy Schuyler family in New York, and a believer in a strong financial system. The War Department was under Henry Knox of Massachusetts, and the Post Office continued under Samuel Osgood of the same state.

Washington's fortunes had suffered much from his eight years' absence as head of the national army. He accepted the salary of $25,000 a year voted by Congress, but appears to have expended more than the amount in maintaining the expenditures incident to the office. Appointments to office included men from every section of the Union, with special pains to search out and bring into the public service men whose qualities he had learned while they were fellow members of the Continental Army. He was responsible for filling up the new Supreme Court, the first important tribunal ruling on the constitutionality of acts of the legislative body in the history of human government.

DEVELOPMENT OF PARTIES (1793-1797)

No political parties in the modern sense existed in the states during the Revolutionary War. Hence there was no opportunity in the Continental Congress or the Congress of the Confederation to build up an opposition to the body of adherents to the Revolution who were carrying on the war. Washington in his first administration was the only President of the United States who did not have behind him a political party extending through most of the Union.

That inevitable division began to show itself in national affairs about 1793, when there was a deep split between those who wished the United States to take a strong part in favor of France and against Great Britain in the European war that then broke out, and a conservative party which included those who were not willing to go to war on behalf of Great Britain or to break with the French, who a few years earlier had made possible the success of the Revolution. Coincident with this surface manifestation, and antedating it among the leaders, was the division over whether the Constitution should be interpreted along broad or restricted lines.

Two champions appeared as the leading spirits in this party division. Thomas Jefferson of Virginia, Secretary of State in Washington's first Cabinet, was the most talented member in what speedily became the Republican Party, that is, republican in the sense of opposition to aristocracy and royalty. It was nearly forty years later that that party took up the name of Democrat. This was also the party of strict construction. The opposite great party chieftain was Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, recognized as representing what we should now call the financial and commercial interests of the country; and which advocated liberal construction through the doctrine of implied powers. Washington believed in both men. Nevertheless Washington's mind naturally took the same side as Hamilton's on the great questions of giving the nation power over a sufficient revenue to carry on national affairs, and sufficient military and naval power at least to protect itself from invasion. The name adopted by this group was the Federalist Party, the main principles of which were years later taken over by the Whig Party and subsequently by the Republican Party, founded in 1854. Washington strove hard to maintain a neutral attitude between the two early parties; but in the difficulties brought about by the European wars Washington definitely sided with the Federalists. The financial phase of Washington's administration is considered in a later pamphlet of this series.

STABILITY OF THE GOVERNMENT (1793-1797)

Nothing in Washington's whole life is a stronger evidence of his character and his abilities as a statesman than the serene judgment of men and affairs which he showed in the first political crisis. His reelection as President was an evidence of the confidence of the people; and he needed such confidence inasmuch as the crisis in foreign relations caused by the European war of 1793 tested his popularity and his statesmanship. The French revolutionary government and its diplomatic representative, Citizen Genêt, expected, if not an alliance, at least a strong preference for the French, particularly with regard to French commerce and French captures of British ships by cruisers and privateers. Genêt was not simply a very high tempered diplomat; he was an apostle of a democratic type of government far more extreme and aggressive than any democracy ever known in the United States. He began at once to found and to consult with the so-called democratic clubs formed in various parts of the Union on the model of the French Jacobins. President Washington found a hostile feeling in Philadelphia, although a remark of John Adams to the effect that there was some danger 'of personal violence to the President is not borne out by the real conditions. Certainly nothing in Washington's own writings indicates that he was afraid of the American people in the streets of an American city. Washington held steadily on his course and his friends and supporters chose John Adams, Vice-President and sharer in Washington's political fortunes, as President from 1797.

Nevertheless the political ordeal was severe and but for the courage and steadfastness of President Washington the federal government could not have been successfully organized. It could not have lived through the excitement of the French Revolution. It could not have weathered the storm and maintained neutrality in the midst of the European War. Or rather it was the confidence of the majority of the voters in the United States that President Washington was an upright, truthful, able, and courageous man that enabled the Republic to weather the storm.

A LIVELY CABINET MEETING (1793)

Jefferson has left an account of a Cabinet episode that brought out the passionate division of opinion within the Cabinet and outside, and indicated his own growing opposition to Washington.

"The President manifestly inclined to the appeal to the people. Knox, in a foolish, incoherent sort of a speech, introduced the pasquinade lately printed, called the funeral of George W-n, and James Wilson, King and Judge, &c., where the President was placed on a guillotine. The President was much inflamed; got into one of those passions when he cannot command himself; ran on much on the personal abuse which had been bestowed on him; defied any man on earth to produce one single act of his since he had been in the government, which was not done on the purest motives; that he had never repented but once the having slipped the moment of resigning his office, and that was every moment since; that by God he had rather be in his grave than in his present situation; that he had rather be on his farm than to be made Emperor of the world; and yet that they were charging him with wanting to be a King. That that rascal Freneau sent him three of his papers every day, as if he thought he would become the distributor of his papers; that he could see in this, nothing but an impudent design to insult him. He ended in this high tone. There was a pause. Some difficulty in resuming our question; it was, however, after a little while, presented again, and he said there seemed to be no necessity for deciding it now; the propositions before agreed on might be put into a train of execution, and perhaps events would show whether the appeal would be necessary or not. He desired we would meet at my office the next day, to consider what should be done with the vessels armed in our ports by Mr. Genet, and their prizes."

THE INDIAN QUESTION (1793-1797)

No statesman of his time had so deep an interest in the problem of the native Indian tribes as Washington. He had been a great figure in the relations of the settlers with the Indians for forty years. He had a name given by the Indians, "Conoctocarius"—destroyer of villages. He was in the thick of the frontier wars from 1754 to 1758. He had some Indians under his command in the Revolution. Washington had large personal holdings of frontier lands which depended for their value on clearing them of Indian claims. Above all, Washington's unflagging interest in the West as the future home of immigrants from the existing eastern states was bound up with the Indian country.

The practice of colonial times, affecting the federal government, was to treat each tribe of Indians as an independent political power capable of making treaties and land cessions that could not be revoked. The new federal government, through the regulation of "common treaties" with the Indian tribes, acclaimed itself the only government that could negotiate boundary treaties with Indians. On the other hand, the federal government had a permanent armed force—though for a long time only a few hundred soldiers—which was the only military protection of the settlers, except their own trained militia.

THE WHISKEY REBELLION (1794)

The western settlements in the states were troublesome and difficult to manage. Pennsylvania beyond the mountains had a crude, Indian fighting, frontier community, acknowledging the supremacy of the state of Pennsylvania—but not much interested in the government of the United States of America. Among the formal measures urged in Congress by Washington and Hamilton was a moderate tax on the manufacture of whiskey; and distilling was a western industry.

In protest an armed body in 1794 around Pittsburgh interrupted the collection of the tax. Washington looked upon this outburst as a direct defiance of the government of the United States. Therefore he called upon the militia of neighboring states to suppress the insurrection, and at the rendezvous at Bedford, Pennsylvania, he gave orders to the 15,000 troops which marched into the disturbed region.

This spirited action broke up the insurrection—there was no fighting, though some men were prosecuted in the civil courts. Washington's own comment on the affair, in a speech to Congress, November 19, 1794, runs as follows: "It has demonstrated, that our prosperity rests on solid foundations; by furnishing an additional proof, that my fellow-citizens understand the true principles of government and liberty; that they feel their inseparable union; that, notwithstanding all the devices, which have been used to sway them from their interest and duty, they are now as ready to maintain the authority of the laws against licentious invasions, as they were to defend their rights. Let them persevere in their affectionate vigilance over that precious depository of American happiness, the Constitution of the United States. Let them cherish it, too, for the sake of those, who, from every clime, are daily seeking a dwelling in our land."

HARMONY OF THE SECTIONS (1796)

Many times during his service as President, and particularly in the Farewell Address of 1796, Washington dwelt upon the reciprocal interest of the sections. For example: "The North in an unrestrained intercourse with the South, protected by the equal Laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise—and precious materials of manufacturing industry. The South in the same intercourse, benefiting by the agency of the North, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the North, it finds its particular navigation invigorated;—and, while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength to which itself is unequally adapted.—The East, in a like intercourse with the West, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications, by land and water, will more and more find, a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home.—The West derives from the East supplies requisite to its growth and comfort,—and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest, as one Nation."

OPENING OF THE WEST (1791-1799)

So long and so bitter was the struggle between the radical and the conservative elements in Congress, in the Cabinet, and in the country at large that it seemed for a time as though the government would break down. Questions arose as to the admission of new states. Besides the thirteen political units previously represented in the Continental Congress and the Congress of the Confederation, several other areas asked admission. Rhode Island completed "the old thirteen" by ratifying the new Constitution in 1790, after which Washington took pains to make a visit to the new member of the Federal Union. The people of the so-called New Hampshire Grants, next west of the state of New Hampshire, were admitted as the state of Vermont in 1791. Virginia consented that the part of Virginia west of the mountains should be allowed separate organization; and in 1792 the commonwealth of Kentucky was admitted. The West again made a loud call and Tennessee, which until its cession to the federal government in 1790 had been a part of North Carolina, came into the Union in 1796. Thus the number of states was raised to sixteen, each with its two senators and at least one representative in Congress. Among the early western senators was Andrew Jackson of Tennessee, then a backwoodsman who came to be the sixth man to follow Washington into the presidency.

Before 1789 various states had ceded their claims to the region north of the Ohio River, and this had been formed in 1787 into the Northwest Territory. At the time of Washington's death in 1799, the eastern portion of the territory was almost ready to enter the Union as the state of Ohio, thus creating a block of three states which extended from the British possessions of the north to near the Spanish colonies on the south.

These admissions carried out a principle which Washington had long had in his mind, namely, that the West must be a part of the Union on equal terms with the New England, middle, and southern states. Washington, though born and brought up in the oldest English community on the continent of North America, was always a western man, looking toward the Great Lakes and the Mississippi and their control as elements of a great western empire. The rapid development of the Union exactly fitted in with the hopes and expectations of his whole life. It was part of Washington's character that, though naturally interested in trade and commerce across the Atlantic, he believed more than any other statesman of his time in the policy of pushing the frontier, as it had been pushed ever since the earliest colonization. No man of his time had so great an influence as Washington in the expansion of population and of political and social ideas into the West.

Part II

Washington's Foreign Policy (1789-1797)

BASIS OF A NATIONAL POLICY

As in domestic matters, so in the external relations of the United States, the foundations of a national diplomatic policy were laid in the colonial and revolutionary eras. For a century and a half the English colonies were occupied in settling wild North America. They even made some local treaties with neighboring French and Dutch colonies, set on foot military and naval expeditions of their own, and sent envoys to the capitals of non-English colonies. Nevertheless all permanent decisions as to lands, harbors, fisheries, boundaries, and wars by land and sea were made in England by Englishmen.

The one field of local diplomacy was with the Indian tribes, who were fierce enemies, but understood treaties and alliances.

George Washington in 1753 was an early colonial representative sent by the English in America to the Western Indians, as an incidental duty of his mission to the French commandant on the Ohio River, and he gained a knowledge of their character and their customs which was of great use to him during his presidency.

The Revolution gave the first practical experiences to American diplomats—Jay, Deane, Jefferson, John Adams, and others; but Franklin had been abroad for many years, and the others probably already knew as much so-called international law as most European statesmen. They gained an acquaintance with foreign courts and with the methods of diplomatic intercourse which made possible the treaties of that period. The United States found its strongest friend in France; and through the French officers Washington was brought into close contact with the French point of view.

The two British questions of the debts and the boundary between the United States and Canada were adjusted for the time being while Washington was President. The relations with France resulted from the Revolution of 1789 which in a few years made France a conquering and aggressive power under Napoleon. Spain was an unwelcome neighbor in Louisiana and Florida during Washington's administration; and he was much disturbed by the practice of the North African pirates of capturing and enslaving American sailors. Most of these difficulties were postponed for adjustment by his successors.

PRIMARY OBJECTS OF DIPLOMACY

In the thick of the difficulties caused by the diplomatic representatives of France, in 1793, using the ports of the United States as a basis for naval operations against England, Washington wrote: "I believe it is the sincere wish of United America to have nothing to do with the political intrigues, or the squabbles, of European nations; but, on the contrary, to exchange commodities and live in peace and amity with all the inhabitants of the earth. And this I am persuaded they will do, if rightly it can be done. To administer justice to, and receive it from, every power with whom they are connected will, I hope, be always found the most prominent feature in the administration of this country; and I flatter myself that nothing short of imperious necessity can occasion a breach with any of them. Under such a system, if we are allowed to pursue it, the agriculture and mechanical arts, the wealth and population of these States will increase with that degree of rapidity as to baffle all calculation, and must surpass any idea your Lordship can hitherto have entertained on the occasion."

Again he wrote: "What is to be done in the case of the Little Sarah now at Chester? Is the minister of the French Republic to set the acts of this government at defiance with impunity? And then threaten the executive with an appeal to the people? What must the world think of such conduct, and of the government of the United States in submitting to it?"

AVOIDING OFFENSE TO OTHER NATIONS (1794)

The coming to the United States of visitors from Europe gave rise to protests from the legations of their home countries which led Washington to express himself on this type of immigration in 1794, as follows: "My wish is, and it is not less my duty as an officer of the republic, to avoid offence to powers with which we are in friendship, by conduct towards their proscribed citizens, which would be disagreeable to them; whilst at the same time these emigrants, if people of a good character, ought to understand, that they will be protected in their persons and property, and will be entitled to all the benefits of our laws. For the rest, they must depend upon their own behavior and the civilities of the citizens at large, who are less restrained by political considerations, than the officers of the government must be."

In 1797, he warned against expecting "disinterested favors of friendship from any nation whatever." Again: "My policy has been and will continue to be . . . friendly terms with but independent of all the nations of the earth; to share in the broils of none; to fulfill our own engagements; to supply the wants and be carrier for them all."

FOREIGN POLICY IN THE FAREWELL ADDRESS (1796)

These principles are carefully stated in the familiar Farewell Address of September 17, 1796: "Observe good faith and justice toward all Nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all.—Religion and Morality enjoin this conduct; and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it?—It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a People always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence.—Who can doubt that in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages, which might be lost by a steady adherence to it? . . .

"Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation.—Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns.—Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships, or enmities.

"Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course.—If we remain one People, under an efficient government, the period is not far off, when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected. When belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interest guided by our justice shall counsel."

"So, likewise, a passionate attachment of one Nation for another produces a variety of evils.—Sympathy for the favourite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducement or justification: it leads also to concessions to the favourite Nation of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the Nation making the concessions; by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate, in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld."

PLACE IN THE FAMILY OF NATIONS (1789-1790)

Much more serious even than the selection of the group of American diplomats, most of whom had seen previous service at foreign courts, was the question of the reception of foreign representatives. The government of the United States was organized just as the government of France was plunged into a crisis by the French Revolution. One of the most difficult episodes in the diplomatic history of the United States was the mission of Genêt, a fiery and uncontrollable representative of the new French Republic, who assumed that the United States was bound by gratitude to take up arms against Great Britain. Nowhere in his whole life was the hardheaded Washington more needed than in the quenching of this firebrand, who was backed up by a broad popular movement and, to some degree, by Thomas Jefferson, Secretary of State. Washington held that the United States of America had become a part of a family of nations and could not ally itself with any of the European powers, and was in no condition to risk its existence by ranging itself along fiery France or eager Great Britain. Washington thus laid the corner stone of the American diplomacy of the succeeding century and a half, under which the United States refused to be a party to European wars until it felt itself attacked in 1917. Washington's appeal to his countrymen, particularly in his Farewell Address of 1796, was to keep out of disputes between other nations and to preserve their own republic if attacked.

AUTHORITY OF THE PRESIDENT

The Federal Constitution for the first time established a definite and continuous authority over foreign relations through the express power of the President to appoint diplomatic representatives and to instruct them as to the bases of treaties, subject to ratification of the eventual document by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. Several of the American diplomats of the war period entered the new public service, Thomas Jefferson, John Adams, John Jay, and others; and the treaties already made with England, France, Holland, and Prussia continued in force. Otherwise it was necessary for Washington to build up a diplomatic service; and still more important to decide what should be the attitude of the United States towards foreign nations.

JAY TREATY (1794)

One of the great services of Washington was to extend the diplomatic intercourse with other nations; and to settle, by means of the Jay Treaty, most of the vexatious questions left open with Great Britain by the treaty of peace of 1783. The Jay Treaty provided for the relinquishment of the western posts which the British continued to occupy, for an arbitration of the British debts, and also for a settlement of the disputed northeastern boundary of the United States. The treaty, the first commercial one with Great Britain, was not very satisfactory to the Americans, especially as regards neutral trade and trade with the British West Indies; but it was all that England was willing to grant, and it gave to the United States the peace with honor which was at that time so necessary to its own secure establishment.

Washington diagnosed clearly from the beginning that the trade and good will of England was essential to the prosperity of his country. He was strong for settling the debts with English merchants which were outstanding at the beginning of the Revolution, and therefore remarked: "With respect to British debts, I would feign hope, let the eloquence or abilities of any man or set of men be what they may, that the good sense and justice of this State will never suffer a violation of the treaty or pass acts of injustice to individuals. Honesty in States, as well as individuals, will ever be found the soundest policy."

NAVIGATION OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER

Washington felt a keen interest in the control of the mouth of the Mississippi. In the years immediately following the war, when he was especially interested in the development of the Potomac River navigation as a means of directing western commerce to the Atlantic shore, he had considered that while Spain's policy in closing the navigation of the river was impolitic, it gave a favorable opportunity for attaching the West to the Union by commercial ties. As President, however, he had come to realize that the free navigation of the Mississippi was of primary importance. It was during his second administration that the United States, taking advantage of the conditions in Europe which led Spain to desire peace in the New World, was able in 1795 to negotiate the treaty of San Lorenzo, by which Spain agreed to the northern boundary of West Florida which the United States claimed, opened the navigation of the lower portion of the Mississippi, where Spain controlled both sides of the river, and also granted a place of deposit at New Orleans.

The British and Spanish treaties strengthened the Union in the West.

QUALIFICATIONS OF A FOREIGN MINISTER

Washington records very early in his first administration a discussion of a confidential character on several persons available for foreign appointments. "Mr. Madison took his leave to-day. He saw no impropriety in my trip to the eastward; but with respect to the private agent to ascertain the disposition of the British Court with respect to the Western Posts and a Commercial treaty, he thought if the necessity did not press, it would be better to wait the arrival of Mr. Jefferson, who might be able to give the information wanted on this head—and with me thought that if Mr. Gouv'r Morris was employed in this business, it would be a commitment for his appointment as Minister, if one should be sent to that Court, or wanted at Versailles in place of Mr. Jefferson, and moreover if either of these was his wish, whether his representations might not be made with an eye to it. He thought with Colo. Hamilton, and as Mr. Jay also does, that Mr. Morris is a man of superior talents—but with the latter that his imagination sometimes runs ahead of his judgment—that his manners before he is known, and where known, had created opinions of himself that were not favourable to him, and which he did not merit."

COURTESIES TO DIPLOMATS (1790)

One of the amusing features of the new diplomatic corps was the solemn conferences between the President of the United States and his advisors over a presentation medal to retiring diplomatic representatives accredited to the United States. Washington's diary thus states the issue: "Fixed with the Secretary of State on the present which (according to the custom of other Nations) should be made to Diplomatic characters when they return from that employment in this Country—and this was a gold Medal, suspended to a gold Chain—in ordinary to be of the value of about 120 or 130 Guineas—Upon enquiry into the practice of other Countries, it was found, that France generally gave a gold Snuff-box set with diamonds; and of differt. costs; to the amount, generally, to a Minister Plenipotentiary of 500 Louisdors—That England usually gave to the same grade 300 guineas in Specie—and Holld. a Medal and Chain of the value of in common, 150 or 180 guineas the value of which to be encreased by an additional weight in the chain when they wished to mark a distinguished character. The Reason why a Medal and Chain was fixed upon for the American present, is, that the die being once made the Medals could at any time be struck at very little cost and the chain made by our artisans, which (while the first should be retained as a memento) might be converted into Cash."

TREATY MAKING AND THE SENATE (1789)

In 1789 Washington, in the consideration of an Indian treaty, presented to the Senate the problem of the "advice and consent," which the Constitution enjoined upon that body: "It doubtless is important that all treaties and compacts formed by the United States with other nations, whether civilized or not, should be made with caution and executed with fidelity.

"It is said to be the general understanding and practice of nations, as a check on the mistakes and indiscretions of ministers or commissioners, not to consider any treaty negotiated and signed by such officers as final and conclusive until ratified by the sovereign or government from whom they derive their powers. This practice has been adopted by the United States respecting their treaties with European nations, and I am inclined to think it would be advisable to observe it in the conduct of our treaties with the Indians; . . . It strikes me that this point should be well considered and settled, so that our national proceedings in this respect may become uniform and be directed by fixed and stable principles.

... "You have, indeed, advised me 'to execute and enjoin an observance of' the treaty with the Wyandottes, etc. You, gentlemen, doubtless intended to be clear and explicit, and yet, without further explanation, I fear I may misunderstand your meaning, for if by my executing that treaty you mean that I should make it (in a more particular and immediate manner than it now is) the act of Government, then it follows that I am to ratify it. If you mean by my executing it that I am to see that it be carried into effect and operation, then I am led to conclude either that you consider it as being perfect and obligatory in its present state, and therefore to be executed and observed, or that you consider it as to derive its completion and obligation from the silent approbation and ratification which my proclamation may be construed to imply."

RELATION OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES TO TREATIES (1796)

On the important question of the ultimate treaty power, Washington had very clear views which he thus expressed:

"Having been a member of the General Convention, and knowing the principles on which the Constitution was formed, I have ever entertained but one opinion on this subject; and from the first establishment of the Government to this moment my conduct has exemplified that opinion—that the power of making treaties is exclusively vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and that every treaty so made and promulgated thenceforward became the law of the land.

It is thus that the treaty-making power has been understood by foreign nations, and in all the treaties made with them we have declared and they have believed that, when ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, they became obligatory. In this construction of the Constitution every House of Representatives has heretofore acquiesced, and until the present time not a doubt or suspicion has appeared, to my knowledge, that this construction was not the true one. Nay, they have more than acquiesced; for till now, without controverting the obligation of such treaties, they have made all the requisite provisions for carrying them into effect."

BOUNDARY DIFFICULTIES (1783-1789)

To most foreign powers—which then meant only European powers—the United States of America in 1789 stood on about the footing of the present South African Free State toward Europe. It was a vigorous small country with great resources, a small population, far distant from the world centers of power and military might. The only neighboring possessions of European settlers at that time were English Canada, Spanish Louisiana, Spanish Florida, and the various West Indian Islands. It is hard now to realize this isolation from civilization of the American people back of the coast.

Nevertheless many forces were at work to draw the new little federal republic into the circles of European interests. The first of these was the transfer of Canada and the French colonies on the Atlantic coast to Great Britain in 1763. The "habitants" of French race and speech had no mind to be incorporated in the Protestant United States of America. The Great Lakes boundary as drawn by the treaty of peace in 1783 was very easy to lay out. Washington divined the significance of that line and also foresaw the establishment of a western center of trade for the United States. His engineer's eye saw the future importance of the Lakes; and he actually sketched an overland route from Virginia to the present Cleveland, and thence by water to Detroit.

The treaty of 1783 dealt also with a northeastern frontier little known in detail, and very soon after the Revolution a serious difficulty came to the front regarding the boundary line between Maine (till 1820 a part of Massachusetts) and New Brunswick—a province said to be named for New Brunswick, New Jersey. That line caused an international difficulty which was not settled till 1842, and which kept alive a resentful feeling toward Great Britain, though, as stated above, the solving of the problem was begun under the Jay Treaty.

EFFECT OF WAR IN EUROPE (1793-1797)

Just as Washington was stepping into the presidency came the appalling French Revolution which did its best to draw the United States into war with England. Speedily followed the Terror, the destruction of royal government in France—the excesses of the Terror and the Jacobins. In 1794 the forces of order rallied and in a street fight in Paris in 1795 a young artillery officer named Bonaparte stood by the established government. Neither Washington nor anybody else in America foresaw the establishment of a French Empire.

The outbreak of the European war brought Washington face to face with the issue of neutrality. France claimed special international privileges under the treaty of alliance of 1778. President Washington took the safe and reasonable ground that the United States was the ally of neither party in the European wars.

PRINCIPLES OF NEUTRALITY (1793-1796)

On all these great questions of international responsibility Washington was in council with such men as John Adams and John Jay and Thomas Jefferson, skilled diplomats and experts in international law. Upon such councils was based his message of December 3, 1793. "As soon as the war in Europe had embraced those powers with whom the United States have the most extensive relations there was reason to apprehend that our intercourse with them might be interrupted and our disposition for peace drawn into question by the suspicions too often entertained by belligerent nations. It seems, therefore, to be my duty to admonish our citizens of the consequences of a contraband trade and of hostile acts to any of the parties, and to obtain by a declaration of the existing legal state of things an easier admission of our right to the immunities belonging to our situation. Under these impressions the proclamation which will be laid before you was issued.

"In this posture of affairs, both new and delicate, I resolved to adopt general rules which should conform to the treaties and assert the privileges of the United States. These were reduced into a system, which will be communicated to you. Although I have not thought myself at liberty to forbid the sale of the prizes permitted by our treaty of commerce with France to be brought into our ports, I have not refused to cause them to be restored when they were taken within the protection of our territory, or by vessels commissioned or equipped in a warlike form within the limits of the United States. It rests with the wisdom of Congress to correct, improve, or enforce this plan of procedure.

"Where individuals shall, within the United States, array themselves in hostility against any of the powers at war, or enter upon military expeditions or enterprises within the jurisdiction of the United States, or usurp and exercise judicial authority within the United States, or where the penalties on violations of the law of nations may have been indistinctly marked, or are inadequate—these offenses can not receive too early and close an attention, and require prompt and decisive remedies."

WASHINGTON'S QUERIES ON NEUTRALITY (1793)

On this basis Washington stood firm in refusing the demand of Genêt that not only should the prizes captured by French vessels be brought into United States ports, which Washington acknowledged was a right under the treaty with France, but also that United States should become a place for fitting out expeditions against the British, and that captures made by such expeditions or those made within territorial waters of the United States should also be brought within the treaty privilege. Even Jefferson, who was far more sympathetic than Washington with the French, considered Genêt's demands excessive.

The significance of the issue well appears in a list of questions which Washington sent to his Cabinet. The whole theory and practice of modern neutrality is involved.

"I. Shall a proclamation issue for the purpose of preventing interferences of the citizens of the United States in the war between France and Great Britain, &c.? Shall it contain a declaration of neutrality or not? What shall it contain?

"II. Shall a minister from the Republic of France be received?

"III. If received, shall it be absolutely or with qualifications; and, if with qualifications, of what kind?

"IV. Are the United States obliged by good faith to consider the treaties heretofore made with France as applying to the present situation of the parties? May they either renounce them, or hold them suspended till the government of France shall be established?

"V. If they have the right, is it expedient to do either, and which?

"VI. If they have an option, would it be a breach of neutrality to consider the treaties still in operation?

"VII. If the treaties are to be considered as now in operation, is the guarantee in the treaties of alliance applicable to a defensive war only, or to war either offensive or defensive?

"VIII. Does the war in which France is engaged appear to be offensive or defensive on her part? Or of a mixed and equivocal character?

"IX. If of a mixed and equivocal character, does the guarantee in any event apply to such a war?

"X. What is the effect of a guarantee such as that to be found in the treaty of alliance between the United States and France?

"XI. Does any particle in either of the treaties prevent ships of war, other than privateers, of the powers opposed to France from coming into the ports of the United States to act as convoys of their own merchantmen. Or does it lay any other restraint upon them more than would apply to the ships of war of France?

"XII. Should the future regent of France send a minister to the United States, ought he to be received?"

"XIII. Is it necessary or advisable to call together the two houses of Congress, with a view to the present posture of European affairs? If it is, what should be the particular object of such a call?"

POLICY OF NEUTRALITY (1793)

The outcome proved how wise Washington was in this policy of insisting upon our rights as an independent nation, of standing by our treaties, for preventing aggressions by Americans on the territorial rights of other nations. His policy of neutrality saved his country from being tangled in the Napoleonic Wars and eventually perhaps from suffering invasion. He always advocated good temper and moderation in our diplomacy, and stood by his constitutional right as a President to direct the diplomacy of the country, subject to the right of the Senate to ratify treaties by a two-thirds vote. His foreign policy is summed up in a letter to his Secretary of State, Randolph, in 1794:

"My objects are, to prevent a war, if justice can be obtained by fair and strong representations (to be made by a special envoy) of the injuries which this country has sustained from Great Britain in various ways, to put it into a complete state of military defence, and to provide eventually for such measures, as seem to be now pending in Congress for execution, if negotiation in a reasonable time proves unsuccessful."

Also in 1796 he wrote James Monroe, whom he was about to supersede because of Francophilism: "I have always given it as my decided opinion, that no nation had a right to intermeddle in the internal concerns of another; that every one had a right to form and adopt whatever government they liked best to live under themselves; and that, if this country could, consistently with its engagements, maintain a strict neutrality and thereby preserve peace, it was bound to do so by motives of policy, interest, and every other consideration, that ought to actuate a people situated and circumstanced as we are, already deeply in debt, and in a convalescent state from the struggle we have been engaged in ourselves."

FRIENDLY TERMS WITH ALL NATIONS (1796)

Similarly in 1795 he wrote Gouverneur Morris, Monroe's predecessor: "... sure I am, if this country is preserved in tranquility twenty years longer, it may bid defiance in a just cause to any power whatever; such in that time will be its population, wealth, and resources. . . . a liberal [British] policy will be one of the most effectual means of deriving advantages to their trade and manufactures from the people of the United States, and will contribute, more than anything else, to obliterate the impressions, which have been made by their late conduct towards us."

The same sentiment is in his Farewell Address in 1796: "In the execution of such a plan nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others should be excluded; and that in place of them just and amicable feelings toward all should be cultivated.—The Nation, which indulges toward another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable, when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur."

NO PERMANENT ALLIANCES (1796)

Washington's treaty of arbitration with Great Britain led him into a settlement of the boundary between Maine and Canada. He was greatly interested in the Mississippi question which was settled within four years after his death by the annexation of Louisiana. He had a hand in the construction of the first ships of war built by the United States under the Constitution. He began a long and heartbreaking negotiation with the Barbary powers for the freedom of Americans who had been made slaves by those pirate countries.

Washington's ideas as to foreign relations were the same from the beginning of the Revolution to the end of his life twenty-four years later. As general of the armies he urged that temporary alliance with France which made independence possible. As President he declined to consider that the alliance of 1778 with France bound the United States to make war on Great Britain. As head of the diplomatic service he obtained commercial treaties and agreements with Great Britain and Spain, and opened the way for the later development of American commercial relations.

In his Farewell Address of 1796 he laid down the basis of the relation of the United States and foreign countries in unforgettable phrases: "Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, I conjure you to believe me, fellow-citizens, the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican Government. . . .

"The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign Nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little Political connection as possible.—So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith.—Here let us stop."

PREPAREDNESS (1782, 1793)

Preparedness was always an essential part of Washington's foreign policy. His attitude is shown by a letter written to McHenry in 1782, when it was a question whether peace would come without further fighting: "If we are wise, let us prepare for the worst. There is nothing, which will so soon produce a speedy and honorable peace, as a state of preparation for war; and we must either do this, or lay our account for a patched up inglorious peace, after all the toil, blood, and treasure we have spent."

Being criticised for insisting upon a well-organized militia, Washington defined his policy as follows: "Nor can such arrangements, with such objects, be exposed to the censure or jealousy of the warmest friends of republican government. They are incapable of abuse in the hands of the militia, who ought to possess a pride in being the depository of the force of the Republic, and may be trained to a degree of energy equal to every military exigency of the United States. But it is an inquiry which can not be too solemnly pursued, whether the act 'more effectually to provide for the national defense by establishing an uniform militia throughout the United States' has organized them so as to produce their full effect."

Upon national defense Washington said in 1793: "I can not recommend to your notice measures for the fulfillment of our duties to the rest of the world without again pressing upon you the necessity of placing ourselves in a condition of complete defense and of exacting from them the fulfillment of their duties toward us. The United States ought not to indulge a persuasion that, contrary to the order of human events, they will forever keep at a distance those painful appeals to arms with which the history of every other nation abounds. There is a rank due to the United States among nations which will be withheld, if not absolutely lost, by the reputation of weakness. If we desire to avoid insult, we must be able to repel it; if we desire to secure peace, one of the most powerful instruments of our rising prosperity, it must be known, that we are at all times ready for war."

MILITARY ACADEMY (1796)

Military preparation included the intensive training of officers for the small standing army, and in his last annual address to Congress Washington said: "The institution of a military academy is also recommended by cogent reasons. However pacific the general policy of a nation may be, it ought never to be without an adequate stock of military knowledge for emergencies. The first would impair the energy of its character, and both would hazard its safety, or expose it to greater evils when war could not be avoided. Besides that war might often not depend upon its own choice. In proportion as the observance of pacific maxims might exempt a nation from the necessity of practising the rules of the military art, ought to be its care in preserving and transmitting, by proper establishments, the knowledge of that art. . . . [We know] that the art of war is at once comprehensive and complicated; that it demands much previous study; and that the possession of it, in its most improved and perfect state, is always of great moment to the security of a nation. This, therefore, ought to be a serious care of every government; and for this purpose, an academy, where a regular course of instruction is given, is an obvious expedient, which different nations have successfully employed."

COMBINATIONS OF NATIONS

Since the World War of 1914-1918 and the formation of a League of Nations in 1919, some efforts have been made to show that President Washington had in his mind something resembling that form of international organizations. Though alliances and military leagues abounded throughout the eighteenth century, nothing approaching a league of nations to act in time of peace was put into effect.

His unwillingness to venture the future of the United States on any combination of states is shown by a remark in 1793: "All our late accounts from Europe hold up the expectation of a general war in that quarter. . . . I ardently wish we may not be forced into it by the conduct of other nations. If we are permitted to improve without interruption the great advantages, which nature and circumstances have placed within our reach, many years will not revolve before we may be ranked not only among the most respectable, but among the happiest people on this globe."

After retirement from the presidency he wrote to a friend: "No policy, in my opinion, can be more clearly demonstrated, than that we should do justice to all, and have no political connexion with any of the European powers beyond those, which result from and serve to regulate our commerce with them. Our own experience, if it has not already had this effect, will soon convince us, that the idea of disinterested favors or friendship from any nation whatever is too novel to be calculated on, and there will always be found a wide difference between the words and actions of any of them."

PERMANENT WORLD PEACE

Washington's most striking remark on permanent world peace was made in 1786 to Lafayette: "Although I pretend to no peculiar information respecting commercial affairs, nor any foresight into the scenes of futurity, yet, as the member of an infant empire, as a philanthropist by character, and, (if I may be allowed the expression,) as a citizen of the great republic of humanity at large, I cannot help turning my attention sometimes to this subject. I would be understood to mean, I cannot avoid reflecting with pleasure on the probable influence, that commerce may hereafter have on human manners and society in general. On these occasions I consider how mankind may be connected like one great family in fraternal ties. I indulge a fond, perhaps an enthusiastic idea, that, as the world is evidently much less barbarous than it has been, its melioration must still be progressive; that nations are becoming more humanized in their policy, that the subjects of ambition and causes for hostility are daily diminishing; and, in fine, that the period is not very remote, when the benefits of a liberal and free commerce will pretty generally succeed to the devastations and horrors of war."

Valiantly he strove in the succeeding years of his presidency for peace abroad as well as progress at home, for "a General Peace" which he did not live to witness. He laid deeply and broadly the foundations of domestic and foreign policy upon which his country has become a world power which, more than any other great nation, stands for permanent peace.

and returned there in 1747 to reside with his brother, Lawrence. Lawrence Washington died in 1752, leaving the property to his daughter, and in case of her death (which happened the same year) to his brother, George. During the Revolution George Washington enlarged the house to its present dimensions. With the return of peace it became a Mecca to which journeyed the prominent people of the country and foreign visitors. It has now become a national shrine, lovingly preserved by the Mount Vernon Ladies Association of the Union. General and Mrs. Washington and other members of the family are buried in the tomb on the grounds.

MOUNT VERNON, VIRGINIA—THE HOME THAT WASHINGTON LOVED

WAKEFIELD, VIRGINIA—THE BIRTHPLACE OF WASHINGTON

WAKEFIELD, VIRGINIA, the house recently built, under the auspices of the Wakefield National Memorial Association, at the site of the birthplace of George Washington. When Washington was born the estate was called after Bridges Creek; later it was named Wakefield. The birthplace was burned in 1780, while occupied by the son of Augustine Washington, half-brother of George, to whom it had descended. In 1815 George Washington Parke Custis placed a tablet at the site; in 1858 the property was conveyed to Virginia; and in 1882, to the United States. A monument, now moved, was erected in 1896. The present house is not a copy of the original, but is typical of the Virginia house of the period; it, with the estate around it, is administered by the National Park Service as the George Washington Birthplace National Monument at Wakefield.

A NATIONAL SHRINE

IN the Potomac, a few miles below the city of Washington, has been standing for nearly two centuries a mansion which is a shrine of humanity, for Mount Vernon is more than a national memorial. Distinguished pilgrims of many races lay wreaths at the tomb of him who devoted all he was and all he had to making freedom secure for mankind.

Mount Vernon is the most famous home in the world. Nowhere else do we get so close to such an illustrious man. It is at Mount Vernon alone that Washington comes down from his heroic pedestal and reveals himself to us in the majestic simplicity of the Virginia farmer, the Cincinnatus of the West. Washington was not common clay, nor is Mount Vernon common earth. He could not have been such a patriot if he had not loved the place so much, because affection for the actual ground and wood and stone of the home is the most natural foundation of love of country.

The Mount Vernon Ladies' Association, incorporated in 1856, is the oldest patriotic organization of women in the United States. Wisely directed energy, unselfish devotion, and reverent patriotism—these conspicuous qualities of Washington have been manifested in an eminent degree by the Ladies of Mount Vernon in making permanent for us his hallowed shrine. Reassembling the original furniture and relics is the most wonderful of all the things that the Ladies of Mount Vernon have done. They have made the mansion a museum of priceless treasures, and it is the duty of patriotic Americans to see to it that everything that used to be at Mount Vernon is returned there.

THE HISTORIC MANSION

To know Mount Vernon one must visit it in rain and in sunshine, in winter and in summer, in the morning and with the lengthening shadows of the afternoon. The mansion is kept in such perfect condition that it gives no indication of having endured the storms of so many years. Yet you are surrounded by the atmosphere of the eighteenth century, that age of silk stockings, lace cuffs, powdered hair, and stately manners, so that one almost expects to see Lady Washington drive up with her coach and four. Life at Mount Vernon, though simple, was in the grand style; and the mansion, too, is simple, but with an air of elegance to a certain extent its own, for it is not entirely derived from its association with its illustrious proprietor.

Though rich in memories, they are all noble; there is no skeleton in the closet and no ghost. Listen to what the old house has to tell you, for it is silently eloquent. As you walk through these rooms you are turning the pages of history. No other private residence in the world is so permeated with the annals of a great nation, and its associations are all the result of the life work of one great man. Here the ablest men came to confer with Washington. In the library he drafted historic documents and wrote hundreds of letters of the utmost importance to our country. It adds interest to the reading of a letter of Washington to be able to picture him as he wrote it in his library.

We must visit Mount Vernon to know the real Washington; and, to know him as we ought, we should visit it many times and read and re-read his works, for the more we know of Washington the more we appreciate his home. There have been hundreds of books written about Washington, but the best will always be those he wrote himself. We should hear less about the hatchet and the cherry tree and other myths, and we should be better Americans if we read as much as we can of what Washington himself has written; for, in so doing, we not only become acquainted with the first American but we also learn how our country was made a nation.

ORIGIN OF MOUNT VERNON

The Vestry Book of Pohick Church recorded November 18, 1735, that Augustine Washington, father of George, was sworn in as vestryman and attended meetings August 18, 1736, August 13, 1737, and October 3, 1737, after which his name does not appear. By a deed recorded in October, 1740, Augustine Washington conveyed to his son Lawrence the 2500 acres of land at Hunting Creek, which was later called Mount Vernon. From Jamaica, May 30, 1741, Lawrence wrote his father, "I hope my lots are secured, which, if I return, shall make use of as my dwelling." He did not return until the spring of 1743, and on the 19th of July was married to Anne Fairfax. It is difficult to understand how Lawrence could have given attention to the building of the original central part of the mansion at this time, and it seems more reasonable to attribute its construction to the loving care of Augustine for his son, who was to be married as soon as his military service was over, and to suppose that Augustine alluded to these facts when he had cut on the corner stone the initials L. W. with the heart and military axes. Augustine's will, executed April 11, 1743, gives Lawrence the "Land at Hunting Creek . . . with the water mill adjoining thereto . . . And all the slaves, Cattle & Stocke . . . and all the household Furniture whatsoever now in & upon or which have been Commonly possessed by my said son."

Lawrence called his estate Mount Vernon, thus showing his affection for his old chief, Admiral Vernon. The construction of the Great House went on at intervals during most of George Washington's life, nor did he consider it finished when he died. Augustine, Lawrence, and George were probably its only architects. You may restore the house to its condition in Lawrence's time, in your imagination, by removing the portico, the colonnades, the third story, the banquet hall, the library, and replacing with a few cabins all the outbuildings except the barn. The mansion will be left about one-third of its present size, with two stories and a garret with gable roof and dormer windows. There were four rooms on each floor, a small porch at the front door, and chimneys at each end. Lawrence died at Mount Vernon, July 26, 1752, aged thirty-four.

At the death of Lawrence's daughter and only surviving child, George inherited Mount Vernon, subject to a life interest in favor of the widow of Lawrence, who died in 1761. In October, 1754, George Washington resigned his military command of the Virginia forces and retired to Mount Vernon, where he stayed till he set out with General Braddock in 1755; after that campaign he returned to Mount Vernon, where he remained in a weak and feeble condition. August 14 he was commissioned commander-in-chief of the Virginia forces, and he was for four years busy on the frontier, returning to Mount Vernon from time to time.

In 1756, Washington wrote from Winchester asking for leave of absence to attend a meeting of executors of the estate of Lawrence in September at Alexandria, "as I am very deeply interested, not only as an executor and heir of part of his estate, but also in a very important dispute, subsisting between Colonel Lee, who married the widow, and my brothers and self, concerning advice in the will, which brings the whole personal estate in question." In September, 1757, Washington came to Mount Vernon to the funeral of William Fairfax, of Belvoir, the father of Anne. In November, Washington returned to Mount Vernon in bad health and was attended by his physician, Charles Green, who was also rector of Pohick Church.

THE FAMILY MANSION (1759)

When Washington's approaching marriage made it necessary to enlarge his mansion, John Patterson wrote him, June 17, 1758, that he would take the roof off the house as soon as the carpenters got the laths to shingle on. July 13, Patterson wrote, "The Great House was rais'd six days ago; sixteen thousand bricks have been burnt for the underpinning." July 14, Colonel John Carlyle wrote Washington that his house was now uncovered. August 13, Patterson reported that the outside of the house was finished. Humphrey Knight wrote Washington, August 24, "The great house goes on as brisk as possible. The painter has been painting 3 days. Our carpenter is now getting laths to sheath ye great house." The repairs included new weather boards, closets, floors, and a stairway to the attic. It is not necessary to go into the extensive alterations and additions which were made at various times later, as they have been fully described by other writers.

In December, 1758, Washington resigned his commission. In January, 1759, he was married to Mrs. Martha Custis and stayed at his bride's estate, White House, in New Kent on the Pamunkey, and at Williamsburg, until the close of the session of the House of Burgesses in May, when the couple came to live at Mount Vernon. Washington wrote September 20, 1759: "I am now I believe fix'd at this seat with an agreeable Consort for Life. And hope to find more happiness in retirement than I ever experienced amidst a wide and bustling World." Both the White House and Mrs. Washington's other residence, the Six Chimney House in Williamsburg, were finer mansions than Mount Vernon was at that time, but she cheerfully made her home in the remote "and humble" dwelling of Colonel Washington.

CHANGES AND FURNITURE

From then until 1775 it was truly his home, and he proceeded at once to develop and enlarge the estate, adding many acres to the original property, but not at that time altering the main house, though he adjoined various outhouses in immediate connection, and improved the grounds. For instance, the diaries under date of March 27, 1760, record: "Agreed to give Mr. William Triplet £18 to build the two houses in the Front of my House [this means the side away from the river] (plastering them also), and running walls for Pallisades to them from the Great house, and from the Great House to the Wash House and Kitchen also." January 9, 1769, he was "At home all day, opening the Avenue to the House, and for bringing the Road along." The interior was largely refurnished, partly with Mrs. Washington's goods, partly with supplies from England; though it must always be remembered that the fact that he ordered such and such articles did not prove that he ever received them.

For instance, the invoices show that for his painstaking order of busts of Alexander the Great, Julius Caesar, Charles XII of Sweden, and the King of Prussia (Frederick the Great), Prince Eugene, and the Duke of Marlborough, together with "Wild Beasts" and "Sundry Small Ornaments for chimy piece," he received, with the agent's explanation, "A Groupe of Aeneas carrying his Father out of Troy, with four statues, viz. his Father Anchises, his wife Cresusa and his son, Ascanius, neatly finisht and bronzed with copper . . . Two Groupes, with two statues each of Bacchus & Flora, . . . Two ornamented vases . . . Two Lyons." Nevertheless he probably received the "1 Tester Bedstead 7½ feet pitch with fashionable bleu or bleu and White Curtains to suit a Room lind w't the Ireld. paper." The English traveler Burnaby, writing in 1760, says of Mount Vernon at this time: "This place is the property of colonel Washington, and truly deserving of its owner. The house is most beautifully situated upon a high hill on the banks of the Potowmac; and commands a noble prospect of water, of cliffs, of woods, and plantations."

PRIDE IN MOUNT VERNON

Washington described Mount Vernon as follows: "No estate in United America, is more pleasantly situated than this. It lies in a high, dry and healthy country, 300 miles by water from the sea, and, as you will see by the plan, on one of the finest rivers in the world. Its margin is washed by more than ten miles of tide water; . . . This river, which encompasses the land the distance above-mentioned, is well supplied with various kinds of fish, at all seasons of the year; and, in the spring, with the greatest profusion of shad, herrings, bass, carp, perch, sturgeon, &c. Several valuable fisheries appertain to the estate; the whole shore, in short, is one entire fishery." The estate was divided into Mansion House Farm, River Farm, Union Farm, Muddy Hole Farm, Dogue Run Farm. There were some thirty buildings at Mount Vernon, among which were the kitchen, connected with the mansion by an arcade, servants' quarters, butler's house, gardener's house, store house, smoke house, wash house, stable, coach house, barns, salt house, carpenter shop, spinning house, where sixteen wheels were kept going, green house, spring house, milk house, and an ice house which in mild winters was filled with snow.

Washington was never really happy away from Mount Vernon. After the Revolution he wrote: "Agriculture has ever been the most favorite amusement of my life." In 1785 a visitor to Mount Vernon stated that Washington's greatest pride was to be thought the first farmer in America. That combination of accurate knowledge of human nature and untiring industry which made him a great commander made him also a great farmer. He was master of the art of turning his circumstances to the best account. At Mount Vernon there was no want, because there was no waste when the master was there.

It is extraordinary how much Washington, who was the busiest man in America, did for his estate in a lifetime, during large portions of which he was absent in the service of his country. With the art of a skillful landscape gardener, he improved the natural beauties of the place. He wrote General Knox that, in the course of the conversation at Boston, he "was most interested by something which was said respecting the composition for a public walk." Washington remarked that the Mount Vernon land has "an understratum of hard clay impervious to water, which, penetrating that far and unable to descend lower, sweeps off the upper soil." Washington was anxious about the possibility of fire at Mount Vernon, and that his fears were not without cause is shown by an entry in his diary, January 5, 1788: "About Eight o'clock in the evening we were alarmed, and the house a good deal endangered, by the soot of one of the Chimneys taking fire and burning furiously, discharging great flakes of fire on the Roof, but happily by having aid at hand and proper exertion no damage ensued." He wrote his manager: "I beg you will make my people (about the Mansion house) be careful of the fire; for it is no uncommon thing for them to be running from one house to another in cold, windy nights with sparks of fire flying and dropping as they go along, without paying the least attention to the consequences."

SCIENTIFIC IMPROVEMENTS

In what he called his Botanical Garden, between the flower-garden and the spinner's house, Washington carried on much of his investigation. The nurseries, gardens, and greenhouse were filled with choice collections of rare plants, fruit trees, vegetables, and flowers. To do this was not easy at a time when means of communication and transportation were almost primitive, but admirers in all parts of the world knew that the best way to please the most distinguished man in the world was to send him a choice plant or animal for his estate. Washington's favorite Bible quotation about the shade of his own vine and fig-tree was not entirely a figure of speech, for fig-trees were trained on the warm side of the north garden wall, and he paid much attention to the cultivation of grapes. It is not in accordance with his character that the story by which Washington is most widely known represents him as wantonly destroying a cherry tree. In later years he wrote: "It is always in one's power to cut a tree down, but time only can place them where one would have them." The passages in Washington's letters and diaries, in which he spoke of his trees, would make a book of considerable size. The last time he left the house, which was the afternoon of the day before he died, he walked out through the snow to mark some trees to be cut down between mansion and river. One of his last letters was to his manager about the care of Mount Vernon. At his death he left written plans for the rotation of crops up to the end of 1803.

THE LIBRARY

Washington took great pains to secure the most exact information on subjects which interested him. All his life he was buying books. His library of more than a thousand volumes, mostly on agriculture, government, and military affairs, was a large one for that time. An interesting date is Friday, June 16, 1786, when Washington recorded: "Began about 10 O'clock to put up the Book press in my study." This was probably a press for copying letters. Washington had at Mount Vernon more than two hundred folio volumes of his documents, and these formed only a part of his manuscripts. His diary noted entire days spent in writing. In 1797, he stated that he intends to erect a building at Mount Vernon for the security of his papers. How restful it was for him to turn aside from weighty and perplexing matters of state and the selfish designs of politicians, and to write: "I have a high opinion of beans." "Of all the improving and ameliorating crops, none in my opinion is equal to potatoes."

It was in his library that Washington made those painstaking studies of republican forms of government, the notes of which still exist in his writing. He made good use of them when he presided at the Constitutional Convention, which convened in 1787. We form a better idea of his sacrifices for our country as we picture him before the convention, going around Mount Vernon for ten days with his arm in a sling because of rheumatism. Few Americans understand that if we had had no Washington we should not have had our Constitution; not only because of his powerful agency in framing it and his great influence in securing its adoption, but because the certainty that Washington would be first President made the people sure that the provisions of the Constitution would be interpreted with wisdom and executed with justice. Not until Washington was elected was the chief power in America vested in a single person, and in Washington the highest power was entrusted to the most worthy, which is the greatest assurance of good government. Respect for Washington among the nations of Europe gave dignity to our new government.

POLITICS (1774)

George Mason, who drafted the first Constitution of Virginia, lived at Gunston Hall, a few miles down the river. Among Washington's papers are the Fairfax Resolves, in the writing of Mason, adopted by a county meeting of which Washington was chairman, July 18, 1774. There were twenty-four of these resolutions, forming one of the most important documents in our early history. They may be summed up in the statement—we will religiously maintain and inviolably adhere to such measures as shall be concerted by the general Congress for the preservation of our lives, liberties, and fortunes. There can be little doubt that Washington and Mason did a large part of the work on these resolutions at Mount Vernon. Two weeks later these resolves were in effect adopted by the Virginia Convention, where Washington represented Fairfax County, and they formed the basis of Virginia's instructions to her delegates to the First Continental Congress. Before that Congress Washington entered in his diary: "August 30—Colo. Pendleton, Mr. Henry, Colo. Mason and Mr. Thos. Triplet came in the Eveng. and stayd all Night. 31. All the above Gentlemen dined here, after which, with Colo. Pendleton and Mr. Henry, I set out on my journey to Phila." Horatio Gates, Richard Henry Lee, and others had an important conference at Mount Vernon, May 3, 1775, and the next day Washington set out for the Second Congress at Philadelphia.

A VISITOR'S JUDGMENT (1785)

Several of the many visitors to what Washington called his "well resorted tavern" have left descriptions of the house in these days of its prime. John Hunter, an English merchant, who was there in November, 1785, wrote that he "rose early and took a walk about the General's grounds—which are really beautifully laid out. . . . The style of his house is very elegant, something

His improvements I'm told are very great within the last year. He is making a most delightful bowling green before the house and cutting a new road thro' the woods to Alexandria. It would be endless to attempt describing his house and grounds—I must content myself with having seen them. The situation is a heavenly one, upon one of the finest rivers in the world."

Brissot de Warville gives his impressions in 1788: "You discover a country house of an elegant and majestic simplicity. It is preceded by grass plats; on one side of the avenue are the stables, on the other a greenhouse, and houses for a number of negro mechanics. . . . This house overlooks the Potowmack, enjoys an extensive prospect, has a vast and elevated portico on the front next the river, and a convenient distribution of the apartments within. . . . Amariah Frost in 1797 "viewed the garden and walks, which are very elegant, abounding with many curiosities, Fig trees, raisins, limes, oranges, etc., large English mulberries, artichokes, etc. . . . There are beautiful groves arranged in proper order back of both the gardens and rows of trees exactly corresponding with each other, between which and the two gardens is the great green and circular walk fronting northerly from the house and seen at a great distance. The southern part of the house fronts the river. The house is long but not high, with a cupola in the center of the roof. The chamber windows are small, being only 12 lights, 8 or 10, or less, to a window. The lower windows are larger. Two wings and other buildings corresponding to each other on either side, also, a large piazza in the front, add much to the beauty of the house."

ABSENCES FROM MOUNT VERNON (1789-1797)

When it became probable that Washington would be chosen first President of the United States, he wrote John Armstrong: "I well remember the observation you made in your letter to me of last year, 'that my domestic retirement must suffer an interruption.' This took place, notwithstanding it was utterly repugnant to my feelings, my interests, and my wishes. I sacrificed every private consideration, and personal enjoyment, to the earnest and pressing solicitations of those, who saw and knew the alarming situation of our public concerns, and had no other end in view but to promote the interests of their country; conceiving, that under those circumstances, and at so critical a moment, an absolute refusal to act might on my part be construed as a total disregard of my country, if imputed to no worse motives. . . . I am so wedded to a state of retirement, and find the occupations of a rural life so congenial with my feelings, that to be drawn into public at my advanced age would be a sacrifice, that would admit of no compensation."

When he was leaving to be inaugurated at New York, Washington wrote, April 16, 1789: "I bade adieu to Mount Vernon, to private life and to domestic felicity." That Mrs. Washington shared her husband's regret at leaving Mount Vernon is clear from the following letter written in December, 1789: "I little thought when the war was finished that any circumstances could possibly happen which would call the General into public life again. I had anticipated that, from that moment, we should be suffered to grow old together, in solitude and tranquility. That was the first and dearest wish of my heart. I will not, however, contemplate with too much regret disappointments that were inevitable; though his feelings and my own were in perfect unison with respect to our predilections for private life, yet I cannot blame him for having acted according to his ideas of duty in obeying the voice of his country. It is owing to the kindness of our numerous friends, in all quarters, that my new and unwished for situation is not, indeed, a burden to me. When I was much younger I should probably have enjoyed the innocent gayeties of life as much as most persons of my age; but I had long since placed all the prospects of my future worldly happiness in the still enjoyments of the fireside at Mount Vernon."

LAST RESIDENCE AT MOUNT VERNON (1797-1799)

Washington lived but two years and nine months after he retired from the Presidency, March 4, 1797. He wrote General Knox: "The remainder of my life, (which in the course of nature cannot be long,) will be occupied in rural amusements; and, though I shall seclude myself as much as possible from the noisy and bustling crowd, none more than myself would be regaled by the company of those I esteem, at Mount Vernon; more than twenty miles from which, after I arrive there, it is not likely that I shall ever be." Washington wrote in October, 1797: "An eight years absence from home (excepting short occasional visits) had so deranged my private affairs;—had so despoiled my buildings;—and in a word had thrown my domestic concerns into such disorder,—as at no period of my life have I been more engaged than in the last six months to recover and put them in some tolerable train again." September 28, 1799, he wrote Lawrence Lewis: "It is my wish to place my estate in this country on a new establishment, thereby bringing it into so narrow a compass as not only to supersede the necessity of a manager, but to make the management of what I retain in my own hands a healthy and agreeable amusement to look after myself, if I should not be again called to the public service of the country." Who does not sympathize with Washington when he writes McHenry: "Although I have not houses to build (except one, which I must erect for the accommodation and security of my Military, Civil and private Papers, which are voluminous and may be interesting), yet I have not one, or scarcely anything else about me that does not require considerable repairs. In a word, I am already surrounded by Joiners, Masons, Painters, &c., &c.; and such is my anxiety to get out of their hands, that I have scarcely a room to put a friend into, or to sit in myself, without the music of hammers, or the odoriferous smell of paint."

AMUSEMENTS AND DIVERSIONS

When you cross the threshold of the mansion, you step into the home life of the Washingtons. George and Martha made their house a beautiful home, filled with handsome furniture of a period when furniture was noted for its substantial elegance. They were both of them particular about the appointments of the table, and Washington goes with minute care into details of wine-glasses, finger-bowls, decanters, butter-boats, tureens, and other dishes. It is possible here to mention but a few of the priceless relics of Washington with which the Ladies of Mount Vernon have filled the library. At sixteen he was earning his living by surveying, and he worked at it in later years, sometimes making surveys of Hunting Creek and other streams on the ice. As late as April 21, 1785, he records that he went to Abingdon in his barge, "Took my Instruments, with intent to Survey the Land I hold by purchase on 4 Mile Run," three miles above Alexandria, but the surveying ended abruptly, because Billy Lee, who was carrying the chain, fell and broke his knee pan, so that he had to be carried to Abingdon on a sled, as he could neither walk, stand, nor ride.

In the hall of Mount Vernon are the swords with which he directed his troops. In leaving them to his nephews he told them not to unsheath them for the purpose of shedding blood, except for self-defense or in defense of their country and its rights, and in the latter case to keep them unsheathed, and to prefer falling with them in their hands to the relinquishment thereof. Washington's spyglasses are poor things compared with modern binoculars, but he was the best observer in either army, and always wished to do his reconnoitering with his own eyes. He strained his eyes, so that he had to use spectacles, and remarked that he had not only grown old but blind in the service. There is a flute in the music room, though Washington wrote Francis Hopkinson that he could neither sing one of his songs nor raise a single note on any instrument. In his earliest account-book there is an entry when Washington was sixteen "to cash pd ye Musick Master for my Entrance 3/9." Thirty Windsor chairs were provided for the porch. The large number of chairs indicates that the Washingtons had to be prepared to receive many friends.

Elkanah Watson, in January, 1785, spent at Mount Vernon what he called "two of the richest days of my life." He said: "I found him [Washington] kind and benignant in the domestic circle, revered and beloved by all around him; agreeably social, without ostentation; delighting in anecdote and adventures, without assumption; his domestic arrangements harmonious and systematic. His servants seemed to watch his eye, and to anticipate his every wish; hence a look was equivalent to a command. His servant, Billy, the faithful companion of his military career, was always at his side, smiling content, animated and beamed on every countenance in his presence." Watson had a severe cough, and he said that some time after he had retired, "the door of my room was gently opened and on drawing my bed-curtains, to my utter astonishment, I beheld Washington himself, standing at my bedside with a bowl of hot tea in his hand."

PORTRAITURE

In the hall hangs the original deed of 1674 by which John Washington, the emigrant, great grandfather of George, derived from Lord Culpeper his title to Mount Vernon. The Houdon bust, which Stuart called the only representation of Washington better than his own portraits, was made at Mount Vernon. Houdon, the most celebrated sculptor of that time, came from France at the request of the General Assembly of Virginia in order to model Washington from life. With his three assistants he arrived from Alexandria by water at eleven o'clock at night. He remained about three weeks, and made a cast of the face, head, and shoulders, and took minute measurements of the body. Amid so much that is vague and legendary, the Houdon statue stands forth clear in its artistic and historic accuracy. No work of art exists that is more authentic. It is historically marked by a chronological record of facts, resolutions, correspondence, and inscriptions. Lafayette said that it is a "fac-simile of Washington's Person."

Other representations of Washington had been executed at Mount Vernon before the arrival of Houdon. In May, 1772, Charles Willson Peale painted Washington in the blue and red uniform of a colonel of Virginia militia, and he made also miniatures of Mrs. Washington and her two children. Peale returned in January, 1774, and painted the portrait of John Parke Custis. April 28, 1784, Robert Edge Pine came and remained three weeks, painting Washington and the two grandchildren, George Washington Parke Custis and Nelly Custis.

CONSIDERATION FOR THE POOR

Washington paid his debts promptly, and no man was more liberal to the poor or more ready to give his time and money to the public service. When he took command of the Army, in 1775, he wrote Lund Washington, who had charge of his affairs at Mount Vernon: "Let the hospitality of the house, with respect to the poor, be kept up. Let no one go hungry away. If any of this kind of people should be in want of corn, supply their necessities, provided it does not encourage them in idleness; and I have no objection to your giving my money in charity, to the amount of forty or fifty pounds a year, when you think it well bestowed. What I mean by having no objection is, that it is my desire that it should be done." "I wish that my horses and stock of every kind should be fed with judicious plenty and economy, but without the least profusion or waste."

One of the overseers wrote: "I had orders from General Washington to fill a corn-house every year, for the sole use of the poor in my neighborhood, to whom it was a most seasonable and precious relief, saving numbers of poor women and children from extreme want, and blessing them with plenty. . . . He owned several fishing stations on the Potomac, at which excellent herring were caught, and which, when salted, proved an important article of food to the poor. For their accommodation he appropriated a station—one of the best he had—and furnished it with all the necessary apparatus for taking herring. Here the honest poor might fish free of expense, at any time, by only an application to the overseer; and if at any time unequal to the labor of hauling the seine, assistance was rendered by order of the General."

VISITORS

In 1794, Washington gave his overseer definite instructions with regard to the entertainment of visitors at Mount Vernon. There were, he said, three classes of persons to whom should be given: "first, my particular and intimate acquaintance, in case business should call them there, such for instance as Doctor Craik. 2dly, some of the most respectable foreigners who may, perchance, be in Alexandria or the federal city; and be either brought down, or introduced by letter, from some of my particular acquaintance as before mentioned; or thirdly, to persons of some distinction (such as members of Congress, &c.) who may be travelling through the country from North to South, or from South to North. . . . I have no objection to any sober, or orderly person's gratifying their curiosity in viewing the buildings, gardens, &c., about Mt. Vernon; but it is only to such persons as I have described that I ought to be run to any expence on account of these visits of curiosity, beyond common civility and hospitality. No gentleman who has a proper respect for his own character (except relations and intimates) would use the house in my absence for the sake of convenience (as it is far removed from the public roads), unless invited to do so by me or some friend; nor do I suppose any of this description would go there without a personal, or written introduction."

Washington's ability to express a proposition clearly and to refuse a request gracefully is exemplified in the following letter, which he wrote October 30, 1787: "My fixed determination is, that no person whatever shall hunt upon my grounds or waters. —To grant leave to one, and refuse another, would not only be drawing a line of discrimination which would be offensive, but would subject one to great inconvenience—for my strict and positive orders to all my people are if they hear a gun fired upon my Land to go immediately in pursuit of it.—Permission therefore to any one would keep them either always in pursuit—or make them inattentive to my orders under the supposition of its belonging to a licensed person by which means I should be obtruded upon by others who to my cost I find had other objects in view. Besides, as I have not lost my relish for this sport when I can find time to indulge myself in it, and Gentlemen who come to the House are pleased with it, it is my wish not to have the game within my jurisdiction disturbed. For these reasons I beg you will not take my refusal amiss, because I would give the same to my brother if he lived off my land."

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS (1780-1789)

A letter of General Greene, November 13, 1780, tells of a hurried visit paid to Mount Vernon by Generals Greene and Steuben during the Southern Campaign, and was written to Washington:

"Sir: I arrived here yesterday about noon, and met with a kind and hospitable reception by Mrs. Washington and all the family. Mrs. Washington, Mr. and Mrs. Custis (who are here) and Mr. Lund Washington and his Lady are all well.

"We set out this morning for Richmond, and it is now so early that I am obliged to write by candlelight. Nothing but the absolute necessity of my being with my command as soon as possible should induce me to make my stay so short at your Excellency's seat, where there is everything that nature and art can afford to render my stay happy and agreeable. Mount Vernon is one of the most pleasant places I ever saw; and I don't wonder that you languish so often to return to the pleasures of domestic life. Nothing but the glory of being Commander in Chief, and the happiness of being universally admired could compensate a person for such a sacrifice as you make. Baron Steuben is delighted with the place, and charmed with the reception we met with. Mrs. Washington sets out for camp about the middle of this week."

In March, 1781, Lafayette, who was carrying on operations in Virginia which resulted in the penning up of Cornwallis at Yorktown, came to Mount Vernon, but he was not entertained there by the General until he returned to America in 1784. Mrs. General Knox visited Mrs. Washington at Mount Vernon in October, 1781, while the siege of Yorktown was in progress.

April 12, 1784, Luzerne, the French minister, who was spending several days at Mount Vernon, wrote of Washington: "He dresses in a gray coat like a Virginia farmer, and nothing about him recalls the recollection of the important part which he has played, except the great number of foreigners who come to see him." Lafayette arrived in New York from France August 4, 1784, and reached Mount Vernon August 17, where he remained twelve days. November 14 Washington went to Richmond, met Lafayette there, and the Marquis returned to Mount Vernon for a second visit of a week. November 29 Washington and Lafayette went to Annapolis, where he bade a final farewell to the Marquis.

The years from 1784 to 1789 Washington called his furlough. Brissot de Warville, who visited Mount Vernon in 1788, wrote: "Mrs. Washington superintends the whole, and joins to the qualities of an excellent house-wife the simple dignity which ought to characterize a woman, whose husband has acted the greatest part on the theater of human affairs; while she possesses that amenity, and manifests that attention to strangers which renders hospitality so charming." Thomas Lee Shippen wrote from Mount Vernon: "Mrs. Washington is the very essence of kindness. Her soul seems to overflow with it like the most abundant fountain and her happiness is in exact proportion to the number of objects upon which she can dispense her benefits."

During the Revolution Washington was always looking forward to the time when he could return to his beloved home. He wrote his wife: "I should enjoy more real happiness in one month with you at home, than I have the most distant prospect of finding abroad, if my stay were to be seven times seven years."

RETURN TO MOUNT VERNON (1783)

Washington resigned his commission at Annapolis, December 23, 1783, and, once more a private citizen, reached Mount Vernon with Mrs. Washington on Christmas eve. Relatives and friends had gathered to welcome them, and the servants made the night gay with bonfires, fiddling, and dancing. February 1, 1784, Washington wrote Lafayette: "At length, my dear Marquis, I am become a private citizen on the banks of the Potomac; and under the shadow of my own vine and my own fig-tree, free from the bustle of a camp, and the busy scenes of public life, I am solacing myself with those tranquil enjoyments, of which the soldier, who is ever in pursuit of fame, the statesman, whose watchful days and sleepless nights are spent in devising schemes to promote the welfare of his own, perhaps the ruin of other countries, as if this globe was insufficient for us all, and the courtier, who is always watching the countenance of his prince, in hopes of catching a gracious smile, can have very little conception."

OUTDOOR SPORTS

All his life Washington was an outdoor man. He was conceded to be the best horseman in Virginia. Before the Revolution he rode a hunting two or three times a week with neighbors and guests, and the mellow baying of the long-eared hounds, the distant horn, and the view halloo, resounded from field and wood as the hunt swept on. When after foxes, sometimes the hounds would start a deer. Bears were seen near Mount Vernon as late as 1772. The wild turkeys sometimes weighed thirty or forty pounds. Before the Revolution we find Washington ordering for himself "1 pr. of best Buck Breeches pr. Mea'e sent last y'r, to J. Coleman, to have a side Pocket, and a Buckle behind A Gentleman's Hunt'g Cap, Coverd with Black Velvet, to fit a pretty large head, cushioned round or stuffd to make it sit easy thereon. A Silk Band, and handsome Silv'r Buckle to it. 1 pr. of Silver Spur's of the New'r Fashn. . . . 1 Best whole hunting Whip, pretty stout and strong, cap'd with Silver and my name and the y'r engraved thereon" "A Riding Frock of a handsome Drab colour'd broad Cloth with plain dble gilt Button's A Riding Waistcoat of Superfine Scarlet Cloth, and gold Lace with Button's like those of the Coat." "1 large loud Hunting Horn, lap'd and securd in the strongest manner."

Washington went to many horse races, and on one occasion to a boat race on the Potomac. He made a fishing trip on his schooner that lasted for several days. Washington and his neighbors on the Potomac had barges manned by negroes in uniform. Among his orders from England were "a whale boat, long narrow sharp at both ends"; also "1 doz'n Neat and light 18 Feet oars for a Light Whale Boat, the Blades scoop'd &ca. and Painted." Mr. Digges was a wealthy planter, whose estate, Warburton, could be seen across the Potomac in Maryland. At a signal his barge and that of Washington would meet in the middle of the river and transfer passengers. Washington had also a ferry boat in which carriages and horses were "put over" the Potomac. In Washington's time hundreds of shad and thousands of herring were taken at Mount Vernon by means of seines drawn in by a windlass turned by horses.

TREE CULTURE

On each side of the east lawn a grove of locusts extended to the river. Trees and shrubs were carefully trimmed to make a frame to the view of the Potomac, and care was taken to keep vistas open in every direction. The level lawn on the west front, with the wide serpentine walk shaded by weeping willows, the oval grass plot, the flower garden on one side and the kitchen garden on the other, were all laid out according to a plan drawn by Washington himself and still unchanged. He paid great attention to his lawns, and the first order sent to England after his marriage includes "a large assortment of grass seed." Carefully trimmed box borders outline the paths today exactly as in Washington's time, their dark green making the flower beds flame like stained-glass windows. Roses named by Washington for his mother and for Nelly Custis still bloom, together with yellow, damask, tea, and guilder roses. Old-fashioned flowers and plants are cherished—iris, sweetwilliams, spice pinks, ivy, honeysuckle, lilacs, and jasmine. Mrs. Washington's active interest in the garden is indicated by this extract from a letter of her husband: "I have, too, Mrs. Washington's particular thanks to offer you for the flower roots and seeds."

No other living things bring us so close to Washington as some of the trees of Mount Vernon, for they were planted by him, and on them his eyes have rested with long and loving gaze. Washington studied as well as he could the economic value of forests and the ornamental properties of trees, but the technical aspects of forestry, such as reforestation, the relation of forests to moisture and rain fall, water supply, climate, and public health were not so well understood in his time as they are now. The magnolia planted by Washington is the most famous tree at Mount Vernon. Three hemlocks planted by him still remain. Three box trees probably planted by him are among the handsomest and most interesting trees. Washington wished to have perfect specimens of every tree that would grow at Mount Vernon. He personally superintended the selection of the most beautiful from the neighboring woods, and watched them with care until it was clear that the transplanting was successful. He arranged them symmetrically, and mingled forest trees, flowering shrubs, and evergreens so as to produce the most agreeable effect.

Washington wrote January 27, 1785: "I went to Belvoir and viewed the ruined Buildings of that place. In doing this I passed along the side of Dogue Creek and the River to the White Ho. in search of Elm and other Trees for my Shrubberies, etc. Found none of the former, but discovered one fringe Tree and a few Crab trees in the first field beyond my line, and in returning home (which I did to Dinner) by the way of Accatinck Creek I found several young Holly trees." The next day he wrote: "Road to day to my Plantations in the Neck, partly with a view to search for Trees; for which purpose I passed through the Woods and in the first drain beyond the Bars in my lower pasture, I discovered in tracing it upwards, many small and thriving plants of the Magnolio, and about and within the Fence, not far distant, some young Maple Trees; and the red berry of the Swamp. I also, along the Branch within Colo. Mason's field, . . . came across a mere nursery of young Crab trees of all sizes and handsome and thriving, and along the same branch on the outer side of the fence I discovered several young Holly Trees. But whether from the real scarcity, or difficulty of distinguishing, I could find none of the fringe tree."

RELIGIOUS OBSERVANCES

At Mount Vernon the cultivation of no part of Washington's nature was neglected. He found abundant exercise for his body in hard work on his farms, in the long rides which it was necessary for him to take, in hunting with his horses and hounds, and he was a stately and graceful dancer. Books, letters, pondering on important matters and converse with intellectual neighbors like George Mason and Lord Fairfax, exercised his mind. He found uplift for his soul in reading his Bible, in communion with his good wife, who was a woman of eminent piety, and in the church services at Pohick and Alexandria. On Sundays, when the Washingtons were stormbound, he read the Bible and sermons to his family with distinct and precise enunciation. There is a pocket note-book in which Washington has entered Bible references. His answers to the many congratulatory addresses from religious societies are models of their kind. In 1794 he wrote Charles Thomson that he had finished reading the first part of his translation of the Septuagint.

Washington often quoted the Scriptures, his favorite reference being to the verse in Micah about reposing under his own vine and fig-tree. He expresses a wish that the swords might be turned to plough shares, the spears into pruning-hooks, and as the Scripture expresses it, "the nations learn war no more." He regretted that Noah allowed the tobacco worms to get into the ark.

His nephew, Robert Lewis, said that he had accidentally witnessed Washington's private devotions in his library both morning and evening, and had seen him kneeling with an open Bible before him, and that this was his daily habit. Washington went to his library at four in the morning, and, after his devotions, spent the time till breakfast in writing and study. He also spent an hour in his library before retiring at night, and he wrote: "It is my intention to retire (and unless prevented by very particular company, I always do retire) either to bed or to my study soon after candlelight."

In 1789, acknowledging a sermon on the text "But ye shall die like men," Washington not only said that he has read the sermon, but also that he approved the doctrine inculcated. August 14, 1797, Washington wrote the Reverend Zachariah Lewis, thanking him for the sermons he had sent, and saying that the doctrine in them was sound and did credit to the author.

CHURCH GOING

Nelly Custis wrote Jared Sparks with regard to Washington: "He attended the church at Alexandria when the weather and roads permitted, a ride of ten miles. In New York and Philadelphia he never omitted attendance at church in the morning, unless detained by indisposition. The afternoon was spent in his own room at home; the evening with his family, and without company. Sometimes an old and intimate friend called to see us for an hour or two; but visiting and visitors were prohibited for that day. No one in church attended to the services with more reverential respect. My grandmother, who was eminently pious, never deviated from her early habits. She always knelt. The General, as was then the custom, stood during the devotional parts of the service." Bishop White stated that Washington's manner at church was always serious and attentive. A foreign house guest at Mount Vernon observed that on Sabbath evening there was no secular music and not even a game of chess.

Throughout his campaigns Washington was always careful about religious services. William Fairfax wrote him in 1754 that he had no doubt that his having public prayers in camp would have great influence with the Indians. Washington persisted in his efforts for the welfare of his frontier troops and frequently read prayers and the Scriptures to his men. During the French and Indian War Colonel Temple "more than once found him on his knees at his devotions." In his diary at Williamsburg, June 1, 1774, Washington recorded: "went to Church and fasted all day." Unless a clergyman was present Washington always asked a blessing at his table. The Pohick vestry book shows that from 1763 to 1774 George Washington attended twenty-three of the thirty-one meetings of Pohick vestry, once he was sick in bed, twice he was in attendance on the House of Burgesses, and three times he is known to have been out of the county, and the other two times he was probably out of the county. Rev. Charles Green, who was rector of Pohick, 1738-65, was also the family physician and a valued friend. His successor, Rev. Lee Massey, wrote: "I never knew so constant an attendant in church as Washington, and his behavior in the house of God was ever so deeply reverential that it produced the happiest effect on my congregation and greatly assisted me in my pulpit labors."

SOCIAL LIFE

In a letter to his neighbor, George Mason, written in 1769, Washington spoke of those "who live genteely and hospitably on clear estates," and this is an exact description in eight words of the life at Mount Vernon. Though Washington said, "We live in a state of peaceful tranquillity," Mount Vernon was by no means quiet. The original brass knocker hangs on the central door, but it was rarely used, for long before reaching the door the arrival of company was announced by the barking of the dogs. Martha Washington wrote that when she had gone on a visit and left her small son at home, every time the dogs barked she thought it was a messenger for her. If a day passed without company at Mount Vernon, Washington mentioned it in his diary. It has been figured out that in two months in 1768, Washington had company to dinner or to spend the night on twenty-nine days, and dined away or visited on seven.

People whose very names their host did not know were entertained there. Mount Vernon stands back a mile from the road to Colchester. Though the house can be seen from a considerable distance, people did not arrive there by accident. In 1787 Washington wrote that his house "may be compared to a well resorted tavern, as scarcely any strangers who are going from north to south, or from south to north, do not spend a day or two at it." "Those who resort here are strangers and people of the first distinction." Washington had so many letters to write and so much company that he was deprived of exercise. Persons who had been connected with the army wished certificates in order to prove claims against the government; these made it necessary to spend much time consulting his records. For more than two years after the war he had no secretary.

Though he lived simply and kept early hours, George Washington always paid great attention to the manner of doing things, and the grand air which he learned in his youth from Lord Fairfax he always retained. Distinguished guests were lighted to their rooms by the general himself. The broad piazza overlooking the river was the usual meeting place when the weather permitted. The amount of entertaining which the Washingtons expected to do may be inferred from the fact that six carving knives and forks were in the first order from England after their marriage. They were both of them particular about their clothes, china, furniture, and equipages. When at Mount Vernon Mrs. Washington dressed plainly. When she drove to Alexandria or Annapolis or Williamsburg with her coach and four, with the negro postillions and coachman in white and scarlet, she dressed as was fitting. In December, 1755, Washington ordered from London two complete livery suits for servants. "I wou'd have you choose the livery by our Arms; only, as the Field of the Arms is white. I think the Cloaths had better not be quite so but nearly like the inclos'd. The Trimmings and Facings of Scarlet and a Scarlet Waistcoat . . . If livery Lace is not quite disus'd I shou'd be glad to have these cloaths laced. I like that fashion best; also two Silver lac'd hatts to the above Liv-ery's." August 10, 1764, he ordered: "A Livery suit to be made of worsted Shagg of the Inclosed colour and fineness lined with red shalloon; and made as follows: The Coat and Breeches alike with a plain white washed button; the Button holes worked with Mohair of the same col'r. A collar of red shagg to the Coat with a narrow lace like the Inclosed round it; a narrow Cuff of the same colour of the Coat turn'd up to the bent of the Arm and laced round at that part; the waistcoat made of red Shagg (worsted Shagg also) and laced with the same lace as that upon the Collar and Sleeves." No doubt it was that the white flowers of the dogwood and the red of the red bud might reproduce his colors that, March 1, 1785, Washington planted "a circle of Dogwood with a red bud in the Middle, close to the old Cherry tree near the South Garden Ho[use]."

MARTHA WASHINGTON IN THE MANSION

While the sweet influences of Mount Vernon are sinking into our souls, let us not forget the gracious lady who inspired and comforted her husband throughout so many anxious years. Martha Washington preferred to remain in the background, so that her services to our country have never been understood and appreciated. She always encouraged the general to patriotic effort at the sacrifice of that domestic life to which both were devoted. At the very beginning of the Revolution she wrote: "My mind is made up; my heart is in the cause." For that cause, which was our cause, the Washingtons placed at stake their lives and all their earthly possessions.

Edmund Pendleton left a charming description of their hostess at Mount Vernon at the critical period of 1774: "I was much pleased with Mrs. Washington and her spirit. She seemed ready to make any sacrifice, and was cheerful, though I know she felt anxious. She talked like a Spartan mother to her son on going to battle. 'I hope you will all stand firm. I know George will,' she said. The dear little woman was busy from morning until night with domestic duties, but she gave us much time in conversation and affording us entertainment. When we set off in the morning, she stood in the door and cheered us with the good words, 'God be with you gentlemen.'"

Martha Washington little thought, when she said good-bye to her husband in May, 1775, that it would be more than six years before he returned to Mount Vernon, and that when she saw him next he would be five hundred miles away from home, at the head of the American army. Till she went to Cambridge she had never been farther north than Annapolis. She traveled in state in the family coach, attended by liveried servants and accompanied by her son and his wife. She filled her difficult position at headquarters in the Longfellow

House with tact and courtesy, for she was equal to every situation in which her husband's exalted station placed her.

The uniform testimony of those who knew Martha Washington is that she combined, in an extraordinary degree, dignity and affability. You will realize her delicacy of feeling and elevation of character when you read this exquisite letter which Martha Washington wrote in 1773 to the girl bride of her only son:

"My dear Nelly: God took from Me a Daughter when June Roses were blooming. He has now given me another daughter about her Age when Winter winds are blowing, to warm my Heart again. I am as Happy as One so Afflicted and so Blest can be. Pray receive my Benediction and a wish that you may long live the Loving Wife of my Happy Son, and a Loving Daughter of

"Your Affectionate Mother,

"M. WASHINGTON."

WASHINGTON'S FONDNESS FOR MARTHA

One of the three letters to his wife that has been preserved is the following:

"PHILADELPHIA, June 23, 1775.

"My Dearest: As I am within a few minutes of leaving this city, I would not think of departing from it with out dropping you a line, especially as I do not know whether it may be in my power to write again till I get to the camp at Boston. I go fully trusting in that providence, which has been more bountiful to me than I deserve and in full confidence of a happy meeting with you some time in the fall. I have no time to add more as I am surrounded with company to take leave of me. I return an unalterable affection for you which neither time or distance can change my best love to Jack and Nelly and regard for the rest of the family; conclude me with the utmost truth and Sincerity,

"Yr. entire,

"G. WASHINGTON."

On his appointment to command of the army, Washington wrote his brother, John Augustine: "I shall hope that my friends will visit and endeavor to keep up the spirits of my wife, as much as they can, as my departure will, I know, be a cutting stroke upon her; and on this account alone I have many disagreeable sensations." The general also wrote Jack Custis that he thought it absolutely necessary for the peace and satisfaction of his mother that he and his wife should live at Mount Vernon during his own absence.

MARTHA WASHINGTON DURING THE WAR

Mrs. Washington described herself as being "a kind of walking perambulator" during the war. She spent every winter with the general at headquarters, and said that she heard the first and last guns every season, and "marched home when the campaign was about to open." Lord Dunmore came up the Potomac to capture her, but the Virginia militia assembled in such numbers that he did not dare to attempt it. When her friends advised her to move back into the interior of the country, she said: "No, I will not desert my post." Valuables and important papers were kept in trunks, so that they could be moved at a moment's notice. In those times, when there were no telegraphs and telephones, what anxious days Martha Washington must have spent when important operations were in progress! For instance, when the British army was landing at the head of Elk, about to fight a battle which they expected would destroy her husband's army. Late in August, 1777, while reconnoitering before the battle of the Brandywine, Washington spent the night near the Head of Elk. This was the nearest that he came to Mount Vernon during the war, until, as he entered in his diary on Sunday, September 9, 1781: "I reached my own Seat at Mount Vernon (distant 120 Miles from the Hd. of Elk) where I staid till the 12th." The 10th, Washington wrote Lafayette: "We are thus far on our way to you. The Count de Rochambeau has just arrived. General Chastellux will be here, and we propose, after resting to-morrow, to be at Fredericksburg on the night of the 12th."

THE CUSTISES

No man loved his home more than Washington, and yet no man was so ready to leave it at his country's call. His accepting the command of the army in 1798 was the most patriotic act of all his patriotic life. His fame was bright and secure; he was comfortably established at Mount Vernon, where the infirmities of age were creeping upon him; he had everything to lose and nothing to gain; no man would be shrewder than Washington in understanding this; yet he was ready to sacrifice reputation and comfort, because he thought that he might serve his country. He wrote: "As my whole life has been dedicated to my country in one shape or another, for the poor remains of it, it is not an object to contend for ease and quiet, when all that is valuable in it is at stake, further than to be satisfied that the sacrifice I should make of these is acceptable and desired by my Country."

John Parke Custis, Mrs. Washington's son, left four children, the two youngest of whom were brought up by Washington. When in 1824 Lafayette last visited America, he told G. W. P. Custis that he had seen him first on the portico at Mount Vernon in 1784. "A very little gentleman, with a feather in his hat, holding fast to one finger of the good general's remarkable hand, which (so large that hand!) was all, my dear sir, you could well do at that time." Nelly, the sister of George Washington Parke Custis, used to stand on tiptoe to hold the button of the General's coat while she charmed him with her girlish confidences. Nelly Custis was married to Lawrence Lewis at Mount Vernon on Washington's last birthday. At the wedding the General wore his old continental uniform of blue and buff, and this was probably the last time he had it on. The first child of Nelly Custis was born a few days before Washington's death at Mount Vernon.

Washington would have been touched by the important part which school children have borne in the restoration of Mount Vernon. He took an affectionate interest in the bringing up of youth, and there was no philanthropy for which he opened his purse more freely than education. Though God left him childless in order that he might be the Father of his Country, fondness for children was a charming characteristic, and the beautiful children and grandchildren of Mrs. Washington added joy to their life at Mount Vernon. Mrs. Fitzhugh, who, as a child, was a frequent visitor to Mount Vernon, said that often, when at their games in the drawing room at night—perhaps romping, dancing and noisy—they would see the general watching their movements at some side door, enjoying their sport; and if at any time his presence seemed to check them, he would beg them not to mind him, but go on just as before, encouraging them in every possible way to continue their amusements to their hearts' content.

When, in 1773, Mrs. Washington's only daughter, beautiful Patsy Custis, was fatally stricken, Washington stated in his diary, June 19: "At home all day. About five o'clock poor Patcy Custis Died Suddenly." The next day Washington wrote: "It is an easier matter to conceive, than to describe the distress of this Family; . . . the Sweet Innocent Girl Entered into a more happy & peaceful abode than any she has met with in the afflicted Path she hitherto has trod. She . . . expired in . . . less than two minutes without uttering a word, a groan, or scarce a sigh.—This sudden and unexpected blow, I scarce need add has almost reduced my poor Wife to the lowest ebb of Misery; which is encreas'd by the absence of her son, (whom I have just fixed at the College in New York . . .)." Patsy was laid to rest in the old tomb on the twentieth. The diary states the nineteenth as very warm and clear, with a south wind. The day of the funeral it was still very warm, with thunder and appearances of rain, but none fell at Mount Vernon. The custom of placing the tomb near the mansion caused the departed to continue in a peculiar and intimate manner members of the household.

THE END OF LIFE AT MOUNT VERNON

In spite of the fact that his mother was vigorous to an advanced age, Washington wrote: "I am of a short-lived family and cannot expect to remain very long upon the earth." A few days before his death he pointed out to his nephew, Major Lewis, the spot where he intended to build the new family vault, saying: "This change I shall make the first of all for I may require it before the rest." The last entries in his diary are as follows: December 12, 1799, "Morning Cloudy. Wind at No. Et. and Mer. 33. A large circle round the Moon last Night. About 10 o'clock it began to snow, soon after to Hail, and then to a settled cold Rain. Mer. 28 at Night. 13. Morning Snowing and abt. 3 inches deep. Wind at No. Et., and Mer. at 30, contg. Snowing till 1 O'clock, and abt. 4 it became perfectly clear. Wind in the same place but not hard. Mer. 28 at Night." These are no doubt the last words Washington wrote.

The passing of this great soul has been described by Tobias Lear, who says that, although Washington himself had been in the saddle in the storm most of Thursday the twelfth, on the evening of which he was stricken with his last illness, he considered the weather too bad to send his servant to the post office. "Between 2 and 3 o'clock on Saturday morning he awoke Mrs. Washington and told her he was very unwell, and had had an ague. She would . . . have got up to call a servant; but he would not permit her lest she should take cold." He lay nearly four hours in a chill in a cold bedroom before anything was done or a fire lighted. When on his death bed, Washington said to Mr. Lear:

"I am afraid I shall fatigue you too much; . . . it is a debt we must pay to each other, and I hope, when you want aid of this kind you will find it." He motioned to his attendant, Christopher, who had been standing, to take a seat by his bedside. Washington's patience, fortitude, and resignation never forsook him for a moment. He said: "I am not afraid to die, and therefore can bear the worst." The clock which was in the death chamber marked the hour 10.20 P. M.

MOUNT VERNON A NATIONAL POSSESSION (1799-1932)

The history of the Mount Vernon Estate, including the tomb of George Washington and Martha Washington, is long and complicated. George Washington left the central part of the estate, including the mansion, to his nephew, Bushrod Washington, who had not the means to keep up such a property and properly to receive the numerous visitors. Twenty years after Washington's death the house and the tomb were falling into decay. Bushrod Washington, in 1829, left the mansion and the surroundings to his nephew, John Augustine Washington, a son of Corbin Washington. Thence it passed to John Augustine's widow and to her son, the second John Augustine Washington.

This story of neglect and decay would be sad enough if it did not lead up to the saving of Mount Vernon by the insistence of one woman, Ann Pamela Cunningham, of South Carolina. In 1853 she began to agitate for a federal society of women to take over and preserve the estate as a national shrine. What was then the immense sum of $200,000 was raised for the purchase of the mansion and the two hundred acres surrounding it. February 22, 1860, the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association, which became the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association of the Union, took possession of the estate. The history of that Association and its skillful and patriotic management of the Mount Vernon estate is a part of the long story of the association of the Washingtons with that estate. From 1674 to the present day, more than two hundred and fifty years, Mount Vernon has been a part of the history of the Washington family and hence of the history of the nation.

Washington the Business Man

By Hon. Sol Bloom

Part I

Conditions of Colonial Business

GEORGE WASHINGTON

From a painting by Gilbert Stuart

THE BUSINESS MIND

EVIDENCE accumulated in this set of Washington Pamphlets confirms the national belief that George Washington was the most successful American of his century. General testimony proves that he was so held, and posterity calls him a great man of the world. Nearly all of these favorable judgments, however, relate either to Washington as a soldier, or to Washington as a statesman. Americans are only now beginning to realize that the same qualities that made him indispensable as head of the Continental Army and the necessary choice as first President of the United States of America, made him also a remarkable man of affairs in the colonies and the federal republic. A study of his interest in many lines of business and his success in most of them, will therefore bring out his unusual abilities as a practical modern spirit without diminishing his greatness as a public man.

COLONIAL ECONOMICS

The circumstances of practical life in America in the eighteenth century were very different from those of later times. It might be said that Washington crossed an economic bridge; for business conditions radically changed in his half century of active life; and at the time of his death the modern era of commerce and manufacturing was beginning.

In the South, and in considerable areas of occupied territory in other parts of the colonies in Washington's time, no roads existed in the modern sense. The usual highways were beaten tracks with many fords and few bridges. Washington lived to see the beginnings of the planked or surfaced turnpikes, which were the predecessors of our modern highways. Navigation in that period was confined to sailing craft, which for ocean travel averaged less than 200 tons late in Washington's life. Washington was one of the first men to realize the possibilities of power boats. Down to the Revolution, in America as in Europe, nearly all manufactured goods were made by hand in private houses or small shops. Such manufactures were carried on at Mount Vernon. About the time of Washington's death began the period of factories using water power on a considerable scale to move machines.

Washington was in early life accustomed to very primitive methods of finance, which consisted chiefly in the accounts kept by his agents in England, and the bills of exchange drawn on them, with an occasional local loan. We shall see that he lived to be head of a joint stock enterprise and a stockholder in banks, and helped to inaugurate the first national banking system. His success as a business man, therefore, must be placed against the background of his own times and the business methods of an early community. He began life as a cadet of a planter family; began to accumulate property before he was of age; and made himself a successful business man by sterling honesty, by force of character, by forward-looking judgment, by capacity to grasp facts and control conditions.

Down to 1775 the business element in most of the colonies, especially in the South, was overshadowed by the landholder. In New England and the middle colonies merchants or shipowners, such as John Hancock, might aspire to enter a high social class of recognized families, and to be a power in the government of their colonies. Some of them founded permanent hereditary fortunes. In Washington's part of the country there were few wealthy men except the large landowners into whose fellowship Washington was born. To be sure a small class of wealthy merchants and shipowners was growing up even in some of the southern ports, particularly Charleston and Savannah, but most of the holders of large wealth owned inherited acres and formed a landed aristocracy. One reason for the success of the great Revolutionary movement was that the Virginia planters mostly joined the democratic movement for independence. In the Revolution, therefore, Washington was politically on the same side as his immediate friends and neighbors. Yet he had the force to win the confidence of the canny merchant classes of New England and the middle colonies.

DESCENT FROM BUSINESS MEN

According to modern doctrines of heredity the business sagacity of Washington was presumably in part a matter of descent. In his direct line, father to son, seven generations back, appeared Lawrence Washington, mayor of Northampton, England. Lawrence Washington's father had married Margaret Kitson, sister of the great Sir Thomas Kitson, who was a kind of Henry Ford of his time. Kitson developed a great and profitable business in fish; and hence his arms bear three fish. He also developed a large business in wool, with the intention of furnishing the raw material on English soil and encouraging its weaving into cloth of English style.

Kitson's nephew, Lawrence, mayor of Northampton, acquired in 1538 by royal grant (not without payment of smart fees) a portion of the recently confiscated landed estates of the Priory of St. Andrew in Northampton, which were sequestered by Henry VIII. Among them was the estate of Sulgrave, which for some years was the seat of George Washington's direct ancestors. His great-grandfather, the immigrant John, also showed remarkable ability, became a sailor and a trader and made voyages to the West Indies and eventually Virginia. His sons and grandsons acquired considerable estates and George, through the early death of his halfbrother, Lawrence, came into possession of a handsome portion of his father's landed property. From his youth up therefore Washington associated with men who had wealth, increased it, and transmitted it. Fortune favored George Washington. It placed in his hands large opportunities of testing his talents of organization, supervision, record, and willingness to try new methods.

CUSTIS WEALTH

Washington's business capacity was evident long before the Revolution and in the first stages of the accumulation that made him one of the wealthiest Americans of his time, at least in land values, he was aided by his marriage. When nearly 27 years old he married a wealthy woman, heir, with her two children, to the property of the deceased Daniel Parke Custis, embracing plantations, a town house, slaves, livestock, and household and farm equipment, besides more liquid resources. The Custis wealth has perhaps been overestimated, but the portion of it in funds which came to Washington as part of his wife's dower, was evidently the means by which he began to enlarge his land holdings at Mount Vernon and elsewhere. Throughout his life his income came chiefly from the returns of his farms and interest on bonds which constituted a large part of the financial business of Virginia at that time. These returns were the basic capital of his other business ventures.

The records of the Custis estate are no longer available, but according to an entry under probable date of 1759, each of the two children had about $33,000, and it has been supposed that Mrs. Washington's share was the same. Evidently this did not include the landed property. Washington's letters to his agents in England refer to the division of the estate. He informed an agent in 1762 that the Bank of England stock of a par value of £1,650 had been allocated to Patsy. There is no evidence in the writings of any investment abroad except this bank stock, or of any tobacco being shipped on Patsy's account. In the absence of exact figures it seems likely that there was no division of the estate into equal thirds of personal and real property, but it has been estimated that Washington's eventual share, as his wife's third in the estate, was about $100,000 measured by the specie standard of the time. He was a prudent administrator and the value of his wards' estates, as well as his own, increased in his hands.

Washington's Business Records

BOOKKEEPING SYSTEM

Washington had a neat and methodical mind; he was an early example of economic efficiency. He recognized the value of records, and to that recognition we owe the great body of material available upon his career and its share in the history of the country. This bent of mind was shown as early as 1748, when he began to keep an expense account and in the early establishment of the diary habit. Washington's account books are valuable not only as a personal record, but also as source material for economic study.

Rigorous commercial bookkeeping, like that of today, was not one of the accomplishments of the colonial Americans. Even heavy merchants like John Hancock were satisfied with direct records. The so-called Italian system of double-entry bookkeeping appears to have been little known in the colonies. There were no banks, few insurance companies, very few commercial corporations; and, notwithstanding a very extensive credit system, both wholesale and retail, the usual books of account were simple.

Washington's strong sense of system enabled him to summarize his yearly financial condition, though it does not appear that he classified his minor expenses with absolute exactness. He kept an elaborate system of classified accounts for his farm activities; and tobacco, weaving, fishing, and other definite industries were debited and credited in separate accounts, as illustrated by the table given herewith.

Washington carried out a simple but effective system of records of all cash transactions and was very careful to obtain legal documents for payments made by him. He never "kept books" in the modern sense, but throughout his life, besides many financial entries in his diaries, he kept a series of little books of original entry of cash transactions, later transferred to the ledgers, which reveal his habits of life. He was a generous man and his books abound in such entries as the following:

"By Cash gave a Soldiers wife 5/;" "Gave a man who had his House Burnt £1.;" "By a begging woman /5;" "By Charity to an invalid wounded Soldier who came from Redston with a petition for Charity 18/;" "Delivd to the President to send to two distress'd french women at Newcastle $25;" "By Madame de Seguer a french Lady in distress gave her $50;" "By subscription paid to Mr. Jas. Blythe towards erecting and Supporting an Academy in the State of Kentucky $100;" "By Charity sent Genl Charles Pinckney in Columbus Bank Notes, for the sufferers by the fire in Charleston So. Carolina $300;" "By an annual Donation to the Academy at Alexandria pd. Dr. Cook $166.67;" "By Charity to the poor of Alexandria deld. to the revd. Dr. Muir $100."

He was particularly regardful of the members of his own family, and he recorded various loans to his kindred, which were eventually transferred into gifts. The diary accounts of his visits to his mother at Fredericksburg are often paralleled by an expense account showing that he presented her with money. He never denied a loan to a friend if he had the cash on hand. There is no end to these minor entries of occasional expense for a multitude of purposes, which bring into relief a daily life of great variety of interests and amusements.

ILLUSTRATIVE ENTRIES

This variety of Washington's payments and the minuteness of his accounts may be illustrated by a few extracts from his ledgers and diaries. For example: "By a year's and 3 Months Ferriage at ye lower Ferry on Rappaoppe [Rappahanock], my Mothers. 12s. 6d." "To my Burgesses Wages untill the adjournment in Octr. Sessions—viz 54 days @ 15/ £40.10." "To 12 traveling days—to and from Do, @ . . . Do. £9." "To Ferriages going and coming over Occoquan, Rappahannock and Pamunky £1.17.9." "Dancing Master—Mackay for Childn. £1." "To washing while Quartered in Alexandria £1.13.3." "To gave away at Edward Thompson's 3/9."

"By a Chr. [chariot] bot. of Mr. P. Claiborne Mr. Braxton's £50." "Surgn. Dentist £4.0.0." "By Dinners & Clubs thereat, at Mrs. Campbell's during my stay in Willmsburg £7.7.6." "By Mrs. Charltons Acct. against Miss Custis 16s. 3d. By Ditto for Mrs. Washington. 16s. 0d. By Ditto for my board there since the 1st of March. £11.0.0." "Mr. Robinson's Servants £1.4.0." "By Ditto for a Ticket to ye Assembly 7/6." "By Cash to my Nurse £1.0.0." This last was the soldier who attended him in the illness just before Braddock's defeat.

Almost the only knowledge that we have of his journey to Boston in 1756 comes from his account books, which disclose the route as well as evidence of his social activities.

February 15-20. New York City.

"By Cash for my Club at Tavn. 5/1. for treatg. Ladies to ye Mi[crocos]m £1.8.0. At Mrs. Baron's Rout 6/ Club at Willets 4/2 . . . treating Ladies to ye Microcosm £1.4.0 . . . Mr. Robinson's Servts. £1.8.6 . . . lost at cards 8/. Gave to Servants on ye Rd. 10/."

His election expenses in 1771 at Alexandria are also enlightening:

"Went up to the Election and the Ball I had given at Alexa. Mr. Crawford and Jno. P. Custis with me. Stayd all Night."

"Dec. 19 By Mr. Arroll Balle. of Acct. to this date £ 15 12—

By Mr. Piper's Charles playg. Fiddle 12.

1772, May 18. 'By Mrs. Young for cakes at ye last Electn. £ 1. 9. 8.'"

Lotteries were a regular occurrence in those days, many of them for religious and educational purposes. Washington took his share of such chances and records the result, often with dry humor. In 1766 he "invested" in the York Lottery; and in 1775 two of the six tickets he held in the land lottery in Ulster County, New York, were "fortunate." He recorded another transaction as "By profit & loss in two chances in raffling for encyclopadia Britannica, which I did not win, 1£ 4 shillings."

His diaries and cash books are full of entertaining out-goes. "To ye Club of a bottle of Rhenish at Mitchells 1£ 3 shillings."—"By Ball[ance] I never expected 2. 5. 2." "I got Nation's Estate Appraised by Messrs. McCarty, Barry and Triplet,—as follows, viz.

1 Suit of Cloaths, viz.

On the last day of 1769 he noted: "By Cash lost, Stolen, or paid away without charging £143.15.2." What looks like a very unhumanitarian entry refers not to a man but to a weapon: "To Cash paid Mr. Lewis for a Baby and 2 doz. Gun Flints 5/."

A class of expenditures of which there were several during his life, is the following in 1772:

"By Mr. Peale Painter,

Mrs. Washingt. £13.
Ditto Do. for Miss
Custis 13.

ANALYTICAL ACCOUNTS

These simple records enabled him to judge whether a particular commercial transaction or product was profitable. Hence he was one of the earliest Virginia planters to realize that tobacco was an exhausting and, therefore, an unprofitable crop. He finally abandoned it entirely at the Mount Vernon farms and substituted the cultivation of other crops, particularly wheat. An example of the accounts of the special industries already mentioned are pictured in a general statement for the whole Mount Vernon estate, as in the form, item by item, shown in the following extract from his books:

"BALANCE OF GAIN AND LOSS, 1798.

Thus in one direction Washington adopted a method of financial records little practiced then on a large scale even among prosperous merchants. He developed an analytic book-keeping system with regard to his great landed estate. His habit (not carried out every year) of keeping his accounts so that he could distinguish payments and receipts from each of the farms that together constituted Mount Vernon, enabled him to record the crops that were planted in each of these subdivisions and to follow out the results for each crop on each of the associated farms. This practice gave him a control possessed by few planters over the causes of loss on a particular crop, or on a particular plantation, and recorded gains on another. Hence he knew where to stop and where to go forward. He substituted a rational, understandable record for the guesses and repetitions of unprofitable methods which were often the bases of farm methods of planters.

BUSINESS INCOME

In provincial days at least, his financial system was essentially one of English accounts, long credit, orders against his presumed balance, and bills of exchange. Even after he ceased shipping tobacco to Europe and sent flour and fish to the West Indies instead, payment was in orders or bills on England. It is not easy under such conditions to suppose that he possessed much ready money, yet the items given above from his accounts suggest the presence of an adequate cash balance, and a very characteristic entry of 1772 reproduced in facsimile on the next page shows that he sometimes had considerable amounts of cash on hand, including a variety of colonial paper money.

Naturally the question arises as to what were the sources of supply for the payment of his bills and for his ready cash? First in importance came his farms. No summary has been found of his total investments in land purchases or buildings or betterments of the property previous to his will of 1799. Even as late as that date it is probable that, in spite of large holdings, almost all the income came from Mount Vernon and a few other places east of the Alleghenies. The York River dower property had been sold; but there were some 8,000 other acres in Virginia and Maryland, a portion of which was under cultivation. He had an uncertain income from his fisheries adjacent to his property and from a ferry. The Dismal Swamp drainage enterprise seems to have brought him a profit in his lifetime; and some unsold lands in that property were a part of his estate at his death. He sold land from time to time and a portion of the proceeds paid debts or current expenses.

He held some bonds though evidently none at the end of his life, except the federal issue mentioned below. Occasionally he

Besides this federal stock at the end of his life he held shares in the Potomac Company, in the James River Company, and in the Columbia and Alexandria banks. The river-improvement stock brought him personally no income, that of the Potomac was a dead loss to the estate. The bank holdings were small, and belonged to the late period of his life.

Government, perhaps because, as Prussing suggests, he was not an alien enemy but only a rebel, probably because the stock was not in his name on the books of the bank, but in that of his wife as administratrix. The English agents collected the dividends during the war, placed them to Washington's account and charged against them the interest due through Washington's unfavorable balance, but also credited interest on the assets in their hands, which were chiefly Custis items. After the war Washington sold the stock and paid his "British debt."

OTHER PEOPLE'S AFFAIRS

Washington's business acumen was not limited in its practice to his own affairs, nor to the guardianship of his wife's children. He gave freely of his time and knowledge to his neighbors and friends; and before the Revolution shared as executor in the management of various estates, and served also as arbitrator in property disputes. In stating the difficulties in granting the request that he undertake the guardianship of John West's son, Washington wrote in 1775: "... two things are essentially necessary in the Man to whom this charge is committed. A Capacity of judging with propriety, of Measures proper to be taken in the Government of a youth; and leisure sufficient to attend the Execution of these Measures. That you are pleased to think favorably of me, in respect to the first, I shall take for granted, from the request you have made, but to shew my incapacity of attending to the latter with that good faith which I think every man ought to do, who undertakes a trust of this Interesting nature, I can solemnly declare to you, that for this year or two past, there has been scarce a Moment that I can properly call my own: For what with my own business, my present Wards, My Mothers (which is wholly in my hands), Colo. Colvills, Mrs. Savages, Col. Fairfax's, Colo. Mercers (for Colo. Tayloe though he accepted of the Trust jointly with myself, seems no ways inclined to take any part of the Execution of it), and the little Assistance I have undertaken to give in the management of my Brother Augustines Affairs (for I have absolutely refused to qualify as an Executor) keeps me, together with the share I take in publick Affairs, constantly engaged in writing Letters, Settling Accts., and Negotiating one piece of business or another in behalf of one or other of these Concerns; by which means I have really been deprivid of every kind of enjoyment, and had almost fully resolved, to engage in no fresh matter, till I had entirely wound up the old."

On January 25, 1771, he spoke of being at Dumfries "in a very disagreeable arbitration which I suppose will keep me till sometime in next week." These affairs gave him much trouble, but he considered them with the same care that he did his own business. An evidence of this is in an entry in his made loans on mortgages or otherwise, but if one may judge correctly from his writings these were more fruitful of trouble than income, resulting in some cases in his taking over the land or chattel. His loans were never those of a professional money lender, but he could be sharp when he considered that the condition justified it. Thus in 1799 he wrote a debtor: "I am in extreme want of the money which you gave me a solemn promise I should receive the first of January last; and secondly—that however you may have succeeded in imposing upon, and deceiving others, you shall not practice the like game with me with impunity."

Like all moneyed men of his time, he suffered very severe losses through the depreciation of paper, so that a nominal $50,000 of loans made in Virginia colonial currency when realized sank to a capital of about $6,000 in federal bonds.

BANK OF ENGLAND STOCK

His most interesting investment was the £1650 in stock of the Bank of England. As we have seen this was a portion of the Custis estate, allocated to Patsy. On her death in 1773 it was equally divided between her brother and mother; Washington's share of the dividend during the next two years was collected by his English agent and made a portion of the general accounts, of which the balance was usually against Washington. After the Revolution broke out, and the guardianship of young Custis terminated, Washington took over the rest of the bank stock in order that all of the loss due to the rebellion might fall upon himself. It is a striking tribute to the Governor and Company of the Bank of England that they continued to pay dividends after Washington had become a public enemy of the British diary, January 8, 1772, respecting his joint executorship in the Savage matter:

"Engaged to advance by, or at the April General Court for the use of Mr. Bryan Fairfax £150, or thereabouts, to discharge the Balle of his Bond to Doctr. Savage. Also promised, if I could, to take up a Bill of Excha. of about £160 Sterg. with Intt. thereon at the same time; In consideration of which he has given me a Memm. at the

The Promoter and Planter

FAMILY EXPERIENCE

The first established permanent business of the Washington family was that of clearing Virginia land until sufficient soil could be exposed to make crops possible, particularly tobacco, the great export crop for many years. After tobacco culture was prohibited in England in 1652, it became almost a monopoly product in the southern colonies.

John Washington and his sons, grandsons, and great-grandsons undertook the never-ending process of clearing the land. That meant the destruction of vast and noble forests, little or no part of which could be exported. Some of this was used in building houses, fences, and shelters for stock. Eventually the native timber furnished part of the material of spacious mansions, suggested by the "great houses" in England.

Down to the time of Washington's birth, there were no cities in the South and few towns. The commercial towns as they arose were on waters which could be navigated from the sea. For the small planters, especially on tidewater, the store was the sales agency for surplus products, and the nearest approach to a bank, through its credit facilities. The towns of these local stores grew up around the tobacco warehouses built under the colonial inspection act, which regulated the export of the staple. Alexandria and Dumfries originated in this manner. Washington's letters refer to the inspection: "I have got 4 more inspected and all on Float ready to deliver at the Ships side"; and again, "It will appear by our Inspectors that my Tobacco was delivered in good order."

Washington bought from local stores, sometimes paying cash, and also bought on book accounts, settled from time to time. In a letter to Matthew Campbell, a merchant at Alexandria, August 7, 1772, Washington showed his attitude on patronizing his neighbor: "I was not lead to enquire into the price of the Goods I had purchased of you already, and might hereafter take from any thing that passed between us at the time I offered to discontinue my own Importations (upon Condition I could get my Goods at nearly what they would cost to Import them myself). I very well remember that nothing conclusive passd between you and me on that occasion; . . . If . . . you still think proper to let me have the Goods I may find occasion to buy in the Country at 25 pr. Ct. Sterling advance upon the genuine Cost dischargeable at the Curr'y exchange I will confine my whole Country dealings to your Store and will endeavour to thro the Wages which I pay to hirelings into your hands also; provided you will let me know upon what certain reasonable advance they can have their Goods (upon the strength of my Credit) for unless they can deal with you upon better terms than with others I should not think myself justifiable in attempting to influence their choice, and this knowledge I must come at in order that I may convince them (if satisfied myself) of the propriety of the Measure."

BUSINESS OF PLANTATION MANAGEMENT

As a man of affairs, Washington's immediate and continuous business was that of managing a plantation. Once settled in Mount Vernon he gradually increased the property so that he had a group of five farms under his ownership and management. The evidence with regard to his management of that large estate is abundant. Upon no agricultural enterprise of the time have we such detailed information as to the plans and the results of Washington's agricultural management. We have his accounts and a correspondence which included many letters on farm affairs.

Probably no agricultural proprietor in the English colonies and the later United States made such efforts to avail himself of the scientific knowledge of his time. He bought numerous English works on agriculture. He was long in correspondence with Arthur Young, the English agricultural reformer. He invented a plow and was not much disturbed when it failed to meet his expectations. He contrived something closely approaching our modern seed drills.

He appears to have been the most important large proprietor to practice scientific diversification of crops. He raised wheat when the land would no longer carry good crops of tobacco, and the marketing of that staple became uneconomic. Then he ran a mill to grind his wheat, and accepted customs grinding. Later he built a distillery to make available his raw materials. In fact, the Mount Vernon property was a sort of confederation of farms with their appurtenances of orchards and farm buildings, farm roads, quarters for the slaves, and houses for the hired white men and the redemptioners or indentured servants bound to serve a stipulated number of years in payment of their passage money from Europe. Besides his main estate he had some outside farm properties, especially the Bullskin Plantation, and during ante-bellum days the dower estate on York River.

But Mount Vernon was his home, his main source of revenue, and his chief delight. There, also, his engineering instincts had full opportunity of action, for he was frequently out with his surveying instruments estimating drainage possibilities, running his boundary lines over again, or checking up those of newly acquired land. On the border line between one of his plantations and that of Thomson Mason can still be seen two parallel lines of ditching about fifteen yards apart. These—referred to in his will—are said to mark an amicable controversy between the two neighbors. By mutual agreement each dug a ditch five feet wide on what he supposed to be the proper line. The space between remained a "no man's land," left to be adjusted by the heirs of the parties.

When the Revolutionary War broke out, Washington had brought the Mount Vernon estate into a productive and profitable condition. But from 1775 to 1783, and again from 1789 to 1797, he spent most of his time away from his estates and was obliged to depend upon overseers and estate managers. His experience of those men is summed up in a paragraph written in 1793 in one of the many letters of instruction which he wrote during his presidency to the successive managers of his estate:

"To treat them civilly is no more than what all men are entitled to, but, my advice to you is, to keep them at a proper distance; for they will grow upon familiarity, in proportion as you will sink in authority, if you do not.—Pass by no faults or neglects (especially at first) for overlooking one only serves to generate another, and it is more than probably that some of them (one in particular) will try, at first, what lengths he may go.—A steady and firm conduct, with an inquisitive inspection into, and a proper arrangement of everything on your part, will, though it may give trouble at first, save a great deal in the end . . ."

One of the main items in the cost of the plantation was the amount of the proprietor's time and attention when he was managing the property himself and the losses due to the stupidity and disobedience of orders by the overseers. The story of the round barn is a comment upon the difficulties of managing overseers. The round barn, which appears to have been actually twelve or possibly sixteen sided, had a threshing floor indoors, and great was Washington's wrath on one occasion to find that the grain had been thrown out of the barn onto the ground and was being trodden out by horses in the old wasteful manner. He wrote his stepson in 1776: "I have no doubt myself, but that middling land under a man's own eye, is more profitable than rich land at a distance."

WASHINGTON AS A BUSINESS FARMER

Washington's agricultural system was in advance of his age though it is questionable whether he had much direct or contemporary influence. The German farmers of Pennsylvania and the Valley followed many of his principles and probably Washington was acquainted with their methods. Land was still too cheap for extensive farming. Jefferson's belief that it was better to exhaust the land and then move on was more in the spirit of the age. But considered in its relation to agricultural history, the Mount Vernon estate was an important project, and even more important as illustrating the character of its cultivator.

The five farms were all under cultivation. He also exercised a remarkable business sagacity in the well-organized system which is emphasized in this pamphlet. He applied to the estate of Mount Vernon the principles of division of labor, of the use of export laborers, of caring for the sick, and in general of making the laborers on the estate comfortable and contented, which are a part of the best factory practice of our own time.

The farsightedness of Farmer Washington was shown by his establishment of what was in effect an agricultural experiment station, perhaps the only one in the United States at his time, as has been shown in the pamphlet on Washington the Farmer; while his system of accounting made it possible to keep track of the financial results of his experiments.

ENGLISH SUPERINTENDENT

One of the most interesting episodes in Washington's relations with labor was his employment of James Bloxham as head farmer of the Mount Vernon complex—a transaction described in another pamphlet of this series. Through Arthur Young, he secured this real English bailiff, and in 1786 brought him over "to live with and superintend my farming business" under the title "Farmer and Manager." In a letter of 1787 Washington complained of Bloxham that: "in a word he seems rather to have expected to have found well organized farms, than that the end and design of my employing him was to make them so." Bloxham, however, was much respected by his employer, who kept him on for several years.

Bloxham's side of the relation appears in a letter much less widely known. A portion of this is given in the earlier pamphlet; in addition he complained: "things are verey Desagreable to Do Bisness it is impossible for any man to Do Bisness in any form the Genral have a Bout 25 hundrd akers of Clear Land under is on ocyping. LABOR PROBLEMS

Throughout his life, Washington was the head of large organizations which made use of human strength of body and mind. The owner of a plantation was in much the same situation as the captain of a ship at sea. The object of the sailor driver and of the plantation driver alike was to get as much as possible of muscular exertion out of the workers at the least cost of support. The shipmaster had to pay wages besides feeding and keeping up his men. The plantation owner nominally got his labor without paying wages; but after he had fed and clothed the slaves, provided for their housing, and suffered from deaths and illness, immaturity and age, malingering and runaways, his labor was really costly. A profit came to the slave owners through the growing up of young slaves to the point where they could be worked or marketed; but much of that gain was offset.

Washington hired employees for various tasks on the farm. His numerous building operations and repairs brought in skilled white workmen. In his diary he notes that "Three Carpenters belonging to the Estate of Colo. Steptoe (hired of Jas. Hardige Lane) at £7 pr. Month) come to work here." He had a succession of overseers or managers on the York River farms and those on the Rappahannock. In 1773 he wrote: "This day agreed with my Overseer [William] Powell, at the lower Plantation on Rappah., to continue another year on the same lay as the last, provided the number of hands are not Increasd; but, if I should add a hand or two more, and let him (as I am to do at any rate) choose 5 of the best Horses at that Quarter and the upper one, he is in that case to receive only the 8th of what Corn, Wheat, and Tobo. he makes on the Plantation."

WHITE REDEMPTIONERS

Throughout the eighteenth century a traffic in what was practically white slavery went on, especially in the middle colonies and Virginia. Normally the immigrants agreed that for their passage over from Europe they were liable to give service for seven years to anyone who would pay their passage money. Those who survived the horrors of the voyage and the chattel service, founded families. Washington had such white servants among his laborers, mostly artisans. In 1775 he offered a reward of forty dollars for the return of a joiner and brickmaker who had run away.

With regard to an importation from Germany, he wrote in 1784: "I am informed that a ship with Palatines is gone up to Baltimore, among whom are a number of tradesmen. I am a good deal in want of a house joiner and brick-layer who really understand their profession, and you would do me a favor by purchasing one of each for me, if to be had, I would not confine you to Palatines; if they are good workmen, they may be from Asia, Africa or Europe; they may be Mahometans, Jews or Christians of any sect, or they may be Atheists. I would, however, prefer middle aged to young men, and those who have good countenances, and good characters on ship board, to others who have neither of these to recommend them; altho' after all, I well know, the proof of the pudding must be in the eating. I do not limit you to a price, but will pay the purchase money on demand."

SLAVE LABOR

Washington was born into a slave-owning family and early became the owner of slaves, who were the "Desagrecable People" of Bloxham's letter. Slave holding began with the enslavement of Indian captives by the various colonies, was shortly simplified by the bringing over of African slaves, and was legal in Virginia for more than sixty years after Washington's death.

The profits of Mount Vernon, never very large, were due chiefly to slave labor; but Washington was one of the small number of southern slave holders at that time who felt that slavery was an unnatural institution. There were few antislavery men and women in the United States in 1799; but that one who lived in Mount Vernon tested his convictions in his will by ordering that the slaves held in his own right should be set free after Mrs. Washington's death. The dower slaves were on a different footing. He left money for annuities to slaves who could not support themselves, some of which continued for nearly forty years. George Washington and John Randolph were among the few blueblood Virginians holding large numbers of slaves who at any epoch hated slavery sufficiently to free their own slaves, by will or otherwise.

We possess no account of a large slave-holding plantation of the period which compares in completeness with our knowledge of Washington's slaves. His diaries and accounts contain a vast amount of detail, both with regard to particular slaves and to the general condition of his slaves. The total number on the five Mount Vernon farms seem never to have exceeded about two hundred and fifty, man, woman, and child, though William Loughton Smith in his journal of a visit to Mount Vernon in 1791 wrote: "he owns 300 slaves, about 150 or 160 workers"; and since Washington was not in the habit of selling slaves in order to raise money, the number of children, old people, and poor workers proportionately increased. On few plantations were the hands so well treated as on the Mount Vernon property. They were as well fed as any slaves of the time. There is next to nothing in the diaries about the punishment of slaves and much about the expense of medical attendance.

OPINION ON EMANCIPATION

Washington was early aware that slave labor was costly and otherwise questionable, and he did not later alter his opinion. In 1767 he wrote: "God knows I have losses enough in Negroes to require something where with to supply their places." Also in 1794 he wrote to Alexander Spotswood: "Were it not then, that I am principled against selling negroes, as you would do cattle at a market, I would not in twelve months from this date, be possessed of one as a slave. I shall be happily mistaken, if they are not found to be very troublesome species of property ere many years pass over our heads—(but this by the bye)." Yet whatever profit there was out of Mount Vernon was the outcome, under efficient management, of slave labor; and as Washington's possession of funds depended chiefly upon successful agriculture it is probable that even during his absences, when his oversight was indirect, the balance was not usually unfavorable.

Washington in 1790 recorded a conversation with "a Mr. Warner Mifflin, one of the People called Quakers; active in pursuit of the Measures laid before Congress for emancipating the Slaves: . . . he used arguments to show the immorality—injustice—and impolicy of keeping these people in a state of Slavery; with declarations, however, that he did not wish for more than a gradual abolition, or to see any infraction of the Constitution to effect it. To these I replied, that as it was a matter which might come before me for official decision I was not inclined to express any sentiments on the merits of the question before this should happen." This reply was probably the caution of the official rather than the sentiments of the man, though the only legislation during his administrations upon slavery was the fugitive law of 1793, and the act of 1794 to prohibit the export of slaves.

PRINCIPLES AS EMPLOYER

His labor questions were not confined to farming. They occurred in connection with the engineering projects, and were not absent from the problems of higher class employees. In reference to the workmen of the Potomac Navigation Company, Washington wrote: "We are endeavoring to engage our miners to bore by the foot; rather than by the day; but as yet have not agreed with any in this way:—they ask a shilling, which we think is too much—to common labourers we pay 40/ per month; and we find paying the workmen every fortnight, rather troublesome—once a month would do better:—as they will be frequently moving, we have provided Tents as most convenient & least expensive, for their accommodation."

Washington was precise in his statements of the needed qualifications of his secretary as shown in his letter to Tench Tilghman on June 2, 1785, and in informing General Lincoln on February 6, 1786, as to the duties of Tobias Lear. He wrote in 1776 concerning the merits of a possible military secretary: "What kind of a hand he writes, I know not. I believe but a cramped one; latterly none at all, as he has either the gout, or rheumatism, or both. He is a man fond of company and gayety, and is of a tender constitution. Whether, therefore, such a person would answer your purpose as well as a plodding, methodical person, whose sole business should be to arrange his papers in such order as to produce any one at any instant it is called for, and capable at the same time of composing a letter, is what you have to consider."

As President he was called upon to fill all the newly created offices in accordance with his avowal that "three things, in my opinion, ought principally to be regarded, namely, the fitness of characters to fill offices, the comparative claims from the former merits and sufferings in service of the different candidates, and the distribution of appointments in as equal a proportion as might be to persons belonging to the different States in the Union. . . . Besides, I thought, whatever the effect might be in pleasing or displeasing any individuals at the present moment, a due concern for my own reputation, not less decisively than a sacred regard to the interests of the community, required, that I should hold myself absolutely at liberty to act, while in office, with a sole reference to justice and the public good."

THE PLANTER AND THE ENGLISH AGENTS

In Washington's early life there was a lively commerce with the mother country and a system of credit business into which the Washington family entered. This trade system had a political side. It was one of the means of keeping the colonists aware of their dependence upon the mother country. The new republic, when formed and at peace with the world, resumed relations with England, but the latter stood now upon an equal political footing with the rival commercial interests of France and Holland and Spain, and the commercial readjustment was one of the first serious problems of Washington's administration as first President.

Washington's main commercial and business relation with England was with the firm which had previously served the Custis family. These "factors" for many years were the firm of Robert Cary & Company in London, later transformed into Wakelin Welch. He also did business occasionally with other English firms. He practiced the Virginia method of shipping produce to them, sometimes in vessels direct from his wharf to England, as payment for goods of various kinds shipped or to be shipped to Virginia. Naturally shrewd and hard-headed, Washington more than his neighbors chafed under this arrangement, the result of which seemed to be that the debits against him were always overrunning the credits, though the normal factor of percentage was not unreasonable. After the Revolution, Washington's direct purchases in England were only incidental, though some of his luxuries must still have been of foreign production.

OVERSEAS TRADE RELATIONS

Reading the letters Washington wrote his agents before the Revolution makes it evident that the chief responsibility for poor results in this system lay upon the agents and the shipmasters. Washington soon after his marriage wrote Cary the following warning: "I shall be candid in telling you that duty to the Charge with which I am entrusted as well as self Interest will incline me to abide by those who gives the greatest proof of their Abilities in selling my own and the Estates Tobo. and purchasing Our Goods which I can no otherwise judge of than by the Accts. that will be render'd."

Throughout the succeeding years there were many complaints of captains who failed to appear and were otherwise very erratic, of tobacco damaged in transit, of unaccountably low prices for the staple and unreasonably high prices for goods sent in return. These goods, not seldom landed at inconvenient ports or delayed beyond excuse, were often poor in quality, incomplete, misfits, unfit for their purpose, or downright dishonest.

He also complained of lack of reciprocity on the part of the agents, writing in 1764: "I did not expect that a correspondant so steady, and constant as I have proved, and was willing to have continued to your House while the advantages were in any degree reciprocal would be reminded in the Instant it was discovered how necessary it was for him to be expeditious in his payments." A further hurt was recorded in 1768: "... unless the Sales with you are high, we shall be a considerable looser by adhering to our usual custom of assisting your Ships here, this we hope you will endeavour to avoid, and make the advantages reciprocal; at least that we do not suffer by our Attachment to your House."

In the case of a minor agent such conduct caused, in 1774, a quick discharge. "I came to the knowledge of your having noted the Bills . . . for Protest although it since appears by your Acct. that you did afterwards pay them. Your Motives for this piece of conduct surprizing as they seem to me I do not mean to give you the trouble of Accounting for. I was going however upon the first notice of it, to recall my order to Capt'n. Eston; but, as my word was out to him, I did, upon Second thoughts forbare to do this, but now desire that the proceeds of these twelve Hhds of Tobacco so soon as sold, together with the Ballance of Mr. Custis's Acct. be it more or less paid into the hands of Robt. Cary Esq. & Co. who shall be impowered to receive them."

INVOICES AND SHIPMENTS

Washington's letters are full of interesting orders for goods to be sent from England, all the way from babies' dolls to coaches. A few quotations will make clear the nature and extent of this overseas business. When possible Washington was exact and specific in ordering his goods, as is shown by this detailed extract from his early accounts:

"Memorandum: To have my Coat made by the following Directions to be made a Frock with a Lapel Breast the Lapel to Contain on each side six Button Holes, and to be about 5 or 6 Inches wide all the way equal and to turn as the Breast of the Coat does to have it made very long Waisted and in Length to come down to or below the Bent of the knee the Waist from the armpit to the Fold to be exactly as long or Longer than from thence to the Bottom not to have more than one fold in the Skirt and the top to be made just to turn in and three Button Holes the Lapel at the top to turn as the Cape of the Coat, and Bottom to Come Parrallel with the Button Holes the Last Button hole in the Breast to be right opposite to the Button on the Hip."

Later in writing for an invoice of clothes, he said: "I want neither Lace nor Embroidery; plain Cloathes with a gold or Silver Button (if worn in genteel Dress) is all I desire."

However, he was an ocean's length from the shops and necessarily many of his orders were left to the decision and taste, and sometimes the honesty, of the dealers. In 1758 he wrote: "I have receiv'd my Goods from the Recovery, and cant help again complaining of the little care taken in the purchase: Besides leaving out one half and the most material half too! of the Articles I sent for, I find the Sein is without Leads, Corks and Ropes which renders it useless; the Crate of Stone ware don't contain a third of the Pieces I am charg'd with, and only two things broke, and everything very high Charg'd."

Various writers have noted the result of his order for busts of Alexander the Great, Julius Caesar, Charles XII of Sweden, Frederick the Great, Prince Eugene, and the Duke of Marlborough; also of two wild beasts. In due time he received a group showing Aeneas bearing his father from Troy, two groups with two statues of Bacchus and Flora, two ornamental vases, and two "Lyons."

His resentment over the quality and fashion of the goods sometimes sent caused some years later the following burst: "It is needless for me to particularise the sorts, quality, or taste I woud choose to have them in unless it is observd; and you may believe me when I tell you that instead of getting things good and fashionable in their several kinds we often have Articles sent Us that could only have been used by our Forefathers in the days of yore. 'Tis a custom, I have some Reason to believe, with many Shop keepers, and Tradesmen in London when they know Goods are bespoke for Exportation to palm sometimes old, and sometimes very slight and indifferent Goods upon Us taking care at the same time to advance 10, 15 or perhaps 20 pr. Ct. upon them. My Packages fr. the Polly Capt'n. Hooper are not yet come to hand, and the Lord only knows when they will without more trouble than they are worth."

These invoices listed many household, personal, and plantation requirements, including clothing for himself and Mrs. Washington—such articles as stays, cloves, and "a very handsome and fashl. Woman's Hg. Saddle with Bridle, and everythg. Comp." After the political clouds began to gather he notified Cary & Co. in 1770 that enclosed orders for merchandise were to be filled if "the Act imposing a Duty upon the Tea, Paper &c, should be totally repeald before the above Goods are Shipd." This was in accordance with the requirements of the Virginia nonimportation agreement of which he was a signer.

MARITIME INTERESTS

Washington was born within a few yards of salt water, and lived most of his life on the Potomac estuary, an artery of overseas trade. About 1746 there may have been a plan (probably upset by the good counsel of an uncle in England) for Washington to go to sea, in the merchant service, or in the navy, presumably as a midshipman. One has only to read the maritime novels of Captain Marryat, born a few years before Washington's death, to learn how miserable was the training and how small the opportunity in the navy. The practical uncle set forth the hardships and slight chances of advancement in the freighters. Washington's only open sea voyage was his early trip to Barbados with his brother Lawrence, in 1751.

Nevertheless Washington was a ship-builder to the extent of constructing a schooner in 1765, at a spot still identifiable at Mount Vernon, to be used for cargoes on the Potomac, and throughout the Chesapeake Bay region. A consignment to the West Indies having been diverted by the shipmaster, Washington found it necessary in the settlement of the matter to buy the seagoing vessel itself: "much against my Inclination, as I had no desire of being Concerned in Shipping; but I was obliged to make the best of a bad Matter." This was in March, 1774, but the later history of the brigantine is not known.

Washington's interest in transportation by water is evident from the earlier section on his exports and his imports. His letters contain the following examples of his shipments and interest in maritime affairs: "Went to Alexandria to see Capt'n. Littledale's Ship Launched, wch. went of extremely well." "Before I left home I shipd 18 Hhds. of my Potomak Tobacco on Board the Bland Capt'n. Hugh Wylie now lying in the Rappahannock River on which please to Insure £140 only."

"Since mine of the 27th. Ulto. Capt. McGachin who will do me the favour to deliver this, and who for several years past has commanded a Convict Ship into this River (a service neither consistent with his Inclinations or Health to perserve in) has expressed a desire of being recommended to the Command of the Ship which you have given us Reasons to expect into Potomack. A Request I do most readily comply with, because a personal acquaintance with Mr. McGachin added to his general good Character enables me to introduce him to you as a Gentleman of known skill, diligence and Integrity." "By Mr. Campbell of Norfolk for sales and Rigg. for my schooner pr. Rect. &ca. £59.4.8." "Imbarkd on board my Schooner for Nomony. Lay of Captn. Laidler's." "Set out from Nomony in my return to Chotanck. Ldgd on board the vessel between Swan Point and Ced[ar] P[oint]." "Came up as high as Hoes ferry and Walk[ed] to my Brother Sam's." "Went to Alexandria after an early dinner to see a ship (the Jenny) Launched, but was disappointed and came home." "Went up again, saw the Ship Launchd; stayd all night to a Ball and set up all Night."

THE FISHERMAN

One of the great advantages of the frontage on the great rivers of Virginia and Maryland was the water privileges. Hunting wild fowl was one of the most obvious pastimes and means of replenishing the larder. Washington made a special drive at the fisheries and built and acquired landings connected with that business. The product helped feed his laborers and he also shipped it salted to the West Indies. An illustration is a diary entry for February, 1770:

"3. Agreed with Mr. Robt. Adam for the Fish catchd at the Fishing Landing I bought of Posey, on the following terms, to wit:

"He is obligd to take all I catch at the place, provided the quantity does not exceed 500 Barls; and will take more than this qty. if he can get cask to put them in. He is to take them as fast as they are catchd, without giving any interruption to my people; and is to have the use of the Fish House for his Salt, fish, &ca., taking care to have the House clear at least before the next Fishing Season.

"In consideration of which he is to pay me Ten pounds for the use of the House; give 3/ a thousd. for the Herrings (Virg. Money) and 8/4 a hundred (Maryland curry.) for the white fish.

"Mr. Piper and Lund Washington present."

THE FERRYMAN

Washington owned a ferry privilege from Dogue Run to Maryland which proved to be an old man of the sea, for being public it had to be operated as required, and it dragged his laborers from their work at inconvenient times. Other reasons for its discontinuance appear in a petition to the General Assembly dated October 10, 1790. Some extracts from this may serve as an example of Washington's habit of setting down exact details:

"That in the year 1753 a Ferry from the land of John Posey of Fairfax County to the land of Thomas Marshall of Maryland, was established by law.— That the land of the said Posey and the Ferry thereunto belonging hath since become the property of the said George Washington, and the latter being exceedingly inconvenient to him the said George Washington, the discontinuance of it is earnestly prayed for.

"As evidence of the reasonableness of this petition, it is humbly and truly stated, that, however convenient this Ferry may have been to travellers and however productive to the owner in the early stages of its existence it is far from being the case at present: the income of it having decreased from more than a hundred (which your Petitioner is informed it has yielded) to less than thirty five pounds per Annum . . . That the said Ferry being more than a mile wide, and much exposed to the NE. and So. W. winds, it requires large and expensive Boats to render the passage safe; and a tender (the landing being shoal) to avoid wading in the cold weather.—That the N. W. winds blowing at this place directly from the Virginia to the Maryland shore, and the banks of the former being high, Passengers are often deceived by the apparent smoothness of the water on the hither side, and will cross contrary to the remonstrances of the ferryman. . . .

"But the greatest grievance of all and which will be most severely felt by the proprietor is the public Roads which this Ferry occasions through a Neck of upwards of 6000 acres of land; the whole of which now being the property of the said George Washington will this fall (on the land side) be under a five feet ditch with a strong Post and Rail fence of six miles in length as may be seen by the plan annexed; laid down from actual Survey and exhibited to show how inadequate the emoluments of the Ferry is to the injury that will be sustained by Roads, which must if continued make the land a common."

THE LUMBERMAN

Every Virginia planter was confronted by the wearing out of lands and the consequent necessity of clearing new areas of virgin forest in order to keep up tillage. A good part of the timber involved was simply rolled up and burned where it lay. Washington had timber on his Mount Vernon plantation, some of which he used in his building operations. There is no distinct record of a sawmill on the place, although there is frequent reference to timber and shingles and other building materials which appear to have come from the place.

Extensive lumber operations chiefly in shingles were a part of the Dismal Swamp development, discussed in their engineering aspects in the pamphlet on Washington as an Engineer and City Builder. The enterprise hung fire; but Washington's interest in it was shown in his will. It appears to have been one of the capital investments in which Washington was the head of the business for other people. His other lands gained value without application of capital. The Dismal Swamp Company was at once a first-class company proposition and a joint stock venture with several participants and Washington as leader.

DOMESTIC MANUFACTURE

More cotton was imported than exported before the Revolution, and though the sizable import was for the most part made into cloth, this was a domestic process until after the war. Washington's technical interest extended to the manufacture of cloth, and in his journeys, especially the New England one in 1789, he visited the newly established factories, and recorded his impressions in the diaries as noticed later. That he made no recorded attempt to build up a cotton factory interest in the South is not strange. It was not till a century after he died that the South developed cotton mills with native white labor.

On his own plantation he made some cloths, producing in 1768 about 1,300 yards of linen, woollen, and cotton goods. He mentions as this product "striped woollen, woollen plaided, cotton striped, linen, wool-birdseye, cotton filled with wool, linsey, M's and O.'s, cotton-India dimity, cotton jump stripe, linen filled with tow, cotton striped with silk, Roman M., Janes twilled, huccabac, broadcloth, counterpain, birdseye, diaper, Kirsey wool, barragon, fustian, bed-ticking, herringbox, and shalloon." The estate also had its own shoemaker, though there are many items for fine shoes for the family in his antebellum invoices. Cloth as well as clothing was ordered from abroad for domestic making for the family, and there are orders for cloth and clothing for slaves; probably most of these were for the house servants or else for the slaves on the York River plantation. The same is true of hosiery.

Part IV

The Business Organizer

THE LANDED PROPRIETOR

No part of Washington's abundant business life is more interesting than his acquirement of real estate, the taste for which began while he was a lad surveying Lord Fairfax's land, and lasted to a short time before his death. Washington always had the landed proprietor's restless desire to buy the next farm alongside and thus round out his property. At the time of his death, besides the Mount Vernon estate he held about 6,500 acres within the settled portion of Virginia, and 1,100 acres in Maryland, and also 234 acres in the Great Meadows of Pennsylvania, at that time remote from the frontier line. Various other pieces of property, such as that on the Rappahannock which he inherited and the York River estate which his wife brought him, had been disposed of.

Washington had a small interest in city real estate, particularly the rest house that he erected in Alexandria and the two brick dwellings that he constructed in the new city of Washington. Also he built a small house at Bath as a kind of summer place.

WASHINGTON AND THE WEST

Some of the fellow pioneers of George Washington went out into the West to make their homes and to grow up with the country. John Sevier and George Rogers Clark and General Rufus Putnam were members of groups of eastern men of means and of power who preferred to be western. In Washington's mind there were always two motives working side by side with respect to the western lands, occupied till 1754 almost entirely by wild Indian tribes, except for a few French settlements on the Lakes, the Wabash, and the Mississippi River.

Washington took a businesslike view of the West, first of all in a nationalistic sense. Only two great national statesmen of the period adequately foresaw the possibilities of the West as the future home of millions of settlers of the English and related stocks. These two were Benjamin Franklin and George Washington. Franklin was interested in the West as an outgrowth of Pennsylvania; and within that state, as its boundary was finally fixed, was Pittsburgh, the leading gateway to the West. Maryland was cut off by an unfortunately worded charter. Even before the Revolution pioneers from Pennsylvania, Virginia, and North Carolina had begun to carry civilization west of the Alleghenies and to create a new section of the coming American Union. In that process Washington was one of the active and effective spirits.

In speaking of this phase of George Washington's career, Calvin Coolidge has said: "That he should have been responsible in large measure for the opening of the West and for calling attention to the commercial advantages the country might derive therefrom is by no means the least of his benefactions to the Nation. He demonstrated that those who develop our resources, whether along agricultural, commercial, and industrial lines or in any other field of endeavor, are entitled to the approval, rather than the censure, of their countrymen."

"Washington was a builder—a creator. He had a national mind. He was constantly warning his countrymen of the danger of settling problems in accordance with sectional interests. His ideas in regard to the opening of our western territory were thought out primarily for the benefit of the Nation. It has been said that he would have been 'the greatest man in America had there been no Revolutionary War.'"

BUSINESS OF COLONIZATION

Considering Washington's success as the manager of a great plantation and as an acquirer of western land, it is remarkable that he had no success as a colonizer. As a landed proprietor probably Robert Morris and his associates were the only men in America who could compete with Washington in the size of their holdings. Washington began early to acquire western lands and in 1784 remarked that it was not to be supposed that those who were first on the ground failed to take advantage of the situation. Besides his own lands, he bought the land bounty warrants from those French and Indian War soldiers who were willing to dispose of these almost worthless certificates for ready cash. These purchases were, as he himself described them, mere lotteries which acquired value only by being joined into one large tract.

His western lands beyond the mountains footed up at the time of his death to about 45,000 acres, including a stretch of many miles on the fertile bottoms of the Great Kanawha, other tracts in present West Virginia on the Ohio, on the Little Miami near Cincinnati, in Kentucky, and on the Mohawk River in New York. At one time he tried to locate a tract in West Florida. The eventual sales of such lands were the chief cash value of his estate.

That personal holdings in the West created a motive in his efforts to bring about a canal system which would reach at least to the foot of the western mountains was but natural, but from his first experience as a surveyor in the wilderness to his death, he looked forward to the West as a region which must be retained by the United States. There is some evidence to show that he had New Orleans in his mind as an essential part of the American Republic.

Washington clearly expected to lease his western lands as fast as settlers came who could pay for them. In 1773 he advertised western lands for lease and settlement, and in his western journey of 1784 he found squatters on his valuable tracts but could come to no agreement with them. He offered terms of sale or to give 99-year leases; but they decided to "stand suit," hopeful evidently of getting a title for nothing.

FOUNDER OF THE NATIONAL CAPITAL

While George Washington was primarily interested in the development of lands for agricultural purposes, he, nevertheless, was a keen observer of urban life and needs. Upon him was laid the chief responsibility for selecting the site of the National Capital. We find him in the unique role of a city planner, largely instrumental in the selection of the exact location on the Potomac River, in which is now the District of Columbia, and in the development of the site.

In further comment upon the business phase of George Washington's activity, Calvin Coolidge said: "It included his plan of the waterway to the West, through the Potomac, the Monongahela, and the Ohio Rivers, which he used to speak of as 'the channel of commerce to the extensive and valuable trade of a rising empire.' He, of course, could not foresee the development of railway transportation and the great ocean-going vessels, because of which the seat of our Government became separated from active contact with commerce and was left to develop as the cultural and intellectual center of the Nation. Due to the genius of L'Enfant, the great engineer, this city from the first has had a magnificent plan of development. Its adoption was due in no small degree to the engineering foresight and executive ability of Washington. By 1932 we shall have made much progress toward perfecting the ideal city planned by him in the closing days of the eighteenth century."

MINING

The mineral wealth of the present states of Virginia and West Virginia was little developed until after the Revolution, partly because the deposits were difficult of access, still more because they were almost unexplored. George Washington's father possessed an iron mine not far from Frederickburg which furnished ore for a smelter nearer the river. The title of the mining and smelting operation, first formed in 1715, was the Principio Company of Maryland and Virginia. Washington had no direct connection with it. The father's interest was willed to Lawrence who in his own will bequeathed it to his brother Augustine. The business was gradually closed up after 1753.

It is an interesting fact that Washington wrote in his diary, on October 13, 1770: "Went to see a Coal Mine not far from his house on the Banks of the River; the Coal seemd to be of the very best kind, burning freely and abundance of it." This was on the Youghiogheny in the center of the great bituminous region; but the later immense commercial significance of that coal never came home to his mind, for steam power produced from coal was an unknown energy to him.

His nearest approach to interest in the making of iron seems to have been in 1760 in the lower Shenandoah Valley: "Friday [May] 9th. . . . Cald at the Bloomery and got Mr. Wm. Crawford to show me the place that has been so often talkd of for erecting an Iron Work upon.

"The Convenience of Water is great. First it may be taken out of the River into a Canal and a considerable Fall obtained, and then a Run comes from the Mountain on which the largest fall may be got with Small Labour and expence. But of the constancy of this Stream I know nothing, nor could Crawford tell me. I saw none of the Ore, but all People agree that there is an inexhaustable fund of that that is rich. But wood seems an obstacle; not but that there is enough of it, but the G[roun]d is so hilly and rugged as not to admit of making Coal or transporting it."

In 1786 he recorded: "A Capt. Hite came here between breakfast and dinner to see if I would join him in an Iron work on the So. Branch, wch. proposition I rejected."

THE LEGAL MIND

One of the remarkable aspects of the American Revolution is the legal knowledge displayed by the great leaders and their ability to draw up laws and constitutions which were adapted to the new dispensation of independence. Some ideas of government and international law came from courses or reading in college by the rising generation, such as John Adams and John Hancock and Thomas Jefferson. Alexander Hamilton's education was largely private. The main training in political philosophy was in hot debates in the colonial legislatures.

George Washington was an outstanding example of a self-taught man. His schooling amounted to little more than acquiring the rudiments of what would now be considered a grade-school course. By purchase, but probably more extensively through gifts, he acquired a large and miscellaneous library, particularly bearing on agricultural and military matters, but also with some standard literary, historical, and political works. However, it was his contact with men, and his studious attention to the moving drama of public affairs, that rounded out his mental character and gave him high standing among the most intelligent men and women of his time.

Washington was for years a member of the legislative assembly in which Patrick Henry was such a motive force; but Washington is not recorded as having made a single political speech there, though reputed to have been an excellent committee man. Nor was he much of a student. As a justice of the peace he ordered a copy of Burn's treatise on the subject in 1771; but his legal mind was mainly developed by practical experience in connection with his own estate and the other properties under his care, as described earlier in this pamphlet. His experience in Congress was brief; but his experience with Congress was long and troublesome, and it taught him many things about government. Also at home he enjoyed the privilege during the "Critical Period of American History" of intellectual intercourse with many men of many minds.

His power to think in legal terms and to draw up a legal document of the highest importance is brought out by his will. Such a tour de force is hardly to be found in the annals of America. A man without legal education had the courage to sit down and with his own hand, unaided by the counsel of any person, to write out a will in 29 sheets providing for the distribution, with intimate details, of a fortune that has been estimated at more than half a million dollars. In that will he introduced a principle of dividing an estate into shares which was thought to be a discovery when practiced by an American financial magnate a hundred and twenty years later. That will stood without modification by court decree. It is a crowning example of the fairness of mind of the maker and at the same time of his power to grasp and improve upon the fiduciary principles of his time.

CORPORATIONS

Washington's experience with corporations began early. In the Ohio Company, organized in 1747, both his half brothers, Lawrence and Augustine, were interested and Lawrence became the president. The history of this company and its connection with Washington's journey to the Ohio in 1753 and the Fort Necessity expedition of the next year are explained in Pamphlets Nos. 11 and 13. Washington, however, held no stock in the company, Lawrence's share being sold at his early death, and the French and Indian War virtually ended the enterprise. Nor was Washington directly concerned with the later Grand Ohio Company or Walpole Grant, though he did have an idea of acquiring shares in it if possible.

Washington's first company was the Dismal Swamp one, of which he was the leader and which began operations in 1763 and was still in being at the time of Washington's death. It was a successful engineering operation and it was the only one from which he appears to have derived a reasonable profit.

Washington's chief company, however, was that for improving the navigation of the Potomac River, which was carried to the operating point under his direction, though the most important part of its unfortunate history came after his death. It was in 1772 that the Virginia Assembly gave the original authorization, and Washington later wrote that the plan "was in a tolerably good train," when the Revolution began. As soon as the war was over his mind reverted to the project and a new company, sanctioned by both Virginia and Maryland, was formed. Details of the development are given in Pamphlet No. 13 of this series. With what was in a measure a rival concern, the James River Company, he had only a nominal connection, though he became honorary president of it.

These organizations bear witness to the constructive mind of the moving spirit and also to his remarkable ability to bring other minds to connect with his in a commercial and engineering organization. He had the type of mind useful to the later canal and railroad builders both east and west of the mountains.

In 1763 Washington was the active organizer of the Mississippi Company, of which he wrote the articles of incorporation. The purpose was to get a royal grant on the Mississippi and across the Wabash, Ohio, and Tennessee. Washington devoted time to the matter until 1772, and considerable expense was incurred by the associates, but the grant was never made.

THE SOCIAL PROMOTER

One of the evidences of modern business organization is the growth of the service clubs and other associations of business men for mutual acquaintance and the furtherance of common ends. Despite the massiveness of his character, Washington was a natural "joiner." His personal records tell us of hundreds of agreeable parties, going to the extent of playing cards all night. As we have seen in the account of Washington's earlier life, he was very fond of a good time, liked to go to shows, danced, dined, and played with the children. He was also a man who made the warmest and most attached friends and he was particularly gracious to young and rising men like Alexander Hamilton. The majesty of Washington in uniform at the head of his troops and in the full dress of the time as President of the United States causes us to forget his extreme interest in his fellow men, and in that interest lay much of his success as a business man, of his ability to handle men.

He joined the Masons as a very young man and was later for a time master of the Alexandria Lodge and admitted to honorary fellowship with other lodges. He accepted the five academic honors that were bestowed upon him and he deserved them in spite of the rather envious criticism of men like Senator Maclay. He was a gracious host and was even known to tell a funny story about a parson who lost his wig crossing a river called the Brunx—a standing warning to northward bound clergy of New York City.

THE TRAVELING MAN

If Washington possessed no sample case, he went through all the manoeuvres of the proficient traveling man of nowadays. He made journeys to meetings of the boards of which he was a member. He was constantly going back and forth from Mount Vernon to places near and far that he frequented. He also had the official traveling man's intimate knowledge of inns and taverns and their relative merits. In the pamphlet on Washington as a Traveler appear relations of his journeys and stopping places; and his diaries contain intimate accounts of his many travels back and forth between Mount Vernon and Philadelphia and New York. He made seven journeys into New England, including four in connection with his military command. His journey from Mount Vernon south in 1791 extended to Augusta, Georgia, and back by a different route. He was an adept in travel by horseback or by coach. One of the many agreeable attributes of the man was his care for the animal motive power. Probably no man of his time had such an intimate knowledge of the roads, the inns, the hospitable houses, and the food and drink of his country.

Part V

Washington and Public Business

ASSOCIATE SPIRIT

So far this pamphlet has dealt chiefly with Washington as an individual business man, or as a man associated with friends and neighbors in land, colonizing, and other corporations. The full story of his influence in business affairs must include the effect of his great experience in lines of business previous to the Federal Constitution upon public affairs later. Washington's part in the creation of the United States of America seems a miracle, not so much because there was a General Washington and then a President Washington, as that the planter George Washington, born in a community almost entirely agricultural, should have throughout his life interested himself in so many methods of production of national wealth, through that combination of forces for economic, social, and political purposes which we call business; and that the strongest personal force for a union of the states which would centralize commerce and create vast business organizations within the federal government came from a Virginia planter in an agricultural area. Throughout the Revolution, Washington was urging the states to come closer together for promotion of their joint interests.

No records were preserved either by Washington or his friends of the conversations which must have taken place during the Constitutional Convention regarding the authority of the proposed national government in commercial and business affairs. One hundred years elapsed after the Revolution before the interstate commerce powers of the federal government were developed. Nevertheless foreign commerce and public finance were from the first workings of the Constitution regulated by statutes and backed up by a system of national officials. Whatever the unrecorded influence of Washington on the many clauses of the Constitution relating to regulations for recognizing or centralizing business, there can be no doubt of his very strong influence upon the early financial and commercial legislation which established federal authority and limited the powers of the states.

THE BUSINESS OF WAR

Mention has been made of the influence of the Revolution in developing Washington's legal or political mind. The maritime efforts of government in business were also enlightening. It was fundamental in all of Washington's connections with the wartime Congress that the legislature ruled and he was its military servant, and his concern was with the operation of the army. But the army could not be recruited or trained or moved or armed or clothed or even subsisted without the sinews of war, and the funds raised put to proper uses. That the economic problems as well as the economic origins of the American Revolution were fundamental has been accepted by historians. It was even realized at the time. Samuel Huntington, president of the Congress, wrote on September 4, 1780: "The situation of our finances yet remains distressing, and seems the true cause to which every other difficulty and embarrassment may be traced up." Still another delegate insisted that the British were successful because the war had become a financial one.

Though Washington did not attempt to advise Congress on financial affairs, he was fully aware that the causes of the trouble lay in the lack of power of Congress over the sources of income, proper machinery of credit, effective promotion of production, and fit instruments of distribution; and he again and again emphasized in his private letters, especially to delegates in Congress, the need of a stronger central government capable in its own action of remedying these defects. Thus he wrote Joseph Jones on May 31, 1780: "Certain I am, unless Congress speak in a more decisive tone, unless they are vested with powers by the several States competent to the great purposes of war, or assume them as matter of right, and they and the States respectively act with more energy than they hitherto have done, that our cause is lost." The expression is typical. This matter has been developed in Pamphlet No. 6.

Perhaps it was impossible that a body made up as Congress was, and in which lawyers were perhaps the most numerous, should accept financial advice from the few men who were accustomed to business affairs on a large scale. No specific and definite plan for raising money by general taxation was ever carried out until the Federal Constitution went into effect. Every state as well as the Continental Congress had recourse to paper money; and much of this was eventually repudiated, although a small portion figures in Hamilton's funding operations. In the end this commercial as well as political bankruptcy brought good though entirely unintentional results; for had there been better economic action under Congress and the Confederation, it is doubtful whether the people would have sanctioned the entirely new system of the Federal Constitution.

THE STAFF AND LINE

The Continental Army was never an efficient machine, but its worst portion was the staff—its business section, which was least directly under Washington's control. Congress was desirous enough of making the various departments efficient, but it was not itself sufficiently efficient to do this; or, having made proper provisions, to see that they were carried out. Incompetent and occasionally dishonest officials; refusal or neglect of the states to cooperate; the disinclination of the people to exchange their goods for the paper money, loan certificates, or staff certificates that were offered; the breakdown of transportation; and, even when matters were at their worst and the disintegration or mutiny of the army threatened daily, the fear to use direct action—the lesson of all this was not forgotten by the commander-in-chief when, later, he helped to frame a document which would give economic powers to the federal government.

In one respect Washington had a better opportunity to bring business principles into the army. He used his utmost influence to secure the appointment and promotion of competent men as officers; and yet to the end of the war the army roll bore the names of men of no marked military ability. The thing that held the army together was not so much the business sagacity of Washington, which had little opportunity to make itself felt, as the confidence which most men who approached him felt in his unselfishness, his character, and his unyielding grit.

FEDERAL FINANCE

Although George Washington was the most conspicuous man in the national councils from the end of the Revolutionary War to his retirement from the presidency in 1797, it was not till recent years that the people of the United States have begun to realize that his experience in business affairs made it possible for him to render an immense service to his country. Washington was the inevitable first President, though not because the American people realized his business sagacity and experience. He was the first President because he was the successful general and a national character, known and admired in every state. Once entered on the presidency, however, his judgment in such matters as taxes and tariffs and salary scales and military expenses and encouragement of commerce proved extraordinarily sound and timely.

He was much influenced by Hamilton in such matters because he recognized Hamilton's brilliancy and because he shared Hamilton's belief that interests of business must be considered in founding and carrying on the Republic. The four great questions of funding the public debt, incorporating the state debts incurred in aid of the Revolution, protection to American shipping, and the United States Bank, were settled along lines publicly approved and urged by President George Washington.

After a brief era of over-expansion, a new banking system was set up in the states and nation. It was at first conservative and lasted for many years. Washington himself became a stockholder in two banks, one at Alexandria and the other, the Columbia, at Georgetown in the new District of Columbia. He understood the importance of bank notes that would circulate at par in gold. He recognized the necessity for sound private and public finance for the perpetuity of the nation. He signed the first national tariff, which gave both revenue and protection, and signed acts for excise duties. His presence as head of the government, his backing up of Hamilton who represented the moneyed circles of the country, made possible the foundation of sound and enduring federal finance. His influence was especially strong in the chartering of the United States Bank which proved to be an important force in the political union of the state. It was not so much his acquaintance with the details of commercial and banking transactions as his sound and vigorous judgment upon economic questions that gave weight to his convictions.

FOUNDATIONS OF THE NAVY

Washington's leadership included valuable service in the founding of the American navy. When he was appointed commander in chief of the American forces in 1775, nothing was said in terms about sea fighting or sea forces, and this landsman was the first responsible military man in the Revolutionary War to discern the importance of sea warfaring as an element in the struggle.

In September, 1775, he issued instructions to Nicholson Broughton: "1st. You being appointed a Captain in the Army of the United Colonies of North America, are hereby directed to take the Command of a Detachment of said Army and proceed on Board the Schooner Hannah, at Beverly lately fitted out & equipp'd with Arms, Ammunition and Provisions at the Continental Expence. 2nd. You are to proceed as Commander of Sd. Schooner, immediately on a Cruise against such Vessels as may be found on the High Seas or elsewhere, bound inward and outward to or from Boston, in the Service of the ministerial Army, and to take and seize all such Vessels, laden with Soldiers, Arms, Ammunition, or Provisions for or from sd. Army, or which you shall have good Reason to suspect are in such Service."

Similar commissions were given to John Manly of the Lee and to others. These vessels, constituting what was known as "Washington's Fleet," did good service in intercepting vessels loaded with military stores for the British army in Boston and furnishing the besieging army with much needed war material.

This marks the beginning of the little American navy which served with spirit and effect during the Revolution. Also President Washington in 1794 participated in ordering the construction of the first frigates of the federal navy, the Constitution, President, Constellation, Congress, United States, and Chesapeake, intended to deal with the Barbary Pirates, and which later—in Washington's lifetime—began their exploits in the brief and informal French War of 1798.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

As has been shown elsewhere in this pamphlet, Washington throughout his life was interested in foreign trade, as an outlet for American raw products. In 1784 he stated his convictions on this subject as follows: "Without going into the investigation of a question, which has employed the pens of able politicians, namely, whether trade with foreigners is an advantage or disadvantage to a country, this State, as a part of the confederated States, all of whom have the spirit of it very strongly working within them, must adopt it, or submit to the evils arising therefrom without receiving its benefits. Common policy, therefore, points clearly and strongly to the propriety of our enjoying all the advantages, which nature and our local situation afford us; and evinces clearly, that, unless this spirit could be totally eradicated in other States as well as in this, and every man be made to become either a cultivator of the land or a manufacturer of such articles as are prompted by necessity, such stimulus should be employed as will force this spirit, by showing to our countrymen the superior advantages we possess beyond others, and the importance of being upon a footing with our neighbors."

He even foresaw the export value of western products: "If this is fair reasoning, it ought to follow as a consequence, that we should do our part towards opening the communication with the fur and peltry trade of the Lakes, and for the produce of the country which lies within, and which will, so soon as matters are settled with the Indians, and the terms on which Congress mean to dispose of the land, found to be favorable, are announced, be settled faster than any other ever did, or any one would imagine. This, then, when considered in an interested point of view, is alone sufficient to excite our endeavors. But in my opinion there is a political consideration for so doing, which is of still greater importance."

The regulations for this foreign commerce were one of his tasks as first President. Both legislation and treaties were necessary. Congress passed laws for coastwise and overseas navigation, the government of seamen in the merchant service, lighthouses and buoys, port rules, tonnage duties, and consuls; all of which received his approval, and in the framing of which he and Hamilton undoubtedly had a hand. Commercial treaties already existed with France, Holland, and Prussia; but the far more important one with Great Britain was made during his second administration, and also one with Spain. This gave the new federal government working arrangements with the chief maritime nations. It was at this time, too, that American trade with the Orient had its inception.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE

The regulation of interstate commerce was also a federal function. There were laws for trade with the Indians, for a mint and the regulation of coins, and for the post-office and post roads; but direct aid through internal improvements did not develop during Washington's control. As engineer, business man, and head of a developing nation Washington was observant of measures for the improvement of communication and transportation, and active in promoting them. During his travels he commented upon commercial affairs and upon the condition of roads and ferries, and mentioned with pleasure the new bridges he crossed in Massachusetts—those across the Charles and Mystic and the one between Salem and Beverly, “built for about £4500 lawful money—a price inconceivably low in my estimation.” His interest in the Potomac River improvement continued unabated, though his active participation in its progress was no longer possible. When in Richmond on his southern tour he inspected the works on the James River; and in 1793, he took a little-known journey through Reading, Pennsylvania, to Lancaster, which undoubtedly included an inspection of the Union Canal then being built. Various of his commercial observations are given in Pamphlet No. 11.

His messages to Congress displayed his policy. In the first annual one he said: “The advancement of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures by all proper means will not, I trust, need recommendation; but I can not forbear intimating to you the expediency of giving effectual encouragement as well to the introduction of new and useful inventions from abroad as to the exertions of skill and genius in producing them at home, and of facilitating the intercourse between the distant parts of our country by a due attention to the post-office and post-roads.”

Also in his third message he advised: “The importance of the post-office and post-roads on a plan sufficiently liberal and comprehensive, as they respect the expedition, safety, and facility of communication, is increased by their instrumentality in diffusing a knowledge of the laws and proceedings of the Government, which, while it contributes to the security of the people, serves also to guard them against the effects of misrepresentation and misconception. . . . The disorders in the existing currency, and especially the scarcity of small change, a scarcity so peculiarly distressing to the poorer classes, strongly recommend the carrying into immediate effect the resolution already entered into concerning the establishment of a mint. . . . An uniformity in the weights and measures of the country is among the important objects submitted to you by the Constitution, and if it can be derived from a standard at once invariable and universal, must be no less honorable to the public councils than conducive to the public convenience.”

FEDERAL RELATION TO INDUSTRY

The connection of the federal government with industry was less direct than with trade; but, as said above, a tariff act was passed which gave some protection, and one of Hamilton’s monumental reports was on Manufacturing, while Congress passed a law on “patents for useful inventions.” There was also an act on the government of fisheries. Washington’s own interest in the growth of industrialism has already been shown. This was particularly the case during his presidency, and furnished material for interesting entries in his diary during his journeys.

“Tuesday [October] 20th [1789]. After breakfast, accompanied by Colo. Wadsworth, Mr. Ellsworth and Colo. Jesse Root, I viewed the Wollen Manufactory at this place, which seems to be going on with spirit. Their Broad-cloths are not of the first quality, as yet, but they are good; as are their Coatings, Cassimeres, Serges and Everlastings; of the first, that is, broad-cloth, I ordered a suit to be sent to me at New York—and of the latter a whole piece, to make breeches for my servants. All the parts of this business are performed at the Manufactory except the spinning—this is done by the Country people, who are paid by the cut.

“Hartford is more compactly built than Middletown, and contains more souls; the computed number of which amount to about double. The number of Houses in Middletown are said to be 250 or 60—these reckoning eight persons to a house, would make two thousand at least. The depth of water which Vessels can bring to the last place, is about ten feet; and is as much as there is over Saybrook bar. From Middletown to Hartford there is not more than 6 feet water.”

“Wednesday, 28th. Went after breakfast, to visit the duck manufacture [at Boston], which appeared to be carrying on with spirit, and is in a prosperous way. They have manufactured 32 pieces of Duck 30 or 40 yds. each in a week; and expect in a short time to increase it to []. They have 28 looms at work, and 14 Girls spinning with Both hands, (the flax being fastened to their waste.) Children (girls) turn the wheels for them, and with this assistance each spinner can turn out 14 lbs. of Thread per day when they stick to it, but as they are paid by the piece, or work they do, there is no other restraint upon them but to come at 8 o’clock in the morning, and return at 6 in the evening. They are the daughters of decayed families, and are girls of Character—none others are admitted.”

SERVICE TO THE NATION’S BUSINESS

In the enormous development of American business since Washington’s time the little mills and small banks and restricted commerce of the eighteenth century seem trifling; for the resources and aggregate annual business of the whole United States in 1799 were less than the output of a single present state, such as Ohio or Illinois. The best evidence of extraordinary business ability is Washington’s persistent interest in the discoveries and advances of his own time. He was the leading spirit in developing the canal system which was at that time the most scientific type of inland transportation. No other public man was so interested in the application of power to the propulsion of vessels which Fulton was to make practical after the experiments of Rumsey and Fitch. He said somewhere “I hope, some day, that we will become a storehouse and granary for the world.”

The greatest business thought of George Washington, however, was his conception of the United States as a commercial unit. Whoever may have been responsible for the broad powers over foreign and interstate commerce conferred by the Constitution, it accorded with Washington’s lifelong insistence on the common interest and common policy of the colonies which in due time became states in a Union. Washington was at the same time an Eastern man and a Western man. In the writings of his later life, he insisted that the West should be held by the United States against Great Britain, France, and Spain. He predicted that Detroit would become a trade center. He had his eye upon the commercial importance of the head of Lake Michigan. He went so far as to plan a journey down the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers to New Orleans.

To sum up Washington as a business man, he was unusually capable and successful in many lines of private affairs. Inflexibly honest in his private dealings, his immense influence as President was directed toward a settlement of just debts, the establishment of a sound currency, the fostering of foreign commerce, a proper system of public accounts, the equitable distribution of taxation, and the creation of a feeling of joint national responsibility for the business affairs of the government. Also he saw the necessity of encouragement of both shipping and domestic manufactures, provision for future needs, the establishment of substantial means of transportation, the building up of banks and other commercial corporations, and the protection of public interests against local pressure and against extravagance. To him the government of business and the business of government were combined for the welfare of the American people.

Washington's Home and Fraternal Life

By Carl H. Claudy

Part I

Family Life and Friends

THE WILLIAMS MASONIC PORTRAIT

From the portrait painted from life by William Williams; now in possession of Alexandria-Washington Lodge No. 22, Alexandria, Va.

EARLY YEARS

GEORGE WASHINGTON was born on the Bridges Creek estate on Friday, February 11, 1731/32, O. S. (February 22, 1732, N. S.). The plantation was later called Wakefield. A building has been erected on the estate, reproducing as far as possible the birthplace. When George Washington was about three years of age the family moved up the Potomac to the estate which later became Mount Vernon, and from there about 1739 to a farm on the Rappahannock opposite Fredericksburg, possibly because of Augustine Washington's mining interests. There, on April 12, 1743, the father died. He devised the Mount Vernon estate to his oldest son, Lawrence, the Bridges Creek estate to Augustine, and the Rappahannock farm to George, but subject to his mother's control during his minority. The will made no mention of property other than the land and its adjuncts, including slaves, and the interest in the iron works. The estate was considerable and Mary Ball was left what profit she could make from the Bridges Creek plantation for five years. All the estates were left in Mary's hands until the sons came respectively of age. She had property in her own right, including another farm on the Rappahannock.

EDUCATION

Washington's schooling was a haphazard affair and of it we lack definite information. He possibly attended a field school kept by one Hobby, a sexton, before his father died, and for some months after that event lived with Augustine at Wakefield and attended the school of Henry Williams who is credited with developing George's inclination toward mathematics. When he went to live with his mother his schooling was perhaps in Fredericksburg under the rector there, Rev. James Marye, on and off, until probably 1747. He may have received, but quickly forgot, a smattering of Latin, continued his interest in mathematics, left school with a power of literary expression which he never lost, and a clear chirography. His largest education was outside. Vigorous outdoor activity combined with great strength prepared his body for the demands of the later strenuous life, and made him a superb horseman. His visits to the homes of his elder brothers brought him into contact with colonial polite society, taught him manners, and developed his character, while also starting him on his career.

BROTHERS AND SISTER

From 1747 on, the main influences upon the youth were his half brother Lawrence and the latter's friends and relatives by marriage, the Fairfax family. His time was spent chiefly at Mount Vernon. Interest in mathematics undoubtedly began the tendency toward accuracy and method which remained a chief characteristic throughout Washington's life. It may also have turned his attention to surveying as a career, but the choice may have been made because it was the best possible business opening. Lord Fairfax, a great promoter, far from the indifferent nobleman of the period, was the youth's patron and if he did not encourage him to become a surveyor, at least gave him the opportunity of practical experience in the laying out of his Lordship's frontier lands in Shenandoah Valley and elsewhere. At the end of 1751 George went with Lawrence, then a pulmonary invalid, to Barbados, where he had smallpox himself. His brother made no gain in health, and returned some months later to Mount Vernon to die.

With Augustine, the other half brother, George Washington's later relations are uncertain. Augustine died before the outbreak of the Revolution and George, who thus became head of the family and who survived his sister and all his brothers, declined to qualify as an executor of the estate, but evidently because of the stress of other duties. This brother's children were remembered with the rest of the nephews and nieces in the General's will.

Elizabeth ("Betty"), George Washington's sister, married Fielding Lewis, lived at Fredericksburg, and is said to have resembled the General. John Augustine was his favorite brother and the younger man had charge of Mount Vernon, to which George fell heir in 1752, during the French and Indian War campaigns. Samuel, the second of Mary Washington's sons, died in 1781, widowing his fifth wife. His will showed a considerable estate but his brother George's correspondence indicates that it was involved and not productive for some years at least. The General assumed the education of two of his brother's sons and the care of a daughter, Harriot, his brotherly affection being indicated in his will by the statement that the charges for these and other accounts "shall stand balanced," while in addition these collateral descendants shared equally with the others in the general division of the estate. The other brother, Charles, predeceased George so closely that he was mentioned in the latter's will. A son of George Washington's sister and of each of his brothers were executors of the General's estate.

MARRIAGE

On the traditional love affairs of Washington—of the "Lowland Beauty," of his interest in Sally Cary, the wife of George William Fairfax, of his visit to Mary Philipse in New York (there is no evidence of either engagement or proposal), and the rest—it is not essential to dwell. He met his future wife, Martha Dandridge, widow of Daniel Parke Custis, early in 1758. She was a few months older than Washington. The marriage took place on January 6, 1759, as soon as he had resigned his military commission. It is not known whether the ceremony took place at her house or at the church. His attitude toward life at that time is indicated by a letter written soon after this happy event to an English correspondent of his own name whom he supposed to be a distant relative: "I am now I believe fixd at this seat with an agreeable Consort for Life. And hope to find more happiness in retirement than I ever experienced amidst a wide and bustling World."

THE LADY OF THE MANOR

Martha Washington in her forty-one years as consort to "the General" revealed a person of breeding, dignified in society, and adequate as First Lady. She was very fond of her husband, who reciprocated her affection, and domestic in her tastes, always active in the care of the Mount Vernon household when she was at home. She had little influence on her husband's public career, except so far as her wealth enabled him to engage in it. She brought him a large estate and he took from her agents the management not only of her share but that of her two minor children, John Parke and Martha (or "Patsy"). All the world knows of the tender care he took of her all his life and of her children and grandchildren. Evidences of this care, of her solicitude, and its relation to his public duties is well shown in a letter he wrote Tobias Lear in 1793 at the time of the yellow fever epidemic in Philadelphia: "It was my wish to have continued there longer; but as Mrs. Washington was unwilling to leave me surrounded by the malignant fever which prevailed, I could not think of hazarding her, and the Children any longer by my continuance in the City, . . . I therefore came off with them."

A reserved man even in his diary, and formal even in the most friendly letters, Washington was not the type to fling his heart on paper for all the world to read. But his references to his home life in general and to Mrs. Washington in particular show him as a devoted husband who loved his home not only for what it was—a place of peace and sanctuary to which he returned again and again from the arduous duties to which his country called him—but as the setting for the jewel which was the honored wife.

When his country called him he wrote her, June 18, 1775: "I should enjoy more real happiness in one month with you at home, than I have the most distant prospect of finding abroad, if my stay were to be seven times seven years. . . . It was utterly out of my power to refuse this appointment, without exposing my character to such censures, as would have reflected dishonor upon myself, and given pain to my friends. This, I am sure, could not, and ought not, to be pleasing to you, and must have lessened me considerably in my own esteem."

No pen picture of Martha Washington packs more into less space than that written by Brissot de Warville, a young Frenchman who visited Washington with a letter of introduction from Lafayette. He said: "Every thing has an air of simplicity in his house; his table is good, but not ostentatious; and no deviation is seen from regularity and domestic economy. Mrs. Washington superintends the whole, and joins to the qualities of an excellent house-wife, the simple dignity which ought to characterize a woman, whose husband has acted the greatest part on the theater of human affairs; while she possesses that amenity, and manifests that attention to strangers which render hospitality so charming."

EARLY FRIENDS

Washington loved his friends and was as happy in entertaining them as in visiting them. His diaries and his letters prove his interest in and his dependence upon his chosen comrades; if indeed a man is known by the company he keeps, then is Washington known as the peer of his day and age, for his friends were the leaders in the political, social, and economic life of his time.

His near neighbors, the Ramsays, the Johnsons, the Fairfaxes, the McCartys, the Diggeses across the Potomac, Dr. Craik, the Masons, his wife's relatives, the Bassetts of York Peninsula, and many others were often at Mount Vernon and Washington and his wife visited them to dine or sup or spend the night. Craik, Mercer, Wagener, and other comrades of early days in the border wars were often around his fireside, living over again the brave days of youth and daring, adventure and danger.

Few if any of his immediate neighbors held the place in Washington's heart which was occupied by George Mason, of Gunston Hall. The two men were singularly alike in certain ways; both were enthusiastic planters, both proprietors of great estates, both intensely interested in public affairs. The famous author of the Virginia Bill of Rights had five hundred people on his plantation, and Gunston Hall vied with Mount Vernon in both beauty and hospitality. Here the likeness between the friends ceased. Washington was a public character; Mason was a semi-recluse, who very unwillingly permitted himself to be thrust into active participation in civic affairs. He was a profound student, a sagacious leader who possessed a thoughtful, well balanced mind, but he preferred to work quietly through friends, rather than publicly through personal influence; later he abandoned the seclusion of home to enter public life. Close association and constant correspondence with Mason had a profound effect upon Washington, who turned to the owner of Gunston Hall for counsel and a fresh viewpoint as he turned to no one else. Hence it was but natural that the social intercourse between the two "great houses" should be so constant in the antebellum days, or that we find Washington so often at Gunston, and Mason so often at Mount Vernon. After the Revolution they differed politically and the intimacy was evidently much lessened.

AT MOUNT VERNON

With his marriage began the real home life of George Washington. The American home has always been one of the foundation stones of the Republic. Luckily for all in whom love of home is next to love of country, we have a picture of Washington's home life which is well rounded. His diary, his letters, the accounts left to us by the friends who visited him, the happiness and relief with which he returned to Mount Vernon whenever the cares of public life permitted, all limn the details so that the visitor to Mount Vernon has small difficulty in peopling it with the gracious figures of colonial days, seeing it as a center of culture and hospitality, a focus of those ideals of home which make Washington a living, breathing personality.

Washington's diaries are an expression of a singularly direct nature. They neither minimize nor magnify. He was sparing of words and packed into a few sentences events which to him were of paramount importance. Reading them as a whole, perhaps nothing stands out with greater clearness than that George Washington was essentially a home lover. He left Mount Vernon reluctantly to go to war, to be President, to explore, to visit his property in distant places. Always he returned as to a haven; his home meant to him peace and comfort and surcease from care. He loved the earth and all that sprang from it; he loved the woods and the wild game; he loved his friends much and was never happier than when with them, in their homes, or, preferably, at Mount Vernon. He loved his wife and her children, and later the grandchildren; he gave them home and love and a father's care—and when Patsy died, a deep grief.

Across the years we see a vivid picture of Washington not only the revered leader but a Washington content to be a simple planter, a home body, a man whose affections included not only wife and children but overpoured to other relatives and friends, slaves and servants, dogs, horses, cattle, and the insensate but beloved acres of his estate.

STYLE OF LIVING

If Washington lived in a style which in these days might be considered above the average, it was far more for his family and his guests than for himself. We have his own words for his love of simplicity. He wrote: "My manner of living is plain and I do not mean to be put out of it; a glass of wine and a bit of mutton are always ready, and such as will be content to take of them, are always welcome. Those who expect more will be disappointed."

Repeatedly he referred to "the shadow of my own vine and my own fig tree." He called Mount Vernon "a small villa" and again "my cottage." He liked "the simplicity of rural life."

Washington lived in a state befitting the man. It was luxurious, but luxury was the fashion of the times. Especially did he wish his wife to enjoy those comforts and luxuries to which his position and his means entitled her. Mrs. Washington never had reason to complain of her wardrobe. She had silks and satins of the finest. When occasion required Washington traveled on horseback, but when time was available he used a coach and four, and his outriders dressed in livery. His home was furnished with the best and his entertainments if not actually lavish were at least more than ample. The best was none too good for all those he loved, as befitted a wealthy man, the President of the nation, the general of its armies, beloved by his countrymen.

DAILY LIFE AT MOUNT VERNON

An English writer, Charles Varlo, who toured America in 1784, left us this charming word picture of General Washington's domestic hearth: "I crossed the river from Maryland into Virginia, near to the renowned General Washington's where I had the honour to spend some time, and was kindly entertained with that worthy family. As to the General, if we may judge by the countenance, he is what the world says of him, a shrewd, good-natured, plain, humane man, about fifty-five years of age, and seems to wear well, being healthful and active, straight, well made, and about six feet high.

"He keeps a good table, which is always open to those of a genteel appearance. He does not use many Frenchified congees, or flattering useless words without meaning, which savours more of deceit than an honest heart; but on the contrary, his words seem to point at truth and reason, and to spring from the fountain of a heart, which, being good of itself, cannot be suspicious of others, . . .

"The General's house is rather warm, snug, convenient, and useful, than ornamental. The size is what ought to suit a man of about two or three thousand a year in England. The out-offices are good, and seem to be not long built; and he was making more offices at each wing to the front of the house, which added more to ornament than real use.

"The situation is high, and commands a beautiful prospect of the river which parts Virginia and Maryland, but in other respects the situation seems to be out of the world, being chiefly surrounded by woods, and far from any great road or thoroughfare, and nine miles from Alexandria in Virginia.

"The General's lady is a hearty, comely, discreet, affable woman, some few years older than himself; she was a widow when he married her. He has no children by her.

"The General's house is open to poor travelers as well as rich; he gives diet and lodging to all that come that way, which indeed cannot be many, without they go out of their way on purpose. . . .

"I have travelled and seen a great deal of the world, have conversed with all degrees of people, and have remarked that there are only two persons in the world which have every one's good word, and those are—the Queen of England and General Washington, which I never heard friend or foe speak slightly of."

The Reverend Jedidiah Morse, the geographer, visited Mount Vernon in 1786, and left this delightful sketch of the General's home:

"He rises, in winter as well as summer, at the dawn of day; and generally reads or writes some time before breakfast. He breakfasts about seven o'clock on three small Indian hoe-cakes and as many dishes of tea. He rides immediately to his different farms, and remains with his labourers until a little past two o'clock, when he retires and dresses. At three he dines, . . . Whether there be company or not, the table is always prepared, by its elegance and exuberance for their reception; and the General remains at it for an hour after dinner, in familiar conversation and convivial hilarity. It is then that every one present is called upon to give some absent friend as a toast; the name not unfrequently awakens a pleasing remembrance of past events, and gives a new turn to the animated colloquy. General Washington is more chearful than he was in the army. Although his temper is rather of a serious cast, and his countenance commonly carries the impression of thoughtfulness, yet he perfectly relishes a pleasant story, an unaffected sally of wit, or a burlesque description which surprises by its suddenness and incongruity with the ordinary appearance of the object described. After this social and innocent relaxation, he applies himself to business, and about nine o'clock retires to rest. This is the rotine, and this the hour he observes, when no one but his family is present; at other times he attends politely upon his company until they wish to withdraw."

HOSPITALITY

The hospitality of Mount Vernon left nothing to be desired; the high and the low, the rich and the poor, the politician and the small farmer, the soldier and the civilian were often present—sometimes with their ladies, sometimes with whole families—to break bread and spend the night or longer with the beloved host.

Washington inherited the original estate of Mount Vernon which he increased from time to time until he owned eight thousand acres of land, one of the finest plantations in Virginia. He introduced advanced methods of preparing the soil; he selected his seed with great care. He built slave quarters in many places, so that he could divide his holdings into five sections and put an overseer in charge of each. As far as possible, he paid daily visits to the various sections, making his agriculture almost a science, as well as a business. But it was distinctly a home business and one which did not interfere with hospitality; rather, plantation life encouraged the practice of hospitality. Washington wrote in his diary, June 30, 1785: "dined with only Mrs. Washington, which I believe is the first instance of it since my retirement from public life." Later he said that his house "may be compared to a well resorted tavern." To make the "tavern" accommodate its guests, he added wings to the old house, until it grew to be ninety-six feet in length.

It was a great house in Washington's day; indeed, its beautiful proportions and its architectural excellence excite the admiration of artists of the present day. The curved colonades at each end, the noble porch, the formal landscaping of the grounds, with the trees planted by Washington and others, were all according to the General's own plans.

The house was roomy after its enlargement, as it had to be when so many came to visit the man whom all knew to be at once the maker and the savior of the new Republic. The Virginia planters inherited their ideas of lavish hospitality from the Motherland. Inns were few and incommensurable, hence great estates were as naturally the focus of constant streams of visitors, as were Virginia gentlemen themselves patterned on the centuries of tradition. A planter's home was not only always open to his friends, but in days when travel was difficult and hostels far apart, was a stopping place for travelers who often claimed a night's lodging and a seat at the family board by the right of a common background and common interests.

DANCING

It is delightful to read that Washington was very fond of dancing! This grave man, so filled with the cares of state, so self-sacrificing of all that he held dearest in life—home, plantation, friends, association with a loved wife—enjoyed to the full all varieties of the social intercourse of his age. Colonial days were a mixture of social formality and unceremonious hospitality. Dancing was a social grace in which both men and women were schooled as an essential part of a well rounded education. The stately minuet and the jolly Virginia reel were both performed according to ceremonial forms, and beautiful must both have been in the colonial silken knee breeches and ruffled shirts and powdered wigs of the men, the long full skirts and low cut evening gowns of the women.

Not only was dancing a home pleasure at Mount Vernon, but also at social affairs in Fredericksburg and Williamsburg. The General and his lady went often to grace a ball even as far as Annapolis. Of one of these, at Alexandria, where the refreshments were not to his liking, being mostly bread and butter and coffee which "the Drinkers of cold not Distinguish from Hot water sweetened," he wrote in his diary, "I shall therefore distinguish this Ball by the Stile and title of the Bread and Butter Ball."

Washington gave up dancing with regret. In 1799 he wrote to the committee on arrangements of the balls to be held by the Washington Society of Alexandria: "Mrs. Washington and myself have been honored with your polite invitation to the assemblies of Alexandria this winter, and thank you for this mark of your attention. But, alas! our dancing days are no more. We wish, however, all those who have a relish for so agreeable and innocent an amusement all the pleasure the season will afford them."

SPORTS

Washington's home life was interrupted time after time; but when he could enjoy Mount Vernon, his home life was not all work. He built, he farmed, he improved and conserved his holdings, but he also lived the life of a gentleman of the period and hunted and fished and rode to hounds.

Mount Vernon had miles of water front, and the Potomac was—and still is—filled with fish. Washington was extremely fond of fishing but he regarded his water rights as more than mere adjuncts to sport. The spring run of shad and herring was an important source of food and wealth for the owner of Mount Vernon.

He knew the woods within miles of his home from boyhood days and frequently hunted the abundant game of the Virginia hills and vales: Virginia deer, hares, squirrels, gray fox, and 'possum, many species of birds and of course the ruffed grouse, the wild turkey, and quail.

His diaries show that he loved fox hunting more than any other sport, during the season often coursing three or four times a week. It was the sport of the community; he and his neighbors kept kennels and the bay of the hound was often heard in the land.

Of his numerous mentions of fox hunts one will suffice, especially as it shows that Washington hunted for sport and not for the mere killing of the quarry. He wrote December 22, 1785: "Went a Fox hunting with the Gentlemen who came here yesterday [Daniel Dulany, Jr., Benjamin Dulany, Samuel Hanson, Thomas Hanson, Philip Alexander], together with Ferdinando Washington and Mr. Shaw, after a very early breakfast. Found a Fox just back of Muddy hole Plantation, and after a Chase of an hour and a quarter with my Dogs, and eight couple of Doctor Smith's (brought by Mr. Phil Alexander) we put him into a hollow tree, in which we fastened him; and in the Pincushion put up another Fox which in an hour and 13 Minutes was killed. We then after allowing the Fox in the hole half an hour, put the Dogs upon his Track and in half a Mile he took to another hollow tree and was again put out of it, but he did not go 600 yards before he had recourse to the same shift. Finding therefore that he was a conquered Fox we took the Dogs off and all came home to Dinner."

THE PLANTER

Washington loved the earth; he was a planter from inclination as well as from necessity. To watch the brown mould being plowed, to see his crops sprout and grow, to count them as harvested, satisfied an inner spiritual need of the man whose whole life was a succession of planting and sowing and reaping; planting effort, sowing ideas, and reaping independence and good government.

A husbandman as well as farmer, live stock was a hobby with Washington. The several estuaries which indented his estate made marshes suitable for hogs and his average annual hog kill mounted to two hundred and fifty head, largely used in feeding his slaves and servants, although the best of the ham and bacon would be for the home table and the guests.

In his diary and letters are many references to matters which pertain to farming and planting, stock and slaves, the work of the plantation. He wrote in 1788: "The more I am acquainted with agricultural affairs, the better I am pleased with them; insomuch that I can no where find so great satisfaction as in those innocent and useful pursuits. In indulging these feelings, I am led to reflect how much more delightful to an undebauched mind, is the task of making improvements on the earth, than all the vain glory which can be acquired from ravaging it, by the most uninterrupted career of conquest."

CHILDREN AT MOUNT VERNON

George Washington and Mrs. Washington missed the gift of children of their own. Washington's paternal affections were lavished upon his wife's children, Martha and John Custis, and the grandchildren (son and daughters of John Custis), Eliza, Martha, Eleanor, and George Washington Parke Custis.

Martha Washington's two children grew up at Mount Vernon, to which beautiful home George Washington took his new wife and her babies in 1759. Both Martha and John Custis were dearly loved by the General; we may believe, too, that the shouts and the laughter, the play and the merriment which youth brought to Mount Vernon made it the sweeter in the eyes of the owner.

Then came grief. Just rounding into womanhood, the young Martha, after suffering one of what Washington referred to as "her usual fits," died very suddenly in 1773. She left a broken-hearted mother, and a stepfather who was overcome with sorrow at the loss of a girl whom he could not have loved more had she been of his own blood.

John Custis lived long enough to marry, establish a home, and father four children, but he was very young when his call came—twenty-seven. He was a volunteer aide to General Washington; during the siege of Yorktown, exposure led to a camp fever which was fatal.

Two of his children, George Washington Parke and Nellie (Eleanor) Custis, taken into their home by the Washingtons, brought youth again to Mount Vernon and young blood and laughter to lawns and halls that had too long been serious. The young grandchildren seem to have been of the greatest comfort and joy to their grandmother and General Washington. Nellie Custis was married at Mount Vernon on Washington's last birthday, to which he devoted a scant entry in his diary: "The Revd. Mr. Davis and Mr. Geo. Calvert came to dinner and Miss Custis was married abt. Candle light to Mr. Lawe. Lewis."

HOME LIFE AWAY FROM MOUNT VERNON

Washington was away from Mount Vernon for almost seventeen of the forty-one years of his married life, though during the last six years of his presidency he was able to spend much of his time there. Mrs. Washington was with him whenever possible during these periods of public service. During the war army headquarters were perhaps a poor excuse for a home; but it will be recalled that except for the Yorktown campaign Washington's army engaged in no decisive operations after the summer of 1778; and that the first winter before Boston was spent by him in the commodious quarters of the Cragie (Longfellow) House at Cambridge, and the winter of 1781-82 at Philadelphia. Mrs. Washington joined him sooner or later each winter, and was with him continuously after the Yorktown campaign until just before the final scene of the occupation of New York City, so that even during the stress and misery of the war home life was not entirely denied to him.

At New York and Philadelphia the mansions Washington occupied as President were evidently both office and home. The social obligations the position imposed would have required the presence of Mrs. Washington even if there could have been any thought of separation. Also the children, Nellie and George Washington Parke, were with them there. However, the home relations were circumscribed by the official requirements, so that the family was glad to journey from Philadelphia to Mount Vernon whenever circumstances permitted.

CHURCH RELATIONS

The fifth pamphlet in this series is devoted to the story of Washington as a religious man, and sets forth his interest in the church and his services to it. In this land of freedom of faith, from the very beginning home and church have been intertwined and related.

As a side light on Washington's habit of piety, the following comments are interesting, though traditional: "It was her [Washington's mother's] life long habit to rise at dawn and spend the first hour of the day in silent thought to prepare herself for the family worship and the day's events. Her eldest son, George, was only eleven when his father died but upon him she placed the old patriarchal duty of saying grace at table and prayers at night and morning. From this early age his mother expected him to assume and carry such responsibility as the circumstances of life brought him. Under her pious guidance he could not have evaded any service that she deemed her duty."

Washington's interest in the church was deep and sincere. He not only attended divine services frequently both at home and abroad, but he worked for the church. The church building at Pohick (Truro), a beautiful structure still standing and in use, was the result of the labors of Washington and Mason. George Washington was a member of the vestry of the Truro for eleven years. That body held thirty-one meetings during that interval of which Washington attended twenty-three. He was absent only because of sickness, attendance at the General Assembly, or distance beyond reach.

In Washington's day going to church was not the simple matter it is today. Distances were great if measured in time of travel. Roads were often little more than mud wallows. Washington was thoughtful of animals, and would not urge his horses over or through impossible roads. His diaries record many journeys to Pohick and Alexandria to attend divine services.

LATER FRIENDS

When Washington in 1774 stepped into the wider arena and became the most conspicuous personage in it, he was brought in contact with men not only from all portions of the colonies and the United States into which they grew, but with characters from Europe as well. From this resulted not only that general reverence which he could not help realizing and appreciating even while deprecating, but cherished personal associations which continued throughout his life. Most of these had their birth in the army, and with the younger comrades in arms. Among his generals, Greene and Knox were favorites of his heart as well as approved of by his mind. He sincerely mourned the untimely death of the former, and was happy in having the latter as a member of his Cabinet in later years. His greatest attachment, however, was for Lafayette, the young French nobleman who offered his services in aid of the Republic, who was dearer perhaps than any other person outside Washington's immediate family. He had his chief's trust and confidence without limit, and was addressed in the most intimate terms. Washington gave his affection to certain members of his military family, especially Hamilton, David Humphreys, Robert Hanson Harrison, Tench Tilghman, and John Laurens. Hamilton did not appreciate the regard while Washington's aide as much as the others did. Laurens, with the high chivalry of his Huguenot blood, knew no bounds in his attachment to the General. Henry Lee, Light Horse Harry, though never on Washington's staff, was also a favorite, but in his case there had been a family familiarity for many years. John Cadwalader, though a somewhat older man, and a member of the Philadelphia aristocracy, showed his regard by challenging General Conway as John Laurens did General Charles Lee because they had been false to their commander-in-chief. Among the civilians, sage Benjamin Franklin, Gouverneur Morris, John Jay, Robert Morris, and Henry Laurens, the father of John, had Washington's regard as well as appreciation; but to none of them did he display the warmth of heart which he had for some of his military friends.

CHRISTMAS

In colonial Virginia, as in the Motherland, the social season held no more precious joys than those of the Christmas holidays. For a week before and after, the planters devoted much of their time to the round of balls, dances, dinners, house parties, week-end guests, hunting, and sleighing. The climax, of course, was Christmas Eve and Christmas Day.

Mansion and humble home were garlanded with greens. The tables groaned with the fat of the land; turkeys fattened for weeks for the date, hams cured as only Virginia can cure them, wild fowl hung until highly flavored, ducks from the marshes, and breads, pastries, vegetables, and the preserved fruits which were the pride of housewives high and low, provided a fare which, if different, was none the less in keeping with the traditions of Yule in England.

Of all the Christmases at Mount Vernon, none could have been happier for the General than that of 1783, and perhaps it was typical of all. On December 23 Congress assembled in the State House at Annapolis, where Washington had arrived four days before and where Mrs. Washington had met him, to receive the general's resignation as commander-in-chief of the Continental Army. He left Annapolis the day following the short ceremony which marked the close of the last act of the great drama of the Revolution, departing as a private citizen for the beloved home on the Potomac.

Washington reached Mount Vernon on Christmas Eve. He had left his home merely a man—a strong man, a man believed in by his country, a man untried in any such fire as was to scorch the world with its heat during the heart-breaking days of the war. He returned to it the victorious general, the savior of his country, the man to whom not only the states but the world paid tribute. As he approached the home he loved, after the prolonged absence, its hospitable doors flung wide, fires burning, song and joy that the Master was home filling the air, did he think of that other Christmas time when he crossed the Delaware or the terrible Christmas spent at Valley Forge?

Men write least of their happiest hours. Little has come down to us of that joyous Christmas, but a young girl guest at Mount Vernon in a letter to friends in Fredericksburg told in the briefest form the story of that home-coming: "The servants were in great glee. They came from all quarters to get a glimpse of their idol. The General, much affected, received them on the front veranda; some (the old ones) were in tears, others were in raptures of mirth."

LAST DAYS

To a friend in Philadelphia, Nellie Custis wrote after Washington retired from the Presidency in 1797: "We arrived here on Wednesday, March 15, without any accidents after a tedious and fatiguing journey of seven days. Grandpa is very well and much pleased with being once more farmer Washington."

Washington was, indeed, happy to be once more "farmer Washington." There was much to do. Farm buildings had fallen into disrepair. The old plantation system which had run so smoothly had gradually become disorganized. Shortly after his return to the beloved home he wrote to his friend, Secretary of War McHenry, "I find myself in the situation nearly of a young beginner; for, although I have not houses to build (except one, which I must erect for the accommodation and security of my Military, Civil, and private Papers, which are voluminous and may be interesting), yet I have not one, or scarcely anything else about me that does not require considerable repairs. In a word, I am already surrounded by Joiners, Masons, Painters, &c., &c.; and such is my anxiety to get out of their hands, that I have scarcely a room to put a friend into, or to sit in myself, without the music of hammers, or the odoriferous smell of paint."

Not until the repairs were completed could Washington settle down for his last placid years. He looked forward to them with pleasure, and with a sense of duty well done. He said in a letter to Oliver Wolcott: "To make and sell a little flour annually, to repair houses (going fast to ruin), to build one for the security of my papers of a public nature, and to amuse myself in agricultural and rural pursuits, will constitute employment for the few years I have to remain on this terrestrial globe. If, to these, I could now and then meet the friends I esteem, it would fill the measure and add zest to my enjoyments; but if ever this happens, it must be under my own vine and fig-tree, as I do not think it probable that I shall go beyond twenty miles from them."

Again he wrote to James McHenry: "I begin my diurnal course with the sun; . . . if my hirelings are not in their places at that time I send them messages expressive of my sorrow for their indisposition; . . . having put these wheels into motion, I examine the state of things further; and the more they are probed, the deeper I find the wounds are which my buildings have sustained by an absence and neglect of eight years; by the time I have accomplished these matters, breakfast . . . is ready; . . . this being over, I mount my horse and ride round my farms, which employs me until it is time to dress for dinner, at which I rarely miss seeing strange faces, . . ."

To his nephew Lawrence Lewis, son of his sister Betty, he wrote: "Whenever it is convenient to you to make this place your home I shall be glad to see you. . . . As both your aunt and I are in the decline of life and regular in our habits, especially in our hours of rising and going to bed, I require some person (fit and proper) to ease me of the trouble of entertaining company, particularly of nights, as it is my inclination to retire (unless prevented by very particular company, I always do retire) either to bed or to my study soon after candle light. In taking these duties (which hospitality obliges one to bestow on company) off my hands, it would render me a very acceptable service."

LAST VISITORS

Even in those last days he was not freed from public cares, for the threat of French War had again drawn him into his country's service as lieutenant-general of the armies. However, though he gave much thought and correspondence to matters of organization and offices, he was not obliged to leave his home except for a visit to Philadelphia in the latter part of 1798 to consult the President and Secretary of War. So that in the main those last years were tranquil ones, occupied with the affairs of his beloved estate, and the intimacies of home life. If his fame followed him into his retreat, and imposed upon his hospitality the demands of strangers, there were compensations in the visits of the real and tried friends. The letter which Mrs. Edward Carrington wrote from Mount Vernon on November 22, 1799, less than a month before General Washington died, makes a fitting, final record of this:

"We arrived at this remarkable mansion in perfect safety, where we experienced every mark of hospitality and kindness that the good old General's continued friendship to Col. C. could lead us to expect; his reception of my husband was that of a Brother; he took us each by the hand, and with a warmth of expression not to be described, pressed mine, and told me that I had conferred a favor never to be forgotten in bringing his old friend to see him, then bidding a servant to call the ladies, entertained us most facetiously till they appeared.

"It is wonderful after a life spent as these good people have necessarily spent theirs to see them in retirement assume domestic manners that prevail in our country, when, but a year since they were forced to forego all these innocent delights which are so congenial to their years and tastes, to sacrifice to the parade of the drawing-room and levee. The recollection of these lost days as Mrs. W. calls them seems to fill her with regret, but the extensive knowledge she has gained in this general intercourse with persons from all parts of the world, has made her a most interesting companion, and having a vastly retentive memory, she presents an entire history of half a century. . . .

"Even friends who make a point of visiting him are left much to themselves, indeed scarcely see him from breakfast to dinner, unless he engages them in a ride, which is very agreeable to him; but from dinner till tea our time is most charmingly spent. Indeed one evening the General was so fascinating and drew my husband out into so many old stories relating to several campaigns where they had been much together."

Thus, at home in the beloved estate, surrounded by friends, the wife of his youth by his side, engaged in the small but to him important tasks of looking after buildings, the farm, the stock, arranging his papers, talking to visitors, receiving the adulation of an admiring world, Washington, at last at peace, passed the remaining days of his life; days not to be long, but a period filled with the quiet happiness of knowing he had measured up to one of the greatest responsibilities ever put on the shoulders of mortal man.

Washington's home life shows him as a lover of the fireside; a domestic-minded householder; a man careful of his property, but generous with his servants; a devoted husband; a father whose loving kindness was no less that the relationship was not of blood; a man who loved the outdoors, the earth, the growing grain, the wild game; a hospitable man who offered the best he had in happiness that there were many who enjoyed breaking bread with him; a man to whom church and divine worship were a part of life. His home was refuge and a haven of peace and joy; he left it with regret, he returned to it as to a heaven on earth. No glimpses we have of the great warrior and statesman across the years are more intimate, none more charming, than those of Washington the husband, the devoted father of children not his own, the host, the home lover.

Part II

Fraternal Life

FREEMASONRY

So obviously a man's man, a soldier, a statesman, a planter, a diplomat, a thinker of great thoughts of government and his people, it is no wonder that the fraternal side of life made to Washington a powerful appeal; no wonder that the Ancient Craft of Freemasonry should have become so interwoven with his life. But particularly is it natural that a man who so loved his home, and whose religious feeling was so strong, should turn to the lodge for this particular variety of spiritual strength, which, to many, comes from no other place.

The effect upon character produced by a man's religion and church affiliations can only be measured by the yard stick of a man's reputation; few great men have set down in black and white those things of the spirit which, intimate and personal, are the very man himself. The same may be said of a man's Freemasonry. What it is "in his heart" can only be judged by the externals. Judging by this standard Washington frequently expressed his love and veneration for his Masonry and his lodge; many of his closest friends and associates, his generals and military aides in the Revolution were of the Ancient Craft, and his whole life of consecration and service to his fellowmen carried out the ideals which radiate from the Masonic Altar.

Members of the Ancient Craft understand why Freemasonry made so great an appeal to the great leader but anyone who will read even a little of the history of Freemasonry will readily comprehend why this body of truth, this organization of great teaching and high endeavor, this crystallization of moral ideals, was at once a magnet and a comfort to Washington.

MOTHER GRAND LODGE

Seventeen Hundred and Seventeen is the dividing line between before and after; the old Freemasonry and the new; an operative Craft slowly expiring and one which began to grow with a new vitality; between the last lingering remains of operative Freemasonry and a Craft wholly speculative.

No man knows the events which led up to the formation of the first Grand Lodge in London. No minutes were kept during its first six years. The Constitutions, first published in 1723, were republished fifteen years after. In this second edition of 1738 is only a meager record of the first meetings of the Grand Lodge.

In modern perspective a Grand Lodge is as much a part of the existing order of things as a state or federal government. In 1717 it was a new idea, accompanied by many other new ideas. When Washington became a Mason, Virginia had no Grand Lodge. Some men, some set of men, saw that if the ancient Order were not to die it must be given a new life through a new organization. Doubtless they were influenced by Mother Kilwinning Lodge of Scotland, which had assumed and exercised certain functions in regard to her daughter lodges, all of which had Kilwinning as a part of their name and apparently of their obedience.

The newly formed Grand Lodge in London went the whole way. It proposed to and did take command of its lodges. It branched out beyond the jurisdiction originally proposed "within ten miles of London" and invaded the Provinces. It gave enormous powers to the Grand Master. It prohibited the working of the "Master's Part" in private lodges, thus throwing back to the ancient Annual Assemblies. It divided the Craft into Entered Apprentices and Fellowcrafts. It resolved "against all Politicks as what never yet conduced to the welfare of the Lodge and never will." This was a highly important declaration at the time when every organization in England was taking part in politics, especially in the Jacobite struggle against the House of Hanover.

This prohibition of "politicks" in the lodge had much to do with making Freemasonry a refuge to men like Washington, Marshall, Lafayette, Revere, Warren, Franklin—statesmen and soldiers who had enough of politics in daily life and must have looked with great pleasure on meetings of their lodges where politics were not discussed. What a relief it must have been to the great leader to mingle "on the level" with men of all political faiths, secure in the knowledge that here was one place where neither religious nor political opinions could divide mind from mind!

THE RELIGION OF FREEMASONRY

Finally, Grand Lodge erased the ancient Charge "to be true to God and Holy Church" and substituted this Charge:

"A Mason is oblig'd, by his Tenure to obey the moral Law; and if he rightly understands the Art, he will never be a stupid Atheist, nor an irreligious Libertine. But though in ancient Times Masons were charg'd in every Country to be of the Religion of that Country or Nation; whatever it was, yet 'tis now thought more expedient only to oblige them to that Religion in which all Men agree, leaving their particular Opinions to themselves; that is to be good Men and true, or Men of Honour and Honesty, by whatever Denominations or Persuasions they may be distinguish'd; whereby Masonry becomes the Center of Union, and the Means of conciliating true Friendship among Persons that must have remain'd at a perpetual Distance."

This Charge was of unparalleled importance; it founded modern Speculative Freemasonry on the rock of non-sectarianism and the brotherhood of all men who believe in a common Father, regardless of His name, or the way in which He is worshipped.

Here again the Mother Grand Lodge did something which was profoundly to affect the First President. That Washington was deeply and sincerely religious is doubted by none who read his diaries and letters. When he could not go to one church, he went to another, and worshipped apparently with equal satisfaction, no matter at what altar he knelt. It seems obvious, then, that the Craft which offered only the doctrine of a universal Father, leaving to men to name Him as they would, a place where each brother might worship as he would, must have made mighty appeal to Washington by this very tolerant and broad-minded attitude. All Washington's life was a demonstration of his belief in the equality and the brotherhood of men under one common Father. The wonder would have been if he had not appreciated the Order of which those principles are foundation stones.

Between 1717 and 1751 the Craft spread rapidly, not only in England but on the continent and in the colonies, especially colonial America, where both time and people, conditions and social life provided fallow ground for the seeds of Freemasonry. But in spite of a new life and the wise counsels of brethren who restricted the acts if not the power of the new Grand Lodge, all was not plain sailing. Dissensions appeared. Causes of friction, if not numerous, were important and went deep. In 1751 a rival Grand Lodge was formed. It came into being with a brilliant stroke, for it chose the name "The Most Antient and Honorable Fraternity of Free and Accepted Masons." Calling itself "Antient" and the other body "Modern" at once enlisted the support of hundreds of brethren who did not go beneath the surface to learn which was really which. Then arose this peculiar and confused terminology; the original, the older, the most ancient Grand Lodge, was called the "Modern" Grand Lodge, and the newer body was called "Antient."

The new Grand Lodge kept the religious issue alive; by implication it made the "Moderns" seem anti-religious. The "Antients" were a Christian body and its Constitutions and its documents contained many distinctly Christian sentiments and references.

The benefits which came from this schism seem today to be greater than the evils. When one Grand Lodge established lodges on war ships, the other formed army lodges which carried Freemasonry to far places; when one body started a school for girls, the other organized a school for boys—both still in existence, by the way!—as one Grand Lodge reached out to the Provinces the other cultivated Scotland and Ireland. Both worked indefatigably in the American colonies.

The final reconciliation took place in Freemasons' Hall in London, on St. John's Day, December 27, 1813. The two Grand Lodges filed together into the Hall; the articles of Union were read, the Duke of Kent retired as Grand Master in favor of the Duke of Sussex, who was elected Grand Master of the United Grand Lodge.

A united Freemasonry agreed that forever more it would have no religious tests and would "welcome to her doors and admit to her privileges worthy men of all creeds and of every race." The "Antient" Grand Lodge, which had been so aggressively Christian, made no difficulties over this significant and important ground of difference.

In 1815 a new Book of Constitutions proclaimed to all the world forever the non-sectarian character of Freemasonry in this Charge concerning God and religion:

"Let a man's religion or mode of worship be what it may, he is not excluded from the Order, provided he believes in the glorious Architect of heaven and earth, and practice the sacred duties of morality."

IN THE NEW WORLD

Freemasonry came to America just before Washington was born, as an organization in which no religious tests were involved, except the fundamental belief in the Great Architect of the Universe. It taught morality, brotherly love, mutual help. It inculcated patriotism. It selected its members most carefully for character, reliability, manhood. It speedily became a meeting ground for men of diverse minds, characters, ideals, who found then, as men have always found, that in the lodge where all meet "on the level" the necessary social, monetary, and other distinctions of civil life could drop away and allow mind to meet with mind and man with man, untroubled by artificial barriers.

Naturally this appeal to Washington was great; Washington, who proved so well how democratic an aristocrat may be, how the qualities of heart and mind transcend those of influence and wealth.

FREEMASONRY IN WASHINGTON'S DAY

With the present Grand Lodges in every state, with Masonic Temples of beauty and permanency dotting the land everywhere, with a great body of Masonic literature, Masonic libraries, historians and research workers, with jurisdictional lines tightly drawn and a Fraternity organized, governed, and conducted the world over in unity in essentials, it is rather difficult to picture the Fraternity as it was in Washington's day. The brethren of the colonies necessarily conducted their affairs with due regard to the physical, governmental, and economic conditions which surrounded them. Travel was difficult. Roads were few, poor, and often dangerous. Railroads, telegraph, the telephone were unknown, and mail slow and often unreliable. The ties which bound the colonies to the mother country, strong in fraternal feeling and social intercourse, economically grew weaker as the eighteenth century passed its half way mark. Freemasonry was then far less democratic and all-inclusive than it is today; common dangers, the need of an intimate and select association of leaders, and the usage of the times, added to the schism in the Mother Grand Lodge of England, combined to make secrecy in non-essentials seem as important as in the real apophetta of the Craft. The result is a paucity of Masonic record of early days which is more or less the despair of the historian.

Unquestionably the conduct of the Craft when Washington was raised, as an organization, was far less formal than today. Meetings were often called by word of mouth. Expenses were born as much by fines and by contributions from those present at the meeting as from fixed dues. Meeting places were often in taverns and inns (following the early custom of English lodges). During the Revolution lodge meetings were often held in tents, in private homes, even in barns.

During the late colonial days (1750 to 1760) the colonies of Maryland and Virginia flowered to their full growth as the homes of aristocrats who carried into colonial life the principles and practice of the better classes of English society from which they sprang. Noblesse oblige was a watchword. Dignity, hospitality, mutual respect, and personal independence were considered of the highest importance.

The Freemasonry of the times naturally partook of the general character of the life surrounding it. Brethren lived well; Masonic brethren were convivial and Masonic banquets frequent. Society was exclusive and bound with the obligations of class and caste; the Freemasonry of Washington's time was small and select. Travel was difficult; the personal independence of planters was highly esteemed. Hence Lodges met infrequently, and often with no better authority than the mutual desire of brethren living in the same neighborhood to foregather together about the Three Great Lights.

Jacob Hugo Tatsch (Freemasonry in the Thirteen Colonies) says:

"American Freemasonry, like its progenitor in old England, is the outgrowth of the times in which it had its roots. It was not superimposed upon the New World as a finished and perfect institution; rather, it was the survival of principles which men had learned in their association as builders, both literally and figuratively. Never, in the history of the Craft, have Freemasons been found assembled in questionable places. The inns and taverns which we may now regard askance are dubious locations only in the light of the present day standards; the free and convivial habits of early Freemasons are only a reflection of the times as a whole. Forced to meet in public houses, because there were no other places, the brethren withdrew to upper chambers by themselves, and carried on their labors safe from the eyes and ears of the curious. The excellent reputation which Freemasons of all ages have enjoyed is proof of the worth of the institution, for the prestige of the Craft is only the sum total of that possessed by the individual members. Friendship, morality and brotherly love have always been fostered where Freemasons fore-gathered. The story of the Craft in America furnishes no exceptions."

It was against this background that George Washington, aged twenty, became an Entered Apprentice, a Fellow Craft, and a Master Mason in 1752 and 1753.

From the minutes of "The Lodge at Fredericksburg" (Now Fredericksburg Lodge, No. 4) the following is quoted verbatim:

"THE LODGE AT FREDERICKSBURG"

The first meeting of the Lodge at Fredericksburg was held September 1, 1752 (o. s.) Modern lodges record in their minutes full information of their first meetings but, as has been noted, the practice in the early days of Freemasonry in the colonies was to record only the barest essentials, and not always even these. Hence the first minutes show only a list of names of officers and members.

We do not know by what authority the Lodge at Fredericksburg held its first meetings. Hayden, Washington and His Masonic Compeers, states that the lodge was organized "under authority from Thomas Oxnard, Provincial Grand Master at Boston." Thomas Oxnard was Provincial Grand Master at Boston when the Lodge at Fredericksburg first met, and an oral tradition has been handed down from generation to generation that the Lodge at Fredericksburg worked under a dispensation from the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts.

Whether the tradition reflects a fact, or whether the brethren in Fredericksburg met and formed a lodge by mutual consent, under what was then "immemorial usage," they did meet and did Masonic work for nearly five years before they felt the need for "an ample charter."

On April 4, 1757, the Lodge of Fredericksburg appropriated seven pounds to pay the expenses of obtaining this instrument, and on July 21 of the following year, the Grand Lodge of Scotland issued that historic instrument which is now so dearly prized by Fredericksburg Lodge, No. 4. The charter is signed by "Geo. Frayser, Dep'ty G Master. Rich'd Tod, Sub. G.M. David Ross, S.G.W. Will'm McGhie, J.G.W." The charter provides, among other things, that the brethren:

"Record in their Books this Charter, with their own Private Regulations and By-laws and their whole acts and proceedings from time to time as they occur and not to desert their said Lodge hereby Constituted or form themselves into separate meetings without the Consent and Approbation of their Master and Wardens for the time being."

In spite of his mandatory language, the secretary failed to record the charter in his minutes! Luckily, the charter itself is in an excellent state of preservation despite its one hundred and seventy-five years of existence and its danger of destruction through the wars of 1776, 1812, and 1861-65.

BY-LAWS

The quaint by-laws (adopted 1769) reflect the character of the Masonry of Washington's time. They are short enough to quote in full:

Rules and Regulations for Fredericksburg Lodge

"1. That the meetings in course be the first Friday of every month, from March to September at 6 o'clock in the evening, and from September to March at 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

"2. Every member of the Lodge shall pay three Shillings Quarterly for expenses thereof, Vist, at lady day, Midsummer, Michaelmas, and Christmas—Extra Expenses to be defrayed by such members as are present on these Occasions.

"3. Every new made Brother shall pay the Fee of three Pistoles for being admitted to the first degree, The Fee of one Pistole for being passed to the Second and the same sum on being raised to the third. These Fees must be received the night of his admission, passing, or raising, or the Brothers who recommend to be responsible for them.

"4. Any Brother not made in this Lodge, Petitioning to become a member thereof, shall upon his being received as such (after due examination) pay the Fee of one Pistole. But Brethren made here may become members without further Fee than that of their admission.

"5. No visiting Brother is to be admitted without due Examination, unless vouched for by a Brother present; nor more than once without paying One Shilling and Three Pence.

"6. No person to be admitted to become a Mason in this Lodge under the age of Twenty One years on any account whatever, being Contrary to the Constitutions of Masonry, nor without the unanimous Consent of the Lodge by Ballot.

"7. All Fees and Quarterages to be paid to the Treasurer for the time being. His Acc't to be Annually examined and Balanced on the Night his Office expires."

It is particularly interesting to note by-law Number 6, which provides that no one is "to be admitted to become a Mason" in the Lodge under twenty-one years of age. Washington was only twenty when he received the degrees, sixteen years before these By-laws were adopted.

MASONIC LIFE

Any condensed history of Washington's fraternal life must necessarily omit most of his Masonic correspondence and many occasions which have Masonic significance, even if of minor importance.

Not much is known of Washington's Masonic life during the quarter century following his raising. Tradition puts him in various English Army Lodges during this time, but the paucity of early records prevents definite statements. While living at Mount Vernon he was miles from the nearest lodge, and travel was difficult in those days. Nevertheless his presence at a number of lodge meetings in Fredericksburg is recorded, and he attended a number of public Masonic functions, such as the Festival of St. John the Baptist, June 24, 1779, with American Union Lodge at the Robinson House on the Hudson, New York; the Festival of St. John the Evangelist, December 27, 1779, with American Union Lodge at Morris Hotel, Morristown, New Jersey; the Festival of St. John the Evangelist, December 27, 1782, with King Solomon's Lodge at Poughkeepsie, New York; the Festival of St. John the Baptist, June 24, 1784, with Lodge No. 39 at Alexandria, Virginia, and the Masonic funeral of Brother William Ramsay, February 12, 1785, at Alexandria.

Most important Masonically is his acceptance of the Charter Mastership of the Lodge at Alexandria.

For Alexandria, Virginia, was the background for much of Washington's private life. Christ Church, one of the many in which he showed devotional interest, was (and is) there. In 1766 Washington was elected one of the trustees of the town; here lived many of his personal friends. Here, too, was organized Alexandria Lodge No. 39 (later to become Alexandria-Washington Lodge No. 22.)

In 1782 six brethren of Alexandria petitioned the Provincial Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania for a charter; in spite of the fact that the Grand Lodge of Virginia was organized in 1777-8, the Provincial Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, under the Grand Lodge of England, granted the charter.

According to the Proceedings, Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, February 3, 1783:

"A petition being preferred to this Grand Lodge on the 2nd Sept. last, from several brethren of Alexandria, in Virginia, for a warrant to hold a Lodge there, which was ordered to lie over to the next communication, in consequence of Bro. Adam, the proposed Master thereof, being found to possess his knowledge of Masonry in a clandestine manner, since which the said Bro. Adams, having gone through the several steps of Ancient Masonry in Lodge No. 2, under the Jurisdiction of this R. W. Grand Lodge, further prays that a warrant may now be granted for the purposes mentioned in said petition.

"Ordered, That the prayer of said petition be complied with, and that the Secretary present Brother Adams with a warrant to hold a Lodge of Ancient Masons in Alexandria, in Virginia, to be numbered 39.

"Bro. Robert Adam was then duly recommended, and presented in form to the R. W. Grand Master in the chair, for installation as Master of Lodge No. 39, to be held in the borough of Alexandria, in Fairfax County, Virginia, and was accordingly installed as such."

The word "clandestine" falls with unhappy significance upon modern Masonic ears, but it did not in those days mean quite the same thing as it does to Masons of this age. Prior to the "Lodge of Reconciliation" and the formation of the United Grand Lodge of England in 1813, the two Grand Bodies of England, the "Moderns" (who were the older) and the "Antients" (who were the younger, schismatic body) each considered the other "clandestine." Brother Adam's Mother Lodge is not known, but as he lived for a time in Annapolis, where a "Modern" lodge worked, it is probable it was here that he received the degrees which the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania ("Antients") considered "clandestine." Transition of Masons from lodges of one obedience to those of the other was neither infrequent nor difficult, so that "clandestine" could not then have had the connotation of irregularity and disgrace which it has with Freemasons of today.

ALEXANDRIA LODGE CHARTERED BY PENNSYLVANIA

The Lodge at Alexandria was chartered in 1783 and met for the first time on February 25, when four of the petitioners and two members of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania opened on the Entered Apprentice's Degree, read the charter giving them life and the number 39, and proceeded to exercise jurisdiction "in the borough of Alexandria or within four miles of the same."

In a very few years the brethren of Alexandria Lodge No. 39 were informed that the Provincial Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania was initiating steps to become sovereign and independent of the Grand Lodge of England. Alexandria Lodge was intensely interested in the proposal, but somewhat doubtful as to its Masonic propriety. The Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania stated, as one reason for the proposed step, that as this country was independent of all other countries, Masonic lodges should also be independent, in order that Masonic obligations might never conflict with those owed to the mother country. To this Alexandria Lodge No. 39 returned this fine and spirited answer:

"That we are as separate and independent of Great Britain, as of Denmark, is politically true, and as we owe them no subjection as a State or Nation, how can the subjects of the one owe any of the subjects of the other? If it is answered, none; then, query, how this political truth may, with propriety be applied to the Masonic Order, who, as they do not intermeddle with State matters, ought not to draw arguments from thence to dismember themselves from the jurisdiction of those they hold under, except from similar burdens, or impositions exacted inconsistent with Masonry. But those, no doubt, are the matters to be discussed. We have only to request, (In case we should stand unrepresented,) that you will inform us of the result of your deliberations."

The Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania dissolved and reformed, a Sovereign and Independent Jurisdiction (1786). The new Grand Lodge required all charters issued by its predecessor turned in, that new ones might be issued. This did not suit Alexandria Lodge, No. 39. The Grand Lodge of Virginia had been formed shortly before (1778). At first holding aloof from the new Virginia Grand Lodge (many lodges in Virginia did the same, to satisfy themselves that the Virginia Grand Lodge would live and grow) but now faced with the parting of the ways, Alexandria Lodge decided to petition the Grand Lodge of its own state for a charter, rather than receive a new one at the hands of Pennsylvania.

CHARTER WORSHIPFUL MASTER

Right here occurred that step in the affairs of Masonry which was to have so far-reaching an effect upon the Fraternity. Desiring to honor the man and brother Mason who had delivered the nation from bondage and become the foremost citizen of the new country, the brethren of Alexandria asked Washington's consent to name him as their first Worshipful Master under the new Charter.

The Masonic world knows the result. On April 28, 1788, Edmund Randolph, "Governor of the Commonwealth aforesaid and Grand Master of the Most Ancient and Honorable Society of Freemasons within the same, by and with the consent of the Grand Lodge of Virginia," issued a charter to the petitioning brethren, constituting them a lodge of Freemasons "by the name, title and designation of Alexandria Lodge, No. 22." George Washington was named as the Worshipful Master and was unanimously elected Worshipful Master to succeed himself December 20, 1788, serving in all about twenty months. He was inaugurated as President April 30, 1789, thus becoming the first and so far the only brother to be President of the Nation and Master of his Lodge at the same time.

After Washington's death, the brethren desired to change the name to Alexandria-Washington Lodge, No. 22. The Grand Lodge of Virginia consented, and asked for the old charter, in which was named George Washington, "late General and Commander in chief of the forces of the United States of America" as the first Master, so that a new charter might be issued.

Alexandria Lodge, No. 22, did not wish to give up this historic instrument, nor did the plea it made fall upon unsympathetic ears. The Grand Lodge of Virginia permitted the Lodge to retain the old charter, and yet change its name; the Grand Lodge Resolution effecting this unusual act reads:

"Resolved, That the said Lodge be permitted to assume the said name, and that it be henceforth denominated the Alexandria-Washington Lodge, No. 22, and that an authenticated copy of this resolution be attached to their said Charter." And Alexandria-Washington Lodge No. 22, it has remained from that day to this.

LAYING THE CAPITOL CORNER STONE

George Washington was always a busily occupied man. The cares of the Presidency, the duties of his military service, the direction of his personal fortune and his estate at Mount Vernon, his large correspondence, his home life and church associations left him little leisure. The wonder is not that he attended Masonic functions so seldom, but that his complicated and much-engaged life permitted him to foregather so much with his brethren, write so many Masonic letters, consider his Freemasonry so important.

That it was vital in his eyes has been shown in a hundred ways, but perhaps never more than on that occasion which links together Washington, the Mason, and Washington, the President, the laying of the corner stone of the United States Capitol, September 18, 1793.

This ceremony, so important both historically and Masonically, was conducted by the Grand Lodge of Maryland, which body invited President Washington to act as Grand Master pro tem. It was reported in the Columbian Mirror and Alexandria Gazette of September 23, 1793, as follows:

"On Wednesday, one of the grandest Masonic processions took place, for the purpose of laying the cornerstone of the Capitol of the United States, which, perhaps, was ever exhibited on the like important occasion. About ten o'clock, Lodge No. 9 was visited by that congregation so graceful to the craft, Lodge No. 22, of Virginia, with all their officers and regalia; and directly afterwards appeared on the southern banks of the grand river Potomac, one of the finest companies of Volunteer Artillery that has been lately seen, parading to receive the President of the United States, who shortly came in sight with his suite, to whom the artillery paid their military honors, and his Excellency and suite crossed the river and was received in Maryland by the officers and brethren of No. 22, Virginia, and No. 9, Maryland, whom the President headed, preceded by a band of music; the rear brought up by the Alexandria Volunteer Artillery, with grand solemnity of march, proceeded to the President's Square, in the city of Washington, where they were met and saluted by No. 15, of the city of Washington, in all their elegant badges and clothing, headed by Brother Joseph Clarke, Rt. Wor. G. M. p. t., and conducted to a large lodge prepared for the purpose of their reception. After a short space of time, by the vigilance of Brother Clotworthy Stephenson, Grand Marshall p. t., the brotherhood and other bodies were disposed in a second order of procession, which took place amidst a brilliant crowd of spectators of both sexes, according to the following arrangement, viz.:

The Surveying Department of the city of Washington.

Mayor and Corporation of Georgetown.
Virginia Artillery.
Commissioners of the city of Washington, and their Attendants.

Stone-cutters—Mechanics.
Masons of the first degree.
Bible, etc., on grand cushions.
Deacons, with staffs of office.
Masons of the second degree.
Stewards, with wands.
Masons of the third degree.
Wardens, with truncheons.
Secretaries, with tools of office.
Past Masters, with their regalia.

Band of music.

Lodge No. 22, Virginia, disposed in their own order.

Corn, wine, and oil.

Grand Master pro tem. Brother George Washington, and Worshipful Master of No. 22, of Virginia.

Grand Sword Bearer.

"The procession marched two abreast, in the greatest solemn dignity, with music playing, drums beating, colors flying, and spectators rejoicing, from the President's Square to the Capitol, in the city of Washington, where the Grand Marshal ordered a halt, and directed each file in the procession to incline two steps, one to the right and one to the left, and face each other, which formed a hollow oblong square, through which the Grand Sword-Bearer led the van; followed by the Grand Master pro tem. on the left, the President of the United States in the center, and the Worshipful Master of No. 22, Virginia, on the right; all the other orders that composed the procession advanced in the reverse of their order of march from the President's Square to the southeast corner of the Capitol, and the artillery filed off to a destined ground to display their maneuvers and discharge their cannon. The President of the United States, the Grand Master pro tem., and the Worshipful Master of No. 22, taking their stand to the east of a large stone, and all the Craft forming a circle westward, stood a short time in solemn order.

"The artillery discharged a volley. The Grand Marshal delivered the Commissioners a large silver plate, with an inscription thereon, which the Commissioners ordered to be read, and was as follows:

"This southeast corner-stone of the Capitol of the United States of America in the city of Washington, was laid on the 18th day of September, 1793, in the thirteenth year of American Independence, in the first year of the second term of the presidency of George Washington, whose virtues in the civil administration of his country have been as conspicuous and beneficial as his military valor and prudence have been useful in establishing her liberties, and in the year of Masonry 5793, by the President of the United States, in concert with the Grand Lodge of Maryland, several Lodges under its jurisdiction, and Lodge No. 22, from Alexandria, Virginia. Thomas Johnson, David Steuart and Daniel Carroll, Commissioners. Joseph Clark, R.W.G.M. pro tem., and James Hoban and Stephen Hallate, Architects. Colin Williamson, Master Mason."

"The artillery discharged a volley. The plate was then delivered to the President, who, attended by the Grand Master pro tem. and three Most Worshipful Masters, descended to the cavazion trench and deposited the plate, and laid it on the corner-stone of the Capitol of the United States of America, on which were deposited corn, wine and oil, when the whole congregation joined in reverential prayer, which was succeeded by Masonic chanting honors, and a volley from the artillery.

"The President of the United States, and his attendant brethren, ascended from the cavazion to the east of the corner-stone, and there the Grand Master pro tem., elevated on a triple rostrum, delivered an oration fitting the occasion, which was received with brotherly love and commendation. At intervals during the delivery of the oration, several volleys were discharged by the artillery. The ceremony ended in prayer, Masonic chanting honors, and a 15-volley from the artillery.

"The whole company retired to an extensive booth, where an ox of five hundred pounds weight was barbecued, of which the company generally partook, with every abundance of other recreation. The festival concluded with fifteen successive volleys from the artillery, whose military discipline and maneuvers merit every commendation. Before dark the whole company departed with joyful hopes of the production of their labor."

Some confusion has resulted in the minds of many Masonic students at the apparent contradictions in this account of just who acted as Grand Master pro tem. But there need be none. George Washington, President of the United States, and Past Master of Alexandria Lodge No. 22, was invited by the Grand Master pro tem. of Maryland to act as Grand Master and lay the corner stone of the capitol.

The Grand Lodge of Maryland was represented by R.W. Brother Joseph Clark, as Grand Master pro tem., and he delegated his authority during the actual corner-stone laying ceremonies to Worshipful Brother George Washington, who thus became Grand Master of Maryland, pro tem.

The confusion has resulted from the last line but one in the list of those "in the second order of procession," which some have taken to mean that George Washington was the only representative of the Grand Lodge of Maryland at the corner stone laying. It would have been most unusual, and most discourteous to the President, had this been so. It was not so. R.W. Brother Joseph Clark acted as Grand Master pro tem for the Grand Lodge of Maryland, until the actual ceremony of corner stone laying commenced, when, as we read, "the plate was then delivered to the President, who, attended by the Grand Master P.T. and three most Worshipful Masters, descended to the cavazion trench and deposited the plate, and laid it on the corner stone of the Capitol of the United States, etc."

HISTORIC GAVEL

The marble gavel used by Washington on this occasion was presented by him to Brother Valentine Reintzel, then Worshipful Master of Lodge No. 9 of Georgetown (now Potomac Lodge No. 5) who later became the first Grand Master of the District of Columbia. The gavel is the most treasured possession of Potomac Lodge, as are the silver trowel, the square and level made for the purpose by John Daffey with which the corner stone was laid and the Watson Apron and also the sash, worn by Washington at this ceremony, the chief jewels in the collection of Masonic treasures of Washington, in the possession of the Alexandria-Washington Lodge No. 22.

WASHINGTON'S MASONIC LETTERS

Washington wrote many Masonic letters to lodges, Grand Lodges and brother Masons, on Masonic matters. Many of these documents are the priceless possessions of the nation, housed with loving care in the Library of Congress.

Brother Julius F. Sachse, as Librarian of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, under the auspices of that Grand Lodge and with the assistance of the Library of Congress, published these in a volume under the title of Washington's Masonic Correspondence.

From it the following list is taken of those Masonic letters and documents from the hand of the First President in the Library:

Draft of Letter to Watson and Cassoul, Nantes, France, August 10, 1782.

Letter to Alexandria Lodge, No. 39, Virginia, December 28, 1783.

Address from King David's Lodge, No. 1, Rhode Island, August 17, 1790, and Washington's reply.

Address from St. John's Lodge, No. 2, Newbern, North Carolina, April 20, 1791, and his reply.

Address from Prince George's Lodge (Moderns), Georgetown, South Carolina, April 30, 1791, and his reply.

Draft of reply to Grand Lodge of South Carolina, May 5, 1791.

Address from Grand Lodge of Georgia, May 14, 1791, and his reply.

Address from Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, March, 1792, and his reply.

Letter from G. W. Snyder to Washington, August 22, 1798.

Washington's reply to Snyder, September 25, 1798.

Washington's reply to Snyder's letter of October 17, 1798.

Other letters are treasured possessions of other depositories such as the Washington letter in the archives of the Grand Lodge of New York, which is the original letter to Watson and Cassoul.

Space forbids lengthy quotations from these letters, which breathe a spirit of love, admiration, and respect for the Craft he honored, and which honored him. A few expressions, however, may serve to show the general tenor of the whole.

On December 28, 1783, he wrote to Alexandria Lodge No. 39:

"I shall always feel pleasure when it may be in my power to render service to Lodge No. 39, and in every act of brotherly kindness to the Members of it."

On June 19, 1784, he wrote again:

"With pleasure, I received the invitation of the master and members of Lodge No. 39, to dine with them on the approaching anniversary of St. John the Baptist. If nothing unforeseen at present interferes, I shall have the honor of doing it."

Washington did attend this dinner at Wise's Tavern, and, returning to the lodge room was elected an Honorary Member of the lodge over which he was later to preside as its Master under a new charter from the Grand Lodge of Virginia.

In a letter of August 22nd, 1790, to King David's Lodge, Newport, Rhode Island, Washington wrote:

"Being persuaded that a just application of the principles, on which the Masonic Fraternity is founded, must be promotive of private virtue and public prosperity, I shall always be happy to advance the interests of the Society, and to be considered by them as a deserving brother."

To St. John's Lodge, Newbern, N. C., he wrote (1791):

"My best ambition having ever aimed at the unbiassed approbation of my fellow citizens, it is peculiarly pleasing to find my conduct so affectionately approved by a fraternity whose association is founded in justice and benevolence."

Prince George's Lodge No. 16, Georgetown, South Carolina, received the following expression in a letter in 1791:

"I am much obliged by your good wishes and reciprocate them with sincerity, assuring the fraternity of my esteem, I request them to believe that I shall always be ambitious of being considered a deserving Brother."

Washington responded to an address of Charleston, South Carolina, Masons in these terms:

"The fabric of our freedom is placed on the enduring basis of public virtue, and will, I fondly hope, long continue to protect the prosperity of the architects who raised it. I shall be happy on every occasion, to evince my regard for the Fraternity."

The Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania was the recipient of a choice Masonic sentiment in 1792:

"At the same time I request you will be assured of my best wishes and earnest prayers for your happiness while you remain in this terrestrial Mansion, and that we may thereafter meet as brethren in the Eternal Temple of the Supreme Architect."

Washington responded in part to the dedication of the Constitutions of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts in these words:

"It is most fervently to be wished, that the conduct of every member of the fraternity, as well as those publications that discover the principles which actuate them; may tend to convince mankind that the grand object of Masonry is to promote the happiness of the human race."

Washington wrote in his Diary, February 12, 1785:

"Received an Invitation to the Funeral of Willm. Ramsay, Esqr. of Alexandria, the oldest Inhabitt. of the Town; and went up. Walked in a procession as a free mason, Mr. Ramsay in his life being one, and now buried with the ceremonies and honors due to one."

WASHINGTON MASONIC PORTRAITS

Many artists and engravers have given to the world their conceptions of Washington the Freemason, and with the same right possessed by any painter to limn the features of any historic character. Only one of these, so far as we know, was painted from life, the august subject wearing the Masonic clothing of apron, sash, collar, and jewel. But many of our most cherished paintings, not only of Washington, but of other characters and events dear to our national history, are wholly imaginative; Washington Crossing the Delaware, Washington at Valley Forge, the Signing of the Declaration of Independence, the Spirit of '76, to mention but a few, are not actual records, but portrayals of facts as seen through the eyes of the artists.

The portrait of Washington in Masonic regalia is the Williams painting, now the

WASHINGTON THE PRESIDENT-MASON
From the painting by Hattie Burdette

most valuable and most cherished possession of Alexandria-Washington Lodge No. 22 of Alexandria, Va. This work of art is inscribed on the back "His Excellency George Washington Esquire President of the United States, aged 64—Williams Pinxit ad vivum in Philadelphia, September 18, 1794."

The portrait is not a flattering likeness, compared to the general conception of the First President. But it was undoubtedly a true portrait of the General in his old age. It was ordered by the lodge and accepted by it; in other words, by Washington's Masonic brethren, his friends, men who knew him well. It is not thinkable that men who venerated, revered, almost worshipped the great Washington should have accepted a portrait which was not a faithful transcript of his features as he then appeared.

If this is the only Masonic portrait for which Washington actually sat, it is but one of a large number which were made by adaptation or imagination. Among these, one of the most often printed and best known is the Kearny print, which is nothing more nor less than a rank plagiarism of what is known as the Stothard-Bartolozzi engraving, dated 1802. The original shows the Chevalier Bartholomew Ruspini leading two little girls from the Freemasons' Charity for Female Children, as the Royal Masonic Institution for Girls was then called, in a procession in Freemasons' Hall, London. The engraver substituted Washington for Rus-pini, and put portrait heads of noted Americans on the bodies of many men in the background. The picture is supposed to typify Masonic charity and was dedicated to the Grand Lodges of the United States.

A portrait of "Washington the President-Mason" has been painted by Miss Hattie Burdette of Washington, D. C., one of America's foremost painters of colonial subjects. Charles H. Callahan, Past Grand Master of Virginia, and an authority on the Masonic activities of George Washington, made the following comments on this painting:

"... the painting representing General George Washington as a Mason, executed by Miss Hattie Burdette, has been completed and so far as I am able to judge is a faithful and striking representation of Washington as Worshipful Master of the Alexandria Lodge in 1787-1788.

"Miss Burdette has pictured the great Mason standing in the old Lodge Room in Alexandria, Virginia, wearing the Cassoul apron, the jewel and the regalia which were the personal possessions of the renowned patriot and which are now cherished heirlooms of the Lodge. The General is represented as having just called the Lodge to prayer and is standing in front of the old chair which he presented to the Lodge upon his election, with his right hand holding the gavel and resting on the original pedestal.

"The painting represents Washington in the full vigor of his middle age and bears out in its environment and execution the richest of our local Masonic traditions. It is Washington the Mason true to life."

This full-length Masonic portrait has been approved by many leaders of the Craft and may be considered today as an authentic representation of George Washington as a Master Mason and the Master of his Lodge.

WASHINGTON MASONIC LEGENDS

The Masonic Fraternity has not been immune from tradition and mythology in which Washington has been a central figure. He has been said to have been a member of various lodges, other than Fredericksburg and Alexandria, but these are in all probability apochryphal—at least we have no evidence of such memberships. Thus, in 1851, the Freemasons' Monthly Magazine of Boston credits him with having "united" with a lodge in "one of the Royal Regiments quartered at Jamestown" (Va.). He was said by Grand Master Robert C. Scott of Virginia, in 1850, to have met in Yorktown Lodge No. 9 at Yorktown, with Lafayette, Marshall and Nelson, but the Grand Secretary of Virginia has no records to prove the statement. A certain Captain Hugh Malloy, of Ohio, is "said to have been" initiated in 1782 in General Washington's marquee, Washington presiding in person and performing the ceremonies! But again there is no evidence to sustain the contention that Washington held lodge meetings in his tent and conferred degrees.

Among the most cherished of these legendary Masonic happenings is that of the "Washington Masonic Cave," and enthusiastic believers in the facts point triumphantly to the cave to those who doubt. There is a cave, and it is called "Washington's Masonic Cave." It is near Charles Town, West Va. Henry Howe published Historical Collections of Virginia in 1849; from it is quoted:

"Washington's Masonic Cave is two and a half miles southeast of Charlestown. It is divided into several apartments, one of which is called the lodge-room. Tradition informs us that Washington, with others of the Masonic fraternity, held meetings in this cavern. In the spring of 1844 the Masons in this vicinity had a celebration there."

Still further "evidence" is presented to doubters by natives who show a signature "G. Washington" on the roof of the cavern. If it is objected that the printing bears no relationship to Washington's signature, the objectors are told that Washington was only sixteen when he "signed his name on the cave" and anyway, one cannot write well on a ceiling!

Washington is alleged by the historian Lossing to have received his degrees in the Morris Hotel, at Morristown, N. J., while the General had his headquarters at Freeman's Tavern, but in the face of absolute evidence that his degrees were given him in Fredericksburg years before, the story falls to the ground.

It would be pleasant to chronicle as truth the pretty story of Washington having received, if not "the degrees," at least "a degree" (Royal Arch?) in the Irish Military Lodge No. 227, "Lodge of Social and Military Virtues." Robertson's History of Freemasonry in Canada tells with some detail of a Bible this lodge possessed, on which Washington is supposed to have put his hands while receiving this "degree." The Bible is said to have been twice taken by the "enemy" and "returned to the regiment with all the honors of war."

Another Washington tradition, which has appeared in more than one form, is of his return, under a guard of honor, of Masonic property captured by his soldiers in battle. The Freemasons' Quarterly Review, London, 1834, printed the following story of this return of a lodge chest supposedly lost by British soldiers in an American engagement in 1777:

"The surprise, the feeling of both officers and men may be imagined, when they perceived the flag of truce that announced this elegant compliment from their noble opponent, but still more noble brother. It was a scene of moral beauty; a triumphant vindication of the purity of Masonic principles. The guard of honor with their flutes playing a sacred march—the chest containing the constitution and the implements of the Craft borne aloft, like another ark of the covenant, equally by Englishmen and Americans, who, lately engaged in the strife of war, now marched through the enfiled ranks of the gallant regiment, that with presented arms and colors hailed the glorious act by cheers, which the sentiment rendered sacred as the hallelujahs of an angel's song."

It must not be forgotten that the early records of Freemasonry are few and far between; that much that was history was not recorded; that our brethren of colonial days regarded much that we think may be published with propriety, of such a secret character that it must go unwritten. It is possible that these stories of Washington are not myths, but legends, begun in fact, yet carried down the years by that "word of mouth" which is at once the method of teaching the secrets of Freemasonry, and the preserver of a thousand stories of history dear to us all, of which the cold evidence of black and white is missing.

Many well-informed brethren believe that the weight of such evidence as there is, is preponderantly on the side of Washington's having received the Mark Master's Degree in the Irish Military Lodge No. 227 and that the stories of the return of the captured Bible and the lodge chest are actual facts, even though the accounts which we have were written long after they are said to have occurred.

Into such matters this little history cannot attempt to go; it is at least safe to say that in the absence of real evidence to the contrary, there is nothing out of keeping with these stories and what is known of Washington's Masonry and his sterling character as a man and a Freemason. Not from these pages shall any reader have taken from him that faith in the truth of these legends of what Washington did in Masonry, merely because there is no cold type, official document, or contemporary record to substantiate them.

WASHINGTON MASONIC BIBLES

Freemasons revere the Holy Bible—"The Great Light in Masonry"—not only for its religious but for its Masonic significance. American Freemasons especially venerate two bibles intimately associated with Washington; that on which he received his degrees, and that on which he took the oath of office as President.

Fredericksburg Lodge has carefully preserved the original Bible on which Washington was obligated as a Freemason. It has traveled much, always with a guard of honor from the Lodge; perhaps its most significant journey was to the Grand Lodge of New York, November 4, 1920, when, on Washington's Masonic birthday, the historic old volume (printed in 1668) lay side by side on the Altar with the Bible of St. John's Lodge, on which Washington took the oath of office as President.

This ceremony took place in New York City, April 30, 1789. Chancellor Robert R. Livingston, then Grand Master of Masons in New York, administered the oath. General Jacob Morton, Worshipful Master of St. John's Lodge, No. 1, brought the Bible from his Lodge to Federal Hall, where Washington, his hand upon the Holy Book, obligated himself as First President of the United States. On the fly leaf of the old volume (printed 1767) is recorded the story of the Great Leader's oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

WASHINGTON'S MASONIC APRONS

That his brethren delighted to pay honor to their distinguished brother in Masonic as well as political, social and military ways, is evidenced by many documents, addresses, dedications, and gifts. Among the latter, the two Masonic aprons which have such Masonic historical importance are particularly to be noted.

The first of these (chronologically) was the gift of Brothers Elkanah Watson and M. Cassoul, of Nantes, France. These men were confidential agents of the American government during the Revolution. Watson was an American and personal friend and admirer of Washington. This apron (now in possession of Alexandria-Washington Lodge, No. 22) reached General Washington when in camp at Newburgh, New York, accompanied by the following letter:

"To His Excellency, General Washington, "America.

"Most Illustrious and Respected Brother:

"In the moment when all Europe admire and feel the effects of your glorious efforts in support of American liberty, we hasten to offer for your acceptance a small pledge of our homage. Zealous lovers of liberty and its institutions, we have experienced the most refined joy in seeing our chief and brother stand forth in its defence, and in defence of a new-born nation of Republicans.

"Your glorious career will not be confined to the protection of American liberty, but its ultimate effect will extend to the whole human family, since Providence has evidently selected you as an instrument in his hands, to fulfill his eternal decrees.

"It is to you, therefore, the glorious orb of America, we presume to offer Masonic ornaments, as an emblem of your virtues. May the Grand Architect of the Universe be the Guardian of your precious days, for the glory of the Western Hemisphere and the entire universe. Such are the vows of those who have the favor to be by all the known numbers.

"Your affectionate brothers,

"Watson & Cassoul.

"East of Nantes, 23d 1st Month, 5782."

To this Washington wrote the following reply:

"State of New York Augt 10th, 1782.

"Gentn.

"The Masonick Ornamts which accompanied your Brotherly Address of the 23d of Jany last, tho' elegant in themselves, were rendered more valuable by the flattering sentiments, and affectionate manner, in which they were presented.—

"If my endeavours to avert the evil, with which this Country was threatned, by a deliberate plan of Tyranny, should be crowned with the success that is wished—The praise is due to the Grand Architect of the Universe; who did not see fit to suffer his superstructures and justice, to be subjected to the Ambition of the Princes of this World, or to the rod of oppression, in the hands of any power upon Earth.—

"For your affectionate Vows, permit me to be grateful;—and offer mine for true Brothers in all parts of the world; and to assure you of the sincerity with which I am

"Yrs

"G. Washington

"Messrs. Watson & Cosson

"East of Nantes."

Julius F. Sachse in Washington's Masonic Correspondence, says:

"This autograph letter . . . is now in the possession of the Grand Lodge of New York, . . . It is written upon two pages of an ordinary letter sheet, and was a copy of one written by Washington, with which he was not entirely satisfied, as shown by the changes made in the text before it was sent to France. The first copy Washington retained, and is now in the Library of Congress."

Washington wore this apron as Master of his Lodge, and also at the laying of the corner stone of the National Capitol.

The Lafayette Masonic Apron is now a treasured possession of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania. It was embroidered by Madame Lafayette and presented by her distinguished husband, Washington's brother Mason, in August, 1784, when he visited Mount Vernon. Masonically, the Lafayette Apron is the more interesting of the two, as its embroideries picture many familiar Masonic emblems, among them the Sprig of Acacia, Four Pillars surmounted by globes, the Square and the Compasses, the All Seeing Eye, the Anchor, held by a figure of Hope, a Cable Tow, a Setting Maul, the Pentalfa, the Mosaic Pavement, a Flight of Five Steps, the Trowel, the Forty-seventh Problem, and, most interesting of all, a Beehive in a circle on the rounded flap of the apron, surrounded by the letters H T W S S T K S, familiar to all Masons of the Royal Arch.

The Royal Arch Degree was conferred in Fredericksburg Lodge as early as December 23, 1753, and in other lodges in America prior to the formation of the General Grand Chapter of Capitular Masonry in this country in 1797-8. Washington would hardly have been a Mason of the Royal Arch without informing his friend and brother Lafayette of the fact; it does not seem probable that General Lafayette would have presented an apron with the circle and letters inclosing a Beehive (which would have been most appropriate for Washington to have chosen as his "mark") unless he had known that Washington was at least a Mark Mason. However, no documentary evidence exists that Washington was a Royal Arch Mason, and the difficult research involved in this question is not yet complete.

MASONIC DEDICATIONS TO WASHINGTON

To dedicate a book to a friend is a pretty custom by which an author honors him whose name thus begins a volume, but it is by no means an uncommon occurrence. Official volumes of Grand Lodges are inscribed to individuals but seldom, yet Washington received the honor from several sovereign Grand Lodges, four of which are here set forth to show the exalted esteem in which Washington was held by his brethren.

The Pennsylvania Abiman Rezon of 1783 is thus inscribed:

"To his Excellency, GEORGE WASHINGTON, Esq., General and Commander in Chief of the Armies of the United States of America: In Testimony, as well of his exalted Services to his Country, as of that noble Philanthropy which distinguishes Him among Masons, the following Constitutions of the most ancient and honourable Fraternity of Free and Accepted Masons, by Order and in Behalf of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, &c. is dedicated, By his Excellency's Most humble Servant, and faithful Brother, William Smith, G. Secretary."

The New York Constitutions of 1785 is dedicated as follows:

"To His Excellency, GEORGE WASHINGTON, Esq. In testimony, as well of his exalted Services to his Country, as of his distinguished Character as a MASON, the following BOOK of CONSTITUTIONS of the most antient and honourable Fraternity of Free and Accepted Masons, by order and in behalf of the GRAND LODGE of the State of New-York, is dedicated, By his most Humble Servant, JAMES WILES, G. Secretary. A. L. 5785."

In 1791 Virginia brought out her own New Abiman Rezon which is inscribed:

"To George Washington, Esq. President of the United States of America. The Following Work is Most Respectfully Dedicated by His Obedient, and Devoted Servant, THE EDITOR."

In 1792 Isaiah Thomas, then Grand Mas-

THE LAFAYETTE MASONIC APRON

Presented to Brother George Washington by Brother Lafayette. Now in the possession of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania

ter of Masons in Massachusetts, brought out the Constitutions of the Honourable Fraternity of Free and Accepted Masons, dedicated to Washington as follows:

"In Testimony of His Exalted Merit, And of Our inalienable Regard, THIS WORK IS Inscribed and Dedicated To our Illustrious BROTHER GEORGE WASHINGTON: The Friend of Masonry, Of his COUNTRY, and Of Man."

PROPOSED AS GRAND MASTER

Washington was proposed as the Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Virginia, on June 23, 1777. He declined on the dual grounds that as he had not served as a Master he was not eligible and that his military duties were too arduous for him to consider added responsibilities.

Washington was thrice proposed as General Grand Master of Masons in the United States, first by American Union (Military) Lodge, at Morristown, Pennsylvania, December 15, 1779; next by the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, on December 20, 1779, and again by the same body on January 13, 1780.

In 1782 Washington rejected the suggestion that he become King. The same inherent modesty, sound sense and democratic principles of the Great Citizen, led him to refuse this highest of Masonic honors—as it would have been had it ever become an actuality. Had General Washington not declined, it is possible that several Grand Lodges, favorable to this action, might have joined with Pennsylvania in a further effort to form a central Masonic body with Washington as its General Grand Master. Masons know now that neither Craft nor nation were then old enough to give healthy growth to a General Grand Lodge; in face of the health and the vigor of the Craft in the United States today under its forty-nine Grand Lodges, the Fraternity can but be profoundly grateful to the First President for his Masonic modesty and wisdom in declining to foster an untried experiment which was as potent for disaster as for good.

SPRIG OF ACACIA

Brother George Washington passed to the Celestial Lodge Above at twenty minutes past ten o'clock P. M. on Saturday, December 14, 1799, in his sixty-eighth year.

He was buried with full Masonic honors, Alexandria Lodge, No. 22 officiating, Brooke Lodge, No. 47, of Alexandria, assisting. Of the six pall bearers, Col. Charles Simms, Col. Dennis Ramsey, Col. William Payne, Col. George Gilpin, Col. Phillip Marsteller, and Col. Charles Little, all officers who had served in the Revolution, all were Masons and members of Alexandria Lodge, No. 22, except Col. Marsteller, whose son, Phillip G., was a member and attended the funeral.

The sermon at the tomb was preached by Reverend Thomas Davis, of Christ Church—Washington's own church—Alexandria, and the Masonic services were conducted by Dr. Elisha Cullen Dick, Worshipful Master of Alexandria Lodge No. 22, and the Reverend James Muir, D.D., Chaplain of the Lodge. Dr. Dick retired from the East of the Lodge when it was rechartered, to allow Washington to be named as the Charter Master, remaining again a year out of the East when Washington was unanimously reelected and again became Master after Washington retired as a Past Master. To Dr. Dick fell the solemn duty of interring the distinguished dead with the Lambskin Apron of the fraternity and its Sprig of Acacia of immortal hope.

1784, August—Was presented by General Lafayette with a Masonic apron made by Madame Lafayette.

1793, September 18—Acting as Grand Master laid the corner stone of the United States Capitol, at Washington, D. C.

1794—Late in this year Alexandria Lodge received and accepted the Masonic portrait of Washington, painted by Williams of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on order of the Lodge, and for which Washington sat while in that city some time in the latter part of 1793 or early part of 1794.

1797, March 28—Received a delegation from Alexandria Lodge and accepted an invitation to be present in Alexandria, April 1st.

1797, April 1—Attended Alexandria Lodge, and, at the banquet, proposed a toast.

Buried Masonically, at Mount Vernon, December 18, 1799, by Alexandria Lodge No. 22.

Throughout his life his Masonic brethren delighted in honoring Washington; that he took pleasure in his brotherhood with his fellow Masons none can doubt who read his letters. Washington's feeling for the Ancient Craft he summed up himself in one toast which he gave at an Alexandria Lodge dinner, Saturday, April 1, 1797:

"To the Lodge of Alexandria, and all Masons throughout the world."

Among the thousands of Masonic tributes paid Brother Washington these beautiful words from the pen of Dr. Joseph Fort Newton, foremost among modern Masonic writers, epitomize at once the veneration of his brethren for his character and his achievements, and the fraternal love of all the gentle Craft wheresoever dispersed:

"A great and simple man—modest, quiet, gentle, wise—in whom patriotism was a passion and a prophecy, Freemasonry a fragrance, a fellowship and a philosophy; great enough to refuse a crown and live a life of private nobility and public service; picking his way where no path was, amid wild passions and perils; leading his people to victory, peace and ordered honor; leaving his labor as a legacy of inspiration to mankind, and his character as a consecration to his country."

Part III

Genealogical Table

ENGLISH FAMILY

George Washington in early life seemed to feel little interested in his ancestry. When he became a wealthy land-owner, he was interested in the coat of arms of the family, which was perfectly well known to the Virginia Washingtons; and he used several forms slightly different from each other for his tableware, his carriages, his seal, and his bookplate, all of them bearing the three mullets which heraldically were the spurs of a knight, and the two bars.

In 1791 Sir Isaac Heard, Garter King of Arms in England, and therefore an official authority, wrote to Washington asking about his ancestry. Washington replied: "Our ancestors who first settled in this Country came from some one of the Northern Countries of England, but whether from Lancashire Yorkshire or one still more northerly I do not precisely remember."

This tradition is powerfully supported by a memorial tablet in Maidstone Church, England, evidently written by Lawrence Washington, son of Lawrence of Sulgrave, before his death in 1619. It runs as follows: "Here resteth the body of Lawrence Washington Esquire of the Family of the Washingtons antientlie of Washington in the Countie Palatinate of Durham." This is absolute proof that in 1619, a century before George Washington was born, the Palatinate of Durham was recognized as the original home of the Washingtons.

Soon after Washington's death investigations began into his family history. Washington Irving visited Durham and was the first American to take account of the fact that in 1183 a manuscript volume was drawn up called the Bolden Buke in which was an entry to the effect that William de Hertburn held certain lands in the town of Wessyngton (a few miles north of Durham), which he had received by exchange for lands in Hertburn; and that he thereby held the title of Sir William de Wessyngton. Hertburn was an outlying district of what is now the city of Stockton on Tees. The site of the ancient manor house at the village of Washington can still be traced.

In the neighborhood of that town is Hilton Castle, upon the front of which are displayed the arms of the Washington family, perhaps derived from a female descendant of William de Wessyngton—namely the Lady Dionysia de Tempest.

For several generations the descendants of William de Wessyngton can be traced in Durham and the nearby countries. They took advantage of the widespread practice of marrying heiresses. After three or four generations the direct descent becomes less clear. A writer named Plantagenet Harrison was sure that the cradle of the race was the present insignificant village of Washton (perhaps derived from Washington), near Richmond. An ingenious but highly imaginative author not many years ago made up a genealogy which completely satisfied him, leading straight back from George Washington of Mount Vernon to the God Odin of supernal regions.

About the year 1300 members of the family are found sixty or seventy miles west in what are now the counties of Lancaster and Westmoreland. The first very distinct western Washington is Sir Robert, Lord of Milburne, which is probably the Milbourne in Westmoreland not far from Appleby. At Appleby George Washington's father and his two half brothers went to school several centuries later. The neighboring castle of Howgill was very likely one of the cradles of the Washington race. The Washingtons were landed people and at least thirty places in that region can be identified as having been owned by members of the family, particularly in the neighborhood of Kendall and the present Carnforth, then called Kernford.

A few miles from Kernford lies the present town of Warton, which is very near the coast of Morecambe Bay. Here the arms of the Washington family such as George Washington bore, have been discovered on the church wall.

Several English writers have attempted to find the missing link between the eastern and western Washingtons of England. More important are Mr. T. Pape, the Rev. Isham Longden, and Canon John Solloway of Selby Abbey, a church in which an American flag floats alongside a magnificent glass escutcheon of the Washington arms, which has been there probably five hundred years. Canon Solloway, whose work is yet unpublished, comes nearer to bridging the chasm between eastern and western English Washingtons than any previous writer.

At present the first safely identified direct ancestor of Washington is Robert de Wessyngton (possibly Robert of Milburne). A century later we find John Washington of Tewitfield (named from the tewit, a bird) near Warton on the west coast, and Warton may be a shorter form of Washington. From Robert, who married Joan of Strickland, the genealogical line is probably as follows:

- I. ROBERT DE WESSYNGTON (1). (Died, 1324.) Married Joan de Strickland.
- II. ROBERT DE WASHINGTON (2). (Died about 1348.) Married Agnes de Gentyl.
- III. JOHN DE WASHINGTON (1). (Died about 1380.) Married Alianora de Warton.

- IV. JOHN WASHINGTON (2). (Died about 1408.) Married Joan Croft.
- V. JOHN WASHINGTON (3), of Whitfield. Wounded at the battle of Agincourt with King Henry V (1415).
- VI. ROBERT WASHINGTON (3), of Inthwytefeld. (Died, 1483.)
- VII. ROBERT WASHINGTON (4), of Warton. (Died about 1520.) Married Elizabeth Westfield.
- VIII. JOHN WASHINGTON (4), of Warton. (Died about 1560.) Married Margaret Kytson.
- IX. LAWRENCE WASHINGTON (1), of Northampton, Gray's Inn, and Sulgrave. (1538-1584.) Married Amy Pargiter.
- X. ROBERT WASHINGTON (5), of Sulgrave. (1544-1619.) Married Elizabeth Light.
- XI. LAWRENCE WASHINGTON (2), of Sulgrave, Brington, and Wicken. (Died, 1616.) Married Margaret Butler.
- XII. REV. LAWRENCE WASHINGTON (3), of Oxford, Purleigh, and Maldon. (1602-1654-5.) Married Annphilis Twigden.

- XIII. JOHN WASHINGTON (5), immigrant to Virginia. (1634-1675.) Married Ann Pope.
- XIV. LAWRENCE WASHINGTON (4), of Virginia. (Died, 1697.) Married Mildred Warner.
- XV. AUGUSTINE WASHINGTON, of Virginia. (1694-1743.) Married Mary Ball.
- XVI. PRESIDENT GEORGE WASHINGTON. (1732-1799.) Married Martha (Dandridge) Custis. No children.

VIRGINIA FAMILY

John Washington, great-grandfather of George, settled in Virginia about 1657, and became a planter at Bridges Creek on the Potomac in Westmoreland County. On this estate were born his son Lawrence and Lawrence's son Augustine, father of George Washington. Augustine Washington, born in 1694, was well to do, a man of energy, a good planter, and interested in the development of Virginia iron mines. He also followed the sea for a while. He was married twice. His first wife, Jane Butler, bore him several children of whom only Lawrence and Augustine survived the father. In March, 1731, he married Mary Ball, who became the mother of six children, George, Elizabeth (Betty), Samuel, John Augustine, Charles, and Mildred. The last died young. Tradition has been very kind to Mary Ball, the mother of George Washington, but the established facts concerning her are not numerous. She passed the last years of her life in a house in Fredericksburg, given to her by her son George. He seems to have resembled her in looks and owed to her strong elements of character. He was a dutiful son and throughout her life had his careful consideration. She was perhaps over fond of him while he was still a boy. After he had attained manhood he paid much attention to the management of her affairs.

Details as to the genealogical descent of George Washington are to be found in the publications of Pape, Isham Longden, Worthington C. Ford's edition of the Writings of George Washington, and in the forthcoming volumes by Canon Solloway, and by Washington Lee, descended from a collateral of George Washington.

Though Washington left no descendants, his brothers and uncles and great-uncles founded families of which there are many descendants. No list has been published of the living persons bearing the name of Washington and descended from Washington's ancestors, but there are probably not fewer than two hundred in the United States.

INTRODUCTION

DANIEL WEBSTER, in his speech at a public dinner in Washington in 1832, at the Centennial Celebration of the birth of George Washington, said:

"A hundred years hence, other disciples of Washington will celebrate his birth, with no less of sincere admiration than we now commemorate it. When they shall meet, as we now meet, to do themselves and him that honor, so surely as they shall see the blue summits of his native mountains rise in the horizon, so surely as they shall behold the river on whose banks he lived, and on whose banks he rests, still flowing on toward the sea, so surely may they see, as we now see, the flag of the Union floating on the top of the Capitol; and then, as now, may the sun in his course visit no land more free, more happy, more lovely, than this our own country!"

That "hundred years hence" has now become history, and in its passing has verified Webster's prophecy. He did not, however, venture upon a prediction of the manner of the Bicentennial Celebration. In 1832 a day of glorification passed and all was done; no records were left except of such speeches as that by Webster. In 1932 a greater permanence was sought, and an earnest endeavor made to make the career and character of Washington alive to all the people of the country. No other great man of history shows forth so spotless in the glare of complete investigation. No other world character has left a self-record so vivid, so revealing of the man himself. To select from this record examples which stand out as best illustrating Washington's character and his expression of it is not easy. Certain of his papers must always be in such a compilation; others here show his dauntless spirit, his modesty, his courtesy and consideration, his determined stand for Americanism and a republican form of government, and his firmness for what he considered good policy, however unpopular. All show his greatness. Throughout these volumes of historical material will be found many more of his utterances, some on special topics, others extracts covering a wider range. In George Washington Every Day, in another volume issued by the Commission, events and sayings that cover the whole life of George Washington are shown in calendar arrangement, with a topical index.

Letter of George Washington to His Mother after Braddock's Defeat

FORT CUMBERLAND, JULY 18, 1755.

Honour'd Mad'm,

As I doubt not but you have heard of our defeat, and perhaps have had it represented in a worse light (if possible) than it deserves; I have taken this earliest opportunity to give you some acct. of the Engagement, as it happen'd within 7 miles of the French Fort, on Wednesday the 9th. Inst.

We March'd on to that place with't any considerable loss, having only now and then a stragler pick'd up by the French Scoutg. Ind'nd. When we came there, we were attack'd by a Body of French and Indns. whose number, (I am certain) did not exceed 300 Men; our's consisted of abt. 1,300 well arm'd Troops; chiefly of the English Soldiers, who were struck with such a panick, that they behav'd with more cowardice than it is possible to conceive; The Officers behav'd Gallantly in order to encourage their Men, for which they suffer'd greatly; there being near 60 kill'd and wounded; a large proportion out of the number we had! The Virginia Troops shew'd a good deal of Bravery, and were near all kill'd; for I believe out of 3 Companies that were there, there is scarce 30 Men left alive; Capt. Peyrouny and all his Officer's down to a Corporal was kill'd; Capt. Polson shar'd near as hard a Fate; for only one of his was left: In short the dastardly behaviour of those they call regular's expos'd all others that were inclin'd to do their duty to almost certain death; and at last, in dispiht of all the efforts of the Officer's to the Contrary, they broke and run as sheep pursued by dogs; and it was impossible to rally them.

The Genl. was wounded; of w'ch he died 3 Days after; Sir Peter Halket was kill'd in the Field; where died many other brave Officer's; I luckily escap'd with't a wound, tho' I had four Bullets through my Coat, and two Horses shot under me; Cpts. Orme and Morris two of the Genls. Aids de Camp, were wounded early in the Engagem't. which render'd the duty hard upon me, as I was the only person then left to distribute the Genl's. Orders which I was scarcely able to do, as I was not half recover'd from a violent illness, that confin'd me to my Bed, and a Waggon, for above 10 Days; I am still in a weak and Feeble cond'n; which induces me to halt here, 2 or 3 Days in hopes of recov'g. a little Strength, to enable me to proceed homewards; from whence, I fear I shall not be able to stir till towards Sept., so that I shall not have the pleasure of seeing you till then, unless it be in Fairfax; please to give my love to Mr. Lewis and my Sister, and Compts. to Mr. Jackson and all other Fds. that enquire after me. I am, Hon'd Madam Yr. most dutiful Son

P. S. You may acqt. Priscilla Mullican that her Son Charles is very well, hav'g only rec'd a slight w'd in his Foot, w'ch will be cur'd with't detrimt. to him, in a very small time.

We had abt. 300 Men kill'd and as many, and more, wounded.

Letter to Bryan Fairfax on Resistance to Great Britain

MOUNT VERNON, 20 JULY, 1774

Dear Sir,

Your letter of the 17th was not presented to me till after the resolutions, (which were adjudged advisable for this county to come to), had been revised, altered, and corrected in the committee; nor till we had gone into a general meeting in the court-house, and my attention necessarily called every moment to the business that was before it. I did, however, upon receipt of it, (in that hurry and bustle,) hastily run it over, and handed it round to the gentlemen on the bench of which there were many; but, as no person present seemed in the least disposed to adopt your sentiments, as there appeared a perfect satisfaction and acquiescence in the measures proposed (except from a Mr. Williamson, who was for adopting your advice literally, without obtaining a second voice on his side), and as the gentlemen, to whom the letter was shown, advised me not to have it read, as it was not like to make a convert, and repugnant, (some of them thought,) to the very principle we were contending for, I forbore to offer it otherwise than in the manner above mentioned; which I shall be sorry for, if it gives you any dissatisfaction in not having your sentiments read to the county at large, instead of communicating them to the first people in it, by offering them the letter in the manner I did.

That I differ very widely from you, in respect to the mode of obtaining a defeat [repeal] of the acts so much and so justly complained of, I shall not hesitate to acknowledge; and that this difference in opinion may probably proceed from the different construction we put upon the conduct and intention of the ministry may also be true; but, as I see nothing on the one hand, to induce a belief that the Parliament would embrace a favorable opportunity of repealing acts, which they go on with great rapidity to pass, and in order to enforce their tyrannical system; and, on the other, I observe, or think I observe, that government is pursuing a regular plan at the expense of law and justice to overthrow our constitutional rights and liberties, how can I expect any redress from a measure, which has been ineffectually tried already? For, Sir, what is it we are contending against? Is it against paying the duty of three pence per pound on tea because burthensome? No, it is the right only, we have all along disputed, and to this end we have already petitioned his Majesty in as humble and dutiful manner as subjects could do. Nay, more, we applied to the House of Lords and House of Commons in their different legislative capacities, setting forth, that, as Englishmen, we could not be deprived of this essential and valuable part of a constitution. If, then, as the fact really is, it is against the right of taxation that we now do, and, (as I before said), all along have contended, why should they suppose an exertion of this power would be less obnoxious now than formerly? And what reasons have we to believe, that they would make a second attempt, while the same sentiments filled the breast of every American, if they did not intend to enforce it if possible?

The conduct of the Boston people could not justify the rigor of their measures, unless there had been a requisition of payment and refusal of it; nor did that measure require an act to deprive the government of Massachusetts Bay of their charter, or to exempt offenders from trial in the place where offences were committed, as there was not, nor could not be, a single instance produced to manifest the necessity of it. Are not all these things self evident proofs of a fixed and uniform plan to tax us? If we want further proofs, do not all the debates in the House of Commons serve to confirm this? And has not General Gage's conduct since his arrival, (in stopping the address of his Council, and publishing a proclamation more becoming a Turkish bashaw, than an English governor, declaring it treason to associate in any manner by which the commerce of Great Britain is to be affected,) exhibited an unexampled testimony of the most despotic system of tyranny, that ever was practised in a free government? In short, what further proofs are wanted to satisfy one of the designs of the ministry, than their own acts, which are uniform and plainly tending to the same point, nay, if I mistake not, avowedly to fix the right of taxation? What hope then from petitioning, when they tell us, that now or never is the time to fix the matter? Shall we, after this, whine and cry for relief, when we have already tried it in vain? Or shall we supinely sit and see one province after another fall a prey to despotism? If I was in any doubt, as to the right which the Parliament of Great Britain had to tax us without our consent, I should most heartily coincide with you in opinion, that to petition, and petition only, is the proper method to apply for relief; because we should then be asking a favor, and not claiming a right, which, by the law of nature and our constitution, we are, in my opinion, indubitably entitled to. I should even think it criminal to go further than this, under such an idea; but none such I have. I think the Parliament of Great Britain hath no more right to put their hands into my pocket, without my consent, than I have to put my hands into yours for money; and this being already urged to them in a firm, but decent manner, by all the colonies, what reason is there to expect any thing from their justice?

As to the resolution for addressing the throne, I own to you, Sir, I think the whole might as well have been expunged. I expect nothing from the measure, nor should my voice have accompanied it, if the non-importation scheme was intended to be retarded by it; for I am convinced, as much as I am of my existence, that there is no relief but in their distress; and I think, at least I hope, that there is public virtue enough left among us to deny ourselves every thing but the bare necessities of life to accomplish this end. This we have a right to do, and no power upon earth can compel us to do otherwise, till they have first reduced us to the most abject state of slavery that ever was designed for mankind. The stopping our exports would, no doubt, be a shorter cut than the other to effect this purpose; but if we owe money to Great Britain, nothing but the last necessity can justify the non-payment of it; and, therefore, I have great doubts upon this head, and wish to see the other method first tried, which is legal and will facilitate these payments.

I cannot conclude without expressing some concern, that I should differ so widely in sentiment from you, in a matter of such great moment and general import; and should much distrust my own judgment upon the occasion, if my nature did not recoil at the thought of submitting to measures, which I think subversive of every thing that I ought to hold dear and valuable, and did I not find, at the same time, that the voice of mankind is with me.

I must apologize for sending you so rough a sketch of my thoughts upon your letter. When I looked back, and saw the length of my own, I could not, as I am also a good deal hurried at this time, bear the thoughts of making off a fair copy. I am, &c.

Acceptance of Appointment as Commander in Chief

IN CONGRESS AT PHILADELPHIA, 16 JUNE, 1775.

Mr. President,

Though I am truly sensible of the high honor done me in this appointment, yet I feel great distress from a consciousness that my abilities and military experience may not be equal to the extensive and important trust. However, as the Congress desire it, I will enter upon the momentous duty and exert every power I possess in the service and for support of the glorious cause. I beg they will accept my most cordial thanks for this distinguished testimony of their approbation. But lest some unlucky event should happen unfavourable to my reputation, I beg it may be remembered by every gentleman in the room, that I this day declare with the utmost sincerity I do not think myself equal to the command I am honored with.

As to pay, Sir, I beg leave to assure the Congress, that as no pecuniary consideration could have tempted me to accept this arduous employment at the expense of my domestic ease and happiness, I do not wish to make any profit from it. I will keep an exact account of my expenses. Those I doubt not they will discharge, and that is all I desire.

Address to the New York Provincial Congress on Civil and Military Power

NEW YORK, 26 JUNE, 1775.

Gentlemen,

At the same time that with you I deplore the unhappy necessity of such an appointment, as that with which I am now honored, I cannot but feel sentiments of the highest gratitude for this affecting instance of distinction and regard.

May your warmest wishes be realized in the success of America, at this important and interesting period; and be assured, that every exertion of my worthy colleagues and myself will be equally extended to the re-establishment of peace and harmony between the mother country and these colonies, as to the fatal but necessary operations of war. When we assumed the soldier, we did not lay aside the citizen; and we shall most sincerely rejoice with you in that happy hour, when the establishment of American liberty, on the most firm and solid foundations, shall enable us to return to our private stations in the bosom of a free, peaceful, and happy country. I am, &c.

Letter to Lieutenant-General Gage on Rebellion

HEADQUARTERS, CAMBRIDGE, 20 AUGUST, 1775.

Sir,

I addressed you, on the 11th instant, in terms which gave the fairest scope for that humanity and politeness, which were supposed to form a part of your character. I remonstrated with you on the unworthy treatment shown to the officers and citizens of America, whom the fortune of war, chance, or a mistaken confidence had thrown into your hands.

Whether British or American mercy, fortitude, and patience are most pre-eminent; whether our virtuous citizens, whom the hand of tyranny has forced into arms to defend their wives, their children, and their property, or the mercenary instruments of lawless domination, avarice, and revenge, best deserve the appellation of rebels, and the punishment of that cord, which you affected clemency has forborne to inflict; whether the authority under which I act is usurped, or founded upon the genuine principles of liberty, were altogether foreign to the subject. I purposely avoided all political disquisition; nor shall I now avail myself of those advantages, which the sacred cause of my country, of liberty, and of human nature, give me over you; much less shall I stoop to retort and invective;

but the intelligence you say you have received from our army requires a reply. I have taken time, Sir, to make a strict inquiry, and find it has not the least foundation in truth. Not only your officers and soldiers have been treated with a tenderness due to fellow citizens and brethren, but even those execrable parricides, whose counsels and aid have deluged their country with blood, have been protected from the fury of a justly enraged people. Far from compelling or permitting their assistance, I am embarrassed with the numbers, who crowd to our camp, animated with the purest principles of virtue and love to their country. You advise me to give free operation to truth, to punish misrepresentation and falsehood. If experience stamps value upon counsel, yours must have a weight, which few can claim. You best can tell how far the convulsion, which has brought such ruin on both countries, and shaken the mighty empire of Britain to its foundation, may be traced to these malignant causes.

You affect, Sir, to despise all rank not derived from the same source with your own. I cannot conceive one more honorable, than that which flows from the uncorrupted choice of a brave and free people, the purest source and original fountain of all power. Far from making it a plea for cruelty, a mind of true magnanimity and enlarged ideas would comprehend and respect it.

What may have been the ministerial views, which have precipitated the present crisis, Lexington, Concord, and Charlestown can best declare. May that God, to whom you then appealed, judge between America and you. Under his providence, those who influence the councils of America, and all the other inhabitants of the United Colonies, at the hazard of their lives, are determined to hand down to posterity those just and invaluable privileges, which they received from their ancestors.

I shall now, Sir, close my correspondence with you, perhaps for ever. If your officers, our prisoners, receive a treatment from me different from that, which I wished to show them, they and you will remember the occasion of it. I am, Sir, your very humble servant.

General Orders before the Battle of Long Island

HEAD-QUARTERS, NEW YORK, AUGUST 23, 1776.

Parole Charleston—Countersign Lee

* * * * *

The Enemy have now landed on Long Island, and the hour is fast approaching, on which the Honor and Success of this army, and the safety of our bleeding Country depend. Remember officers and Soldiers, that you are Freeman, fighting for the blessings of Liberty—that slavery will be your portion, and that of your posterity, if you do not acquit yourselves like men: Remember how your Courage and Spirit have been dis-pirsed, and traduced by your cruel invaders; though they have found by dear experience at Boston, Charlestown and other places, what a few brave men contending in their own land, and in the best of causes can do, against base hirelings and mercenaries—Be cool, but determined; do not fire at a distance, but wait for orders from your officers—It is the Generals express orders that if any man attempt to skulk, lay down, or retreat without Orders he be instantly shot down as an example, he hopes no such Scoundrel will be found in this army; but on the contrary, every one for himself resolving to conquer, or die, and trusting to the smiles of heaven upon so just a cause, will behave with Bravery and Resolution: Those who are distinguished for their Gallantry, and good Conduct, may depend upon being honorably noticed, and suitably rewarded: And if this Army will but emulate, and imitate their brave Countrymen, in other parts of America, he has no doubt they will, by a glorious Victory, save their Country, and acquire to themselves immortal Honor.

Letter to the President of Congress on Dependence on Militia

CAMP, ABOVE TRENTON FALLS, 20 DECEMBER, 1776.

Sir,

* * * * *

In short, the present exigency of our affairs will not admit of delay, either in council or the field; for well convinced I am, that, if the enemy go into quarters at all, it will be for a short season. But I rather think the design of General Howe is to possess himself of Philadelphia this winter, if possible; and in truth I do not see what is to prevent him, as ten days more will put an end to the existence of our army. That one great point is to keep us as much harassed as possible, with a view to injure the recruiting service and hinder a collection of stores and other necessities for the next campaign, I am as clear in, as I am of my existence. If, therefore, we have to provide in the short interval and make these great and arduous preparations, every matter that in its nature is self-evident is to be referred to Congress, at the distance of a hundred and thirty or forty miles, so much time must necessary elapse, as to defeat the end in view.

In may be said, that this is an application for powers that are too dangerous to be entrusted. I can only add, that desperate diseases require desperate remedies; and I with truth declare, that I have no lust after power, but I wish with as much fervency as any man upon this wide-extended continent for an opportunity of turning the sword into the ploughshare. But my feelings, as an officer and a man, have been such as to force me to say, that no person ever had a greater choice of difficulties to contend with than I have. It is needless to add, that short enlistments, and a mistaken dependence upon militia, have been the origin of all our misfortunes, and the great accumulation of our debt. We find, Sir, that the enemy are daily gathering strength from the disaffected. This strength, like a snow-ball by rolling, will increase, unless some means can be devised to check effectually the progress of the enemy's arms. Militia may possibly do it for a little while; but in a little while, also, and the militia of those States, which have been frequently called upon, will not turn out at all; or, if they do, it will be with so much reluctance and sloth, as to amount to the same thing. Instance New Jersey! Witness Pennsylvania! Could any thing but the river Delaware have saved Philadelphia? Can any thing (the exigency of the case indeed may justify it) be more destructive to the recruiting service, than giving ten dollars' bounty for six weeks' service of the militia, who come in, you cannot tell how, go, you cannot tell when, and act, you cannot tell where, consume your provisions, exhaust your stores, and leave you at last at a critical moment?

These, Sir, are the men I am to depend upon, ten days hence; this is the basis, on which your cause will and must for ever depend, till you get a large standing army sufficient of itself to oppose the enemy. I therefore beg leave to give it as my humble opinion, that eighty-eight battalions are by no means equal to the opposition you are to make, and that a moment's time is not to be lost in raising a greater number, not less, in my opinion and the opinion of my officers, than a hundred and ten. It may be urged that it will be found difficult enough to complete the first number. This may be true, and yet the officers of a hundred and ten battalions will recruit many more men, than those of eighty-eight. In my judgment this is not a time to stand upon expense; our funds are not the only object of consideration. The State of New York have added one battalion (I wish they had made it two) to their quota. If any good officers will offer to raise men upon Continental pay and establishment in this quarter, I shall encourage them to do so, and regiment them when they have done it. If Congress disapprove of this proceeding, they will please to signify it, as I mean it for the best. It may be thought that I am going a good deal out of the line of my duty, to adopt these measures, or to advise thus freely. A character to lose, an estate to forfeit, the inestimable blessing of liberty at stake, and a life devoted, must be my excuse. . . .

I have the Honor to be with great respect
Sir Your Most Obedt. Servt.

G. Washington

Letter to the President of Congress on Army Conditions

VALLEY FORGE, 23 DECEMBER, 1777.

Sir,

Full as I was in my representation of the matters in the commissary's department yesterday, fresh and more powerful reasons oblige me to add, that I am now convinced beyond a doubt, that, unless some great and capital change suddenly takes in that line, this army must inevitably be reduced to one or other of these three things; starve, dissolve, or disperse in order to obtain subsistence in the best manner they can. Rest assured, Sir, this is not an exaggerated picture, and that I have abundant reason to suppose what I say.

Yesterday afternoon, receiving information that the enemy in force had left the city, and were advancing towards Derby with the apparent design to forage, and draw subsistence from that part of the country, I ordered the troops to be in readiness, that I might give every opposition in my power; when behold, to my great mortification, I was not only informed, but convinced, that the men were unable to stir on account of provision, and that a dangerous mutiny, begun the night before, and which with difficulty was suppressed by the spirited exertions of some officers, was still much to be apprehended for want of this article. This brought forth the only commissary in the purchasing line in this camp; and, with him, this melancholy and alarming truth, that he had not a single hoof of any kind to slaughter, and not more than twenty-five barrels of flour! From hence form an opinion of our situation when I add, that he could not tell when to expect any.

All I could do under these circumstances, was to send out a few light parties to watch and harass the enemy, whilst other parties were instantly detached different ways to collect, if possible, as much provision as would satisfy the present pressing wants of the soldiery. But will this answer? No, Sir; three or four days of bad weather would prove our destruction. What then is to become of the army this winter? And if we are so often without provisions now, what is to become of us in the spring, when our force will be collected, with the aid perhaps of militia to take advantage of an early campaign, before the enemy can be reinforced? These are considerations of great magnitude, meriting the closest attention; and they will, when my own reputation is so intimately connected with the event and to be affected by it, justify my saying, that the present commissaries are by no means equal to the execution of the office, or that the disaffection of the people is past all belief. The misfortune, however, does in my opinion proceed from both causes; and, though I have been tender heretofore of giving any opinion, or lodging complaints, as the change in that department took place contrary to my judgment, and the consequences thereof were predicted; yet, finding that the inactivity of the army, whether for want of provisions, clothes, or other essentials, is charged to my account, not only by the common vulgar but by those in power, it is 'time to speak plain in exculpation of myself. With truth, then, I can declare, that no man in my opinion ever had his measures more impeded than I have, by every department of the army.

Since the month of July we have had no assistance from the quartermaster-general, and to want of assistance from this department the commissary-general charges great part of his deficiency. To this I am to add, that, notwithstanding it is a standing order, and often repeated, that the troops shall always have two days' provisions by them, that they might be ready at any sudden call; yet an opportunity has scarcely ever offered, of taking an advantage of the enemy, that has not been either totally obstructed, or greatly impeded, on this account. And this, the great and crying evil, is not all. The soap, vinegar, and other articles allowed by Congress, we see none of, nor have we seen them, I believe, since the battle of Brandywine. The first, indeed, we have now little occasion for; few men having more than one shirt, many only the moiety of one, and some none at all. In addition to which, as a proof of the little benefit received from a clothier-general, and as a further proof of the inability of an army, under the circumstances of this, to perform the common duties of soldiers, (besides a number of men confined to hospitals for want of shoes, and others in farmers' houses on the same account,) we have, by a field-return this day made, no less than two thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight men now in camp unfit for duty, because they are barefoot and otherwise naked. By the same return it appears, that our whole strength in Continental troops, including the eastern brigades, which have joined us since the surrender of General Burgoyne, exclusive of the Maryland troops sent to Wilmington, amounts to no more than eight thousand two hundred in camp fit for duty; notwithstanding which, and that since the 4th instant, our numbers fit for duty, from the hardships and exposures they have undergone, particularly on account of blankets (numbers having been obliged, and still are, to sit up all night by fires, instead of taking comfortable rest in a natural and common way) have decreased near two thousand men.

We find gentlemen, without knowing whether the army was really going into winter-quarters or not (for I am sure no resolution of mine would warrant the Remonstrance), reprobatng the measure as much as if they thought the soldiers were made of stocks or stones, and equally insensible of frost and snow; and moreover, as if they conceived it easily practicable for an inferior army, under the disadvantages I have described ours to be, which are by no means exaggerated, to confine a superior one, in all respects well-appointed and provided for a winter's campaign, within the city of Philadelphia, and to cover from depredation and waste the States of Pennsylvania and Jersey. But what makes this matter still more extraordinary in my eye is, that these very gentlemen,—who were well apprized of the nakedness of the troops from ocular demonstration, who thought their own soldiers worse clad than others, and who advised me near a month ago to postpone the execution of a plan I was about to adopt, in consequence of a resolve of Congress for seizing clothes, under strong assurances that an ample supply would be collected in ten days agreeably to a decree of the State (not one article of which, by the by, is yet come to hand),—should think a winter's campaign and the covering of these States from the invasion of an enemy so easy and practicable a business. I can assure those gentlemen, that it is a much easier and less distressing thing to draw remonstrances in a comfortable room by a good fireside, than to occupy a cold, bleak hill, and sleep under frost and snow, without clothes or blankets. However, although they seem to have little feeling for the naked and distressed soldiers, I feel superabundantly for them, and, from my soul, I pity those miseries, which it is neither in my power to relieve or prevent.

It is for these reasons, therefore, that I have dwelt upon the subject; and it adds not a little to my other difficulties and distress to find, that much more is expected of me than is possible to be performed, and that upon the ground of safety and policy I am obliged to conceal the true state of the army from public view, and thereby expose myself to detraction and calumny. The honorable committee of Congress went from camp fully possessed of my sentiments respecting the establishment of this army, the necessity of auditors of accounts, the appointment of officers, and new arrangements. I have no need, therefore, to be prolix upon these subjects, but I refer to the committee. I shall add a word or two to show, first, the necessity of some better provision for binding the officers by the tie of interest to the service, as no day nor scarce an hour passes without the offer of a resigned commission; (otherwise I much doubt the practicability of holding the army together much longer, and in this I shall probably be thought the more sincere, when I freely declare, that I do not myself expect to derive the smallest benefit from any establishment that Congress may adopt, otherwise than as a member of the community at large in the good, which I am persuaded will result from the measure, by making better officers and better troops;) and, secondly, to point out the necessity of making the appointments and arrangements without loss of time. We have not more than three months, in which to prepare a great deal of business. If we let these slip or waste, we shall be laboring under the same difficulties all next campaign, as we have been this, to rectify mistakes and bring things to order.

Military arrangement, and movements in consequence, like the mechanism of a clock, will be imperfect and disordered by the want of a part. In a very sensible degree have I experienced this, in the course of the last summer, several brigades having no brigadiers appointed to them till late, and some not at all; by which means it follows, that an additional weight is thrown upon the shoulders of the Commander-in-chief, to withdraw his attention from the great line of his duty. The gentlemen of the committee, when they were at camp, talked of an expedient for adjusting these matters, which I highly approved and wish to see adopted; namely, that two or three members of the Board of War, or a committee of Congress, should repair immediately to camp, where the best aid can be had, and with the commanding officer, or a committee of his appointment, prepare and digest the most perfect plan, that can be devised, for correcting all abuses and making new arrangements; considering what is to be done with the weak and debilitated regiments, if the States to which they belong will not draft men to fill them, for as to enlisting soldiers it seems to me to be totally out of the question; together with many other things, that would occur in the course of such a conference; and, after digesting matters in the best manner they can, to submit the whole to the ultimate determination of Congress.

If this measure is approved, I would earnestly advise the immediate execution of it, and that the commissary-general of purchases, whom I rarely see, may be directed to form magazines without a moment's delay in the neighbourhood of this camp, in order to secure provision for us in case of bad weather. The quartermaster-general ought also to be busy in his department. In short, there is as much to be done in preparing for a campaign, as in the active part of it. Every thing depends upon the preparation that is made in the several departments, and the success or misfortunes of the next campaign will more than probably originate with our activity or supineness during this winter. I have the honor to be, &c.

Letter of Courtesy to Lieutenant-General Burgoyne

HEAD-QUARTERS, 11 MARCH, 1778.

Sir,

I was only two days since honored with your very obliging letter of the 11th of February. Your indulgent opinion of my character, and the polite terms in which you are pleased to express it, are peculiarly flattering; and I take pleasure in the opportunity you have afforded me, of assuring you, that, far from suffering the views of national opposition to be embittered and debased by personal animosity, I am ever ready to do justice to the merit of the man and soldier, and to esteem where esteem is due, however the idea of a public enemy may interpose. You will not think it the language of unmeaning ceremony, if I add, that sentiments of personal respect, in the present instance, are reciprocal.

Viewing you in the light of an officer, contending against what I conceive to be the rights of my country, the reverses of fortune you experienced in the field cannot be unacceptable to me; but, abstracted from considerations of national advantage, I can sincerely sympathize with your feelings as a soldier, the unavoidable difficulties of whose situation forbid his success; and as a man, whose lot combines the calamity of ill health, the anxieties of captivity, and the painful sensibility for a reputation exposed, where he most values it, to the assaults of malice and detraction.

As your aid-de-camp went directly to Congress, the business of your letter to me had been decided before it came to hand. I am happy that their cheerful acquiescence with your request prevented the necessity of my intervention; and wishing you a safe and agreeable passage, with a perfect restoration of your health, I have the honor to be, very respectfully, &c.

Letter to Major-General Sullivan on Criticism of French Allies

HEAD-QRS., WHITE PLAINS, 1ST SEPT., 1778.

Dear Sir,

I have not received any letter from you since the 23d Ult., which I attribute to some mishap of the messengers with whom they were sent. I was anxious to learn the determination and designs of the Council of Officers, that so I might be prepared for eventual measures.—the success or misfortune of your army will have great influence in directing the movement and fortune of this.

The disagreement between the army under your command and the fleet has given me very singular uneasiness. The Continent at large is concerned in our cordiality, and it should be kept up by all possible means, consistent with our honor and policy. First impressions you know are generally longest remembered, and will serve to fix in a great degree our national character among the french. In our conduct towards them we should remember, that they are a people old in war, very strict in military etiquette, and apt to take fire, where others scarcely seem warmed. Permit me to recommend, in the most particular manner, the cultivation of harmony and good agreement, and your endeavors to destroy that ill humbr, which may have got into the officers. It is of the greatest importance also, that the minds of the soldiers and the people should know nothing of the misunderstanding, or, if it has reached them, that ways may be used to stop its progress and prevent its effects.

I have received from Congress the enclosed, by which you will perceive their opinions with regard to keeping secret the protest of the general officers. I need add nothing on this head. I have one thing however more to say. I make no doubt but you will do all in your power to forward the repair of the Count's fleet, and rendering it fit for service, by your recommendations for that purpose to those, who can be immediately instrumental. I am, dear Sir, &c.

Letter to Count d'Estaing on Rhode Island Affair

HEAD-QUARTERS, 11TH SEPT., 1778.

Sir,

I have had the honor of receiving your Letter of the 5th inst., accompanied by a Copy of two Letters to Congress and Genl. Sullivan. The confidence, which you have been pleased to show in communicating these papers, engages my sincere thanks. If the deepest regret, that the best concerted enterprise and bravest exertions should have been rendered fruitless by a disaster, which human prudence is incapable of foreseeing or preventing, can alleviate disappointment, you may be assured, that the whole Continent sympathizes with you. It will be a consolation to you to reflect, that the thinking part of mankind do not form their judgment from events; and that their equity will ever attach equal glory to those actions, which deserve success, as to those which have been crowned with it. It is in the trying circumstances to which Your Excellency has been exposed, that the virtues of a great mind are displayed in their brightest lustre, and that the General's Character is better known, than in the moment of Victory. It was yours, by every title which can give it; and the adverse element, which robbed you of your prize, can never deprive you of the Glory due to you. Tho' your success has not been equal to your expectations, yet you have the satisfaction of reflecting, that you have rendered essential services to the common cause.

I exceedingly lament, that, in addition to our misfortunes, there has been the least suspension of harmony and good understanding between the generals of allied nations, whose views must, like their interests, be the same. On the first intimation of it, I employed my influence in restoring what I regard as essential to the permanence of an Union founded on mutual inclination, and the strongest ties of reciprocal advantage. Your Excellency's offer to the Council of Boston had a powerful tendency to promote the same end, and was a distinguished proof of your zeal and magnanimity. . . .

G. Washington

Letter to Henry Laurens on French Allies and Canada

FRED[ERICKSBURG], [N. Y.,] 14TH NOVR., 1778.

Dr. Sir,

This will be accompanied by an official letter on the subject of the proposed expedition against Canada. You will perceive I have only considered it in a military light; indeed I was not authorized to consider it in any other; and I am not without apprehensions, that I may be thought, in what I have done, to have exceeded the limits intended by Congress. But my solicitude for the public welfare, which I think deeply interested in this affair, will, I hope, justify me in the eyes of all those, who view things through that just medium. I do not know, Sir, what may be your sentiments in the present case; but, whatever they are, I am sure I can confide in your honor and friendship, and shall not hesitate to unbosom myself to you on a point of the most delicate and important nature.

The question of the Canadian expedition, in the form it now stands, appears to me one of the most interesting that has hitherto agitated our national deliberations. I have one objection to it, untouched in my public letter, which is, in my estimation, insurmountable, and alarms all my feelings for the true and permanent interests of my country. This is the introduction of a large body of French troops into Canada, and putting them in possession of the capital of that Province, attached to them by all the ties of blood, habits, manners, religion, and former connexion of government. I fear this would be too great a temptation to be resisted by any power actuated by the common maxims of national policy. Let us realize for a moment the striking advantages France would derive from the possession of Canada; the acquisition of an extensive territory, abounding in supplies for the use of her Islands; the opening a vast source of the most beneficial commerce with the Indian nations, which she might then monopolize; the having ports of her own on this continent independent of the precarious good will of an ally; the engrossing of the whole trade of Newfoundland whenever she pleased, the finest nursery of seamen in the world; the security afforded to her Islands; and, finally, the facility of awing and controlling these States, the natural and most formidable rival of every maritime power in Europe. Canada would be a solid acquisition to France on all these accounts, and because of the numerous inhabitants, subjects to her by inclination, who would aid in preserving it under her power against the attempt of every other.

France, acknowledged for some time past the most powerful monarchy in Europe by land, able now to dispute the empire of the sea with Britain, and if joined with Spain, I may say, certainly superior, possessed of New Orleans on our right, Canada on our left, and seconded by the numerous tribes of Indians in our rear from one extremity to the other, a people so generally friendly to her, and whom she knows so well to conciliate, would, it is much to be apprehended, have it in her power to give law to these States.

Let us suppose, that, when the five thousand french troops (and under the idea of that number twice as many might be introduced) were entered the city of Quebec, they should declare an intention to hold Canada, as a pledge and surety for the debts due to France from the United States, or, under other specious pretences, hold the place till they can find a bone of contention, and, in the mean while, should excite the Canadians to engage in supporting their pretences & claims; what should we be able to say, with only four or five thousand men to carry on the dispute? It may be supposed, that France would not choose to renounce our friendship by a step of this kind, as the consequence would be a reunion with England on some terms or other, and the loss of what she had acquired in so violent and unjustifiable a manner, with all the advantages of an alliance with us. This, in my opinion, is too slender a security against the measure, to be relied on. The truth of the position will entirely depend on naval events. If France and Spain should unite, and obtain a decided superiority by Sea, a reunion with England would avail very little, and might be set at defiance. France, with a numerous army at command, might throw in what number of land forces she thought proper, to support her pretensions; and England, without men, without money, and inferior on her favorite element, could give no effectual aid to oppose them. Resentment, reproaches, and submission seem to be all that would be left to us. Men are very apt to run into extremes. Hatred to England may carry some into an excess of Confidence in France, especially when motives of gratitude are thrown into the scale. Men of this description would be unwilling to suppose France capable of acting so ungenerous a part. I am heartily disposed to entertain the most favorable sentiments of our new ally, and to cherish them in others to a reasonable degree. But it is maxim, founded on the universal experience of mankind, that no nation is to be trusted farther than it is bound by its interest; and no prudent statesman or politician will venture to depart from it. In our circumstances we ought to be particularly cautious; for we have not yet attained sufficient vigor and maturity to recover from the shock of any false step, into which we may unwarily fall.

If France should even engage in the scheme, in the first instance, with the purest intentions, there is the greatest danger that, in the progress of the business, invited to it by circumstances, and perhaps urged on by the solicitations and wishes of the Canadians, she would alter her views.

As the Marquis clothed his proposition, when he spoke it to me, it would seem to originate wholly with himself; but, it is far from impossible, that it had its birth in the Cabinet of France, and was put into this artful dress to give it the readier currency. I fancy that I read in the countenances of some people, on this occasion, more than the disinterested zeal of allies. I hope I am mistaken, and that my fears of mischief make me refine too much, and awaken jealousies that have no sufficient foundation. But upon the whole, Sir, to wave every other consideration, I do not like to add to the number of our national obligations. I would wish, as much as possible, to avoid giving a foreign power new claims of merit for services performed to the United States, and would ask no assistance that is not indispensable. I am, with the truest attachment and most perfect confidence, dear Sir, &c.

Letter to Count de Rochambeau welcoming Him to America

HEAD-QUARTERS, NEW JERSEY, 16 JULY, 1780.

Sir,

I hasten to impart to you the happiness I feel at the welcome news of your arrival; and, as well in the name of the American army, as in my own, to present you with an assurance of our warmest sentiments for allies, who have so generously come to our aid. As a citizen of the United States, and as a soldier in the cause of liberty, I thankfully acknowledge this new mark of friendship from his Most Christian Majesty, and I feel a most grateful sensibility for the flattering confidence he has been pleased to honor me with on this occasion.

Among the obligations we are under to your Prince, I esteem it one of the first, that he has made choice, for the command of his troops, of a Gentleman whose high reputation and happy union of social qualities and military abilities promise me every public advantage and private satisfaction. I beg, Sir, that you will be the interpreter of my sentiments to the Gentlemen under your command. Be pleased to assure them, that, to the pleasure I anticipate of an acquaintance with them, I join the warmest desire to do every thing that may be agreeable to them and to the soldiers under their command. But in the midst of a war, the nature and difficulties of which are peculiar and uncommon, I cannot flatter myself in any way to recompense the sacrifices they have made, but by giving them such opportunities in the field of glory, as will enable them to display that gallantry and those talents, which we shall be always happy to acknowledge with applause.

The Marquis de Lafayette has been by me desired from time to time to communicate such intelligence, and make such propositions, as circumstances dictated. I think it so important, immediately to fix our plan of operations, and with as much secrecy as possible, that I have requested him to go himself to New London, where he will probably meet you. As a General officer, I have the greatest confidence in him; as a friend, he is perfectly acquainted with my sentiments and opinions. He knows all the circumstances of our army and the country at large. All the information he gives, and all the propositions he makes, I entreat you will consider as coming from me. I request you will settle all arrangements whatsoever with him; and I shall only add, that I shall exactly conform to the intentions of his Most Christian Majesty, as explained in the several papers put into my hands by his order, and signed by his ministers.

Permit me to refer you to the Marquis de Lafayette for more particular assurances of what I feel on this occasion, which I the more readily do, from a knowledge of his peculiar affection and regard for you. Impatiently waiting for the time when our operations will afford me the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with you, I have the honor to be, with the most perfect consideration, &c.

Letter to Lord Cornwallis giving Terms of Surrender

HEAD QUARTERS, BEFORE YORK, 18 OCTOBER, 1781.

My Lord,

To avoid unnecessary discussion and delays I shall at once, in answer to your Lordships letters of yesterday, declare the general basis upon which a definitive treaty and capitulation must take place. The garrisons of York and Gloucester, including the seamen, as you propose, will be received Prisoners of War. The condition annexed, of sending the British and German troops to the parts of Europe to which they respectively belong, is inadmissible. Instead of this they will be marched to such parts of the Country as can most conveniently provide for their subsistence, and the benevolent treatment of Prisoners, which is invariably observed by the Americans, will be extended to them. The same honors will be granted to the surrendering Army as were granted to the Garrison of Charlestown. The shipping and boats in the two harbors, with all their Guns, Stores, Tackling, furniture and apparel, shall be delivered in their present state to an officer of the Navy, appointed to take possession of them.

The Artillery, Arms, Accoutrements, Military Chest, and public stores of every denomination, shall be delivered, unimpaired to the heads of departments to which they respectively belong.

The officers will be indulged in retaining their side arms, and the officers and soldiers may preserve their baggage and effects, with this reserve, that property taken in the Country will be reclaimed.

With regard to the individuals in civil capacities whose interests, your Lordship wishes may be attended to; until they are more particularly described, nothing definitive can be settled.

I have to add that I expect the sick and wounded will be supplied with their own Hospital Stores, and be attended by British Surgeons, particularly charged with the care of them.

Your Lordship will be pleased to signify your determination either to accept or reject the proposals now offered in the course of two hours from the delivery of this letter that Commissioners may be appointed to digest the articles of capitulation, or a renewal of hostilities may take place. I have the honor, &c.

NEWBURG, 22 MAY, 1782.

Sir,

With a mixture of great surprise and astonishment, I have read with attention the sentiments you have submitted to my perusal. Be assured, Sir, no occurrence in the course of the war has given me more painful sensations, than your information of there being such ideas existing in the army, as you have expressed, and I must view with abhorrence and reprehend with severity. For the present the communication of them will rest in my own bosom, unless some further agitation of the matter shall make a disclosure necessary.

I am much at a loss to conceive what part of my conduct could have given encouragement to an address, which to me seems big with the greatest mischiefs, that can befall my Country. If I am not deceived in the knowledge of myself, you could not have found a person to whom your schemes are more disagreeable. At the same time, in justice to my own feelings, I must add, that no man possesses a more sincere wish to see ample justice done to the army than I do; and, as far as my powers and influence, in a constitutional way, extend, they shall be employed to the utmost of my abilities to effect it, should there be any occasion. Let me conjure you, then, if you have any regard for your Country, concern for yourself or posterity, or respect for me, to banish these thoughts from your mind, and never communicate, as from yourself or any one else, a sentiment of the like nature. I am, Sir, your most obedient servant.

G. Washington

Circular Letter addressed to the Governors of all the States on disbanding the Army

HEAD-QUARTERS, NEWBURG, 8 JUNE, 1783.

Sir,

The great object, for which I had the honor to hold an appointment in the service of my country, being accomplished, I am now preparing to resign it into the hands of Congress, and to return to that domestic retirement, which, it is well known, I left with the greatest reluctance; a retirement for which I have never ceased to sigh, through a long and painful absence, and in which (remote from the noise and trouble of the world) I meditate to pass the remainder of life, in a state of undisturbed repose. But before I carry this resolution into effect, I think it a duty incumbent on me to make this my last official communication; to congratulate you on the glorious events which Heaven has been pleased to produce in our favor; to offer my sentiments respecting some important subjects, which appear to me to be intimately connected with the tranquillity of the United States; to take my leave of your Excellency as a public character; and to give my final blessing to that country, in whose service I have spent the prime of my life, for whose sake I have consumed so many anxious days and watchful nights, and whose happiness, being extremely dear to me, will always constitute no inconsiderable part of my own.

Impressed with the liveliest sensibility on this pleasing occasion, I will claim the indulgence of dilating the more copiously on the subjects of our mutual felicitation. When we consider the magnitude of the prize we contended for, the doubtful nature of the contest, and the favorable manner in which it has terminated, we shall find the greatest possible reason for gratitude and rejoicing. This is a theme that will afford infinite delight to every benevolent and liberal mind, whether the event in contemplation be considered as the source of present enjoyment, or the parent of future happiness; and we shall have equal occasion to felicitate ourselves on the lot which Providence has assigned us, whether we view it in a natural, a political, or moral point of light.

The citizens of America, placed in the most enviable condition, as the sole lords and proprietors of a vast tract of continent, comprehending all the various soils and climates of the world, and abounding with all the necessities and conveniences of life, are now, by the late satisfactory pacification, acknowledged to be possessed of absolute freedom and independency. They are, from this period, to be considered as the actors on a most conspicuous theatre, which seems to be peculiarly designated by Providence for the display of human greatness and felicity. Here they are not only surrounded with every thing, which can contribute to the completion of private and domestic enjoyment; but Heaven has crowned all its other blessings, by giving a fairer opportunity for political happiness, than any other nation has ever been favored with. Nothing can illustrate these observations more forcibly, than a recollection of the happy conjuncture of times and circumstances, under which our republic assumed its rank among the nations. The foundation of our empire was not laid in the gloomy age of ignorance and superstition; but at an epocha when the rights of mankind were better understood and more clearly defined, than at any former period. The researches of the human mind after social happiness have been carried to a great extent; the treasures of knowledge, acquired by the labors of philosophers, sages, and legislators, through a long succession of years, are laid open for our use, and their collected wisdom may be happily applied in the establishment of our forms of government. The free cultivation of letters, the unbounded extension of commerce, the progressive refinement of manners, the growing liberality of sentiment, and, above all, the pure and benign light of Revelation, have had a meliorating influence on mankind and increased the blessings of society. At this auspicious period, the United States came into existence as a nation; and, if their citizens should not be completely free and happy, the fault will be entirely their own.

Such is our situation, and such are our prospects; but notwithstanding the cup of blessing is thus reached out to us; notwithstanding happiness is ours, if we have a disposition to seize the occasion and make it our own; yet it appears to me there is an option still left to the United States of America, that it is in their choice, and depends upon their conduct, whether they will be respectable and prosperous, or contemptible and miserable, as a nation. This is the time of their political probation; this is the moment when the eyes of the whole world are turned upon them; this is the moment to establish or ruin their national character for ever; this is the favorable moment to give such a tone to our federal government, as will enable it to answer the ends of its institution, or this may be the ill-fated moment for relaxing the powers of the Union, annihilating the cement of the confederation, and exposing us to become the sport of European politics, which may play one State against another, to prevent their growing importance, and to serve their own interested purposes. For, according to the system of policy the States shall adopt at this moment, they will stand or fall; and by their confirmation or lapse it is yet to be decided, whether the revolution must ultimately be considered as a blessing or a curse; a blessing or a curse, not to the present age alone, for with our fate will the destiny of unborn millions be involved.

With this conviction of the importance of the present crisis, silence in me would be a crime. I will therefore speak to your Excellency the language of freedom and of sincerity without disguise. I am aware, however, that those who differ from me in political sentiment, may perhaps remark, I am stepping out of the proper line of my duty, and may possibly ascribe to arrogance or ostentation, what I know is alone the result of the purest intention. But the rectitude of my own heart, which disdains such unworthy motives; the part I have hitherto acted in life; the determination I have formed, of not taking any share in public business hereafter; the ardent desire I feel, and shall continue to manifest, of quietly enjoying, in private life, after all the toils of war, the benefits of a wise and liberal government, will, I flatter myself, sooner or later convince my countrymen, that I could have no sinister views in delivering, with so little reserve, the opinions contained in this address.

There are four things, which, I humbly conceive, are essential to the well-being, I may even venture to say, to the existence of the United States, as an independent power.

First. An indissoluble union of the States under one federal head.

Secondly. A sacred regard to public justice.

Thirdly. The adoption of a proper peace establishment; and,

Fourthly. The prevalence of that pacific and friendly disposition among the people of the United States, which will induce them to forget their local prejudices and policies; to make those mutual concessions, which are requisite to the general prosperity; and, in some instances, to sacrifice their individual advantages to the interest of the community.

These are the pillars on which the glorious fabric of our independency and national character must be supported. Liberty is the basis; and whoever would dare to sap the foundation, or overturn the structure, under whatever specious pretext he may attempt it, will merit the bitterest execration, and the severest punishment, which can be inflicted by his injured country.

On the three first articles I will make a few observations, leaving the last to the good sense and serious consideration of those immediately concerned.

Under the first head, although it may not be necessary or proper for me, in this place, to enter into a particular disquisition on the principles of the Union, and to take up the great question which has been frequently agitated, whether it be expedient and requisite for the States to delegate a larger proportion of power to Congress, or not; yet it will be a part of my duty, and that of every true patriot, to assert without reserve, and to insist upon, the following positions. That, unless the States will suffer Congress to exercise those prerogatives they are undoubtedly invested with by the constitution, every thing must very rapidly tend to anarchy and confusion. That it is indispensable to the happiness of the individual States, that there should be lodged somewhere a supreme power to regulate and govern the general concerns of the confederated republic, without which the Union cannot be of long duration. That there must be a faithful and pointed compliance, on the part of every State, with the late proposals and demands of Congress, or the most fatal consequences will ensue. That whatever measures have a tendency to dissolve the Union, or contribute to violate or lessen the sovereign authority, ought to be considered as hostile to the liberty and independency of America, and the authors of them treated accordingly. And lastly, that unless we can be enabled, by the concurrence of the States, to participate of the fruits of the revolution, and enjoy the essential benefits of civil society, under a form of government so free and uncorrupted, so happily guarded against the danger of oppression, as has been devised and adopted by the articles of confederation, it will be a subject of regret, that so much blood and treasure have been lavished for no purpose, that so many sufferings have been encountered without a compensation, and that so many sacrifices have been made in vain.

Many other considerations might here be adduced to prove, that, without an entire conformity to the spirit of the Union, we cannot exist as an independent power. It will be sufficient for my purpose to mention but one or two, which seem to me of the greatest importance. It is only in our united character, as an empire, that our independence is acknowledged, that our power can be regarded, or our credit supported, among foreign nations. The treaties of the European powers with the United States of America will have no validity on a dissolution of the Union. We shall be left nearly in a state of nature; or we may find, by our own unhappy experience, that there is a natural and necessary progression from the extreme of anarchy to the extreme of tyranny, and that arbitrary power is most easily established on the ruins of liberty, abused to licentiousness.

As to the second article, which respects the performance of public justice, Congress have, in their late address to the United States, almost exhausted the subject; they have explained their ideas so fully, and have enforced the obligations the States are under, to render complete justice to all the public creditors, with so much dignity and energy, that, in my opinion, no real friend to the honor of independency of America can hesitate a single moment, respecting the propriety of complying with the just and honorable measures proposed. If their arguments do not produce conviction, I know of nothing that will have greater influence: especially when we recollect, that the system referred to, being the result of the collected wisdom of the continent, must be esteemed, if not perfect, certainly the least objectionable of any that could be devised; and that, if it shall not be carried into immediate execution, a national bankruptcy, with all its deplorable consequences, will take place, before any different plan can possibly be proposed and adopted. So pressing are the present circumstances, and such is the alternative now offered to the States.

The ability of the country to discharge the debts, which have been incurred in its defence, is not to be doubted; and inclination, I flatter myself, will not be wanting. The path of our duty is plain before us; honesty will be found, on every experiment, to be the best and only true policy. Let us then, as a nation, be just; let us fulfil the public contracts, which Congress had undoubtedly a right to make for the purpose of carrying on the war, with the same good faith we suppose ourselves bound to perform our private engagements. In the mean time, let an attention to the cheerful performance of their proper business, as individuals and as members of society, be earnestly inculcated on the citizens of America; then will they strengthen the hands of government, and be happy under its protection; every one will reap the fruit of his labors, every one will enjoy his own acquisitions, without molestation and without danger.

In this state of absolute freedom and perfect security, who will grudge to yield a very little of his property to support the common interest of society, and insure the protection of government? Who does not remember the frequent declarations, at the commencement of the war, that we should be completely satisfied, if, at the expense of one half, we could defend the remainder of our possessions? Where is the man to be found, who wishes to remain indebted for the defence of his own person and property to the exertions, the bravery, and the blood of others, without making one generous effort to repay the debt of honor and gratitude? In what part of the continent shall we find any man, or body of men, who would not blush to stand up and propose measures purposely calculated to rob the soldier of his stipend, and the public creditor of his due? And were it possible, that such a flagrant instance of injustice could ever happen, would it not excite the general indignation, and tend to bring down upon the authors of such measures the aggravated vengeance of Heaven? If, after all, a spirit of disunion, or a temper of obstinacy and perverseness should manifest itself in any of the States; if such an ungracious disposition should attempt to frustrate all the happy effects that might be expected to flow from the Union; if there should be a refusal to comply with the requisition for funds to discharge the annual interest of the public debts; and if that refusal should revive all those jealousies, and produce all those evils, which are now happily removed, Congress, who have, in all their transactions, shown a great degree of magnanimity and justice, will stand justified in the sight of God and man; and the State alone, which puts itself in opposition to the aggregate wisdom of the continent, and follows such mistaken and pernicious counsels, will be responsible for all the consequences.

For my own part, conscious of having acted, while a servant of the public, in the manner I conceived best suited to promote the real interests of my country; having, in consequence of my fixed belief, in some measure pledged myself to the army, that their country would finally do them complete and ample justice; and not wishing to conceal any instance of my official conduct from the eyes of the world, I have thought proper to transmit to your Excellency the enclosed collection of papers, relative to the half-pay and commutation granted by Congress to the officers of the army. From these communications, my decided sentiments will be clearly comprehended, together with the conclusive reasons which induced me, at an early period, to recommend the adoption of this measure, in the most earnest and serious manner. As the proceedings of Congress, the army, and myself, are open to all, and contain, in my opinion, sufficient information to remove the prejudices and errors, which may have been entertained by any, I think it unnecessary to say any thing more than just to observe, that the resolutions of Congress, now alluded to, are undoubtedly as absolutely binding upon the United States, as the most solemn acts of confederation or legislation.

As to the idea, which, I am informed, has in some instances prevailed, that the half-pay and commutation are to be regarded merely in the odious light of a pension, it ought to be exploded for ever. That provision should be viewed, as it really was, a reasonable compensation offered by Congress, at a time when they had nothing else to give to the officers of the army for services then to be performed. It was the only means to prevent a total dereliction of the service. It was a part of their hire. I may be allowed to say, it was the price of their blood, and of your independency; it is therefore more than a common debt, it is a debt of honor; it can never be considered as a pension or gratuity, nor be cancelled until it is fairly discharged.

With regard to a distinction between officers and soldiers, it is sufficient that the uniform experience of every nation of the world, combined with our own, proves the utility and propriety of the discrimination. Rewards, in proportion to the aids the public derives from them, are unquestionably due to all its servants. In some lines, the soldiers have perhaps generally had as ample a compensation for their services, by the large bounties which have been paid to them, as their officers will receive in the proposed commutation; in others, if, besides the donation of lands, the payment of arrearages of clothing and wages (in which articles all the component parts of the army must be put upon the same footing), we take into the estimate the douceurs many of the soldiers have received, and the gratuity of one year's full pay, which is promised to all, possibly their situation (every circumstance being duly considered) will not be deemed less eligible than that of the officers. Should a further reward, however, be judged equitable, I will venture to assert no one will enjoy greater satisfaction than myself, on seeing an exemption from taxes for a limited time, (which has been petitioned for in some instances,) or any other adequate immunity or compensation granted to the brave defenders of their country's cause; but neither the adoption or rejection of this proposition will in any manner affect, much less militate against, the act of Congress, by which they have offered five years' full pay, in lieu of the half-pay for life, which had been before promised to the officers of the army.

Before I conclude the subject of public justice, I cannot omit to mention the obligations this country is under to that meritorious class of veteran non-commissioned officers and privates, who have been discharged for inability, in consequence of the resolution of Congress of the 23d of April, 1782, on an annual pension for life. Their peculiar sufferings, their singular merits, and claims to that provision, need only be known, to interest all the feelings of humanity in their behalf. Nothing but a punctual payment of their annual allowance can rescue them from the most complicated misery; and nothing could be a more melancholy and distressing sight, than to behold those, who have shed their blood or lost their limbs in the service of their country, without a shelter, without a friend, and without the means of obtaining any of the necessities or comforts of life, compelled to beg their daily bread from door to door. Suffer me to recommend those of this description, belonging to your State, to the warmest patronage of your Excellency and your legislature.

It is necessary to say but a few words on the third topic which was proposed, and which regards particularly the defence of the republic; as there can be little doubt but Congress will recommend a proper peace establishment for the United States, in which a due attention will be paid to the importance of placing the militia of the Union upon a regular and respectable footing. If this should be the case, I would beg leave to urge the great advantage of it in the strongest terms. The militia of this country must be considered as the palladium of our security, and the first effectual resort in case of hostility. It is essential, therefore, that the same system should pervade the whole; that the formation and discipline of the militia of the continent should be absolutely uniform, and that the same species of arms, accoutrements, and military apparatus, should be introduced in every part of the United States. No one, who has not learned it from experience, can conceive the difficulty, expense, and confusion, which result from a contrary system, or the vague arrangements which have hitherto prevailed.

If, in treating of political points, a greater latitude than usual has been taken in the course of this address, the importance of the crisis, and the magnitude of the objects in discussion, must be my apology. It is, however, neither my wish or expectation, that the preceding observations should claim any regard, except so far as they shall appear to be dictated by a good intention, consonant to the immutable rules of justice, calculated to produce a liberal system of policy, and founded on whatever experience may have been acquired by a long and close attention to public business. Here I might speak with the more confidence, from my actual observations; and, if it would not swell this letter (already too prolix) beyond the bounds I had prescribed to myself, I could demonstrate to every mind open to conviction, that in less time, and with much less expense, than has been incurred, the war might have been brought to the same happy conclusion, if the resources of the continent could have been properly drawn forth; that the distresses and disappointments, which have very often occurred, have, in too many instances, resulted more from a want of energy in the Continental government, than a deficiency of means in the particular States; that the inefficacy of measures arising from the want of an adequate authority in the supreme power, from a partial compliance with the requisitions of Congress in some of the States, and from a failure of punctuality in others, while it tended to damp the zeal of those, which were more willing to exert themselves, served also to accumulate the expenses of the war, and to frustrate the best concerted plans; and that the discouragement occasioned by the complicated difficulties and embarrassments, in which our affairs were by this means involved, would have long ago produced the dissolution of any army, less patient, less virtuous, and less persevering, than that which I have had the honor to command. But, while I mention these things, which are notorious facts, as the defects of our federal constitution, particularly in the prosecution of a war, I beg it may be understood, that, as I have ever taken a pleasure in gratefully acknowledging the assistance and support I have derived from every class of citizens, so shall I always be happy to do justice to the unparalleled exertions of the individual States on many interesting occasions.

I have thus freely disclosed what I wished to make known, before I surrendered up my public trust to those who committed it to me. The task is now accomplished. I now bid adieu to your Excellency as the chief magistrate of your State, at the same time I bid a last farewell to the cares of office, and all the employments of public life.

It remains, then, to be my final and only request, that your Excellency will communicate these sentiments to your legislature at their next meeting, and that they may be considered as the legacy of one, who has ardently wished, on all occasions, to be useful to his country, and who, even in the shade of retirement, will not fail to implore the Divine benediction upon it.

I now make it my earnest prayer, that God would have you, and the State over which you preside, in his holy protection; that he would incline the hearts of the citizens to cultivate a spirit of subordination and obedience to government; to entertain a brotherly affection and love for one another, for their fellow citizens of the United States at large, and particularly for their brethren who have served in the field; and finally, that he would most graciously be pleased to dispose us all to do justice, to love mercy, and to demean ourselves with that charity, humility, and pacific temper of mind, which were the characteristics of the Divine Author of our blessed religion, and without an humble imitation of whose example in these things, we can never hope to be a happy nation.

I have the honor to be, with much esteem and respect, Sir, your Excellency's most obedient and most humble servant.

Farewell Orders to the Armies of the United States

ROCKY HILL, NEAR PRINCETON,

[SUNDAY] 2 NOVEMBER, 1783.

The United States in Congress assembled, after giving the most honorable testimony to the merits of the federal armies, and presenting them with the thanks of their country for their long, eminent and faithful services, having thought proper, by their proclamation bearing date the 18th day of October last, to discharge such part of the troops as were engaged for the war, and to permit the officers on furlough to retire from service from and after tomorrow; which proclamation having been communicated in the public papers for the information and government of all concerned, it only remains for the Commander-in-chief to address himself once more, and that for the last time, to the armies of the United States (however widely dispersed the individuals who compose them may be), and to bid them an affectionate, a long farewell.

But before the Commander-in-Chief takes his final leave of those he holds most dear, he wishes to indulge himself a few moments in calling to mind a slight review of the past. He will then take the liberty of exploring with his military friends their future prospects, of advising the general line of conduct, which, in his opinion, ought to be pursued; and he will conclude the address by expressing the obligations he feels himself under for the spirited and able assistance he has experienced from them, in the performance of an arduous office.

A contemplation of the complete attainment (at a period earlier than could have been expected) of the object, for which we contended against so formidable a power, cannot but inspire us with astonishment and gratitude. The disadvantageous circumstances on our part, under which the war was undertaken, can never be forgotten. The singular interpositions of Providence in our feeble condition were such, as could scarcely escape the attention of the most unobserving; while the unparalleled perseverance of the armies of the United States, through almost every possible suffering and discouragement for the space of eight long years, was little short of a standing miracle.

It is not the meaning nor within the compass of this address, to detail the hardships peculiarly incident to our service, or to describe the distresses, which in several instances have resulted from the extremes of hunger and nakedness, combined with the rigors of an inclement season; nor is it necessary to dwell on the dark side of our past affairs. Every American officer and soldier must now console himself for any unpleasant circumstances, which may have occurred, by a recollection of the uncommon scenes in which he has been called to act no inglorious part, and the astonishing events of which he has been a witness; events which have seldom, if ever before, taken place on the stage of human action; nor can they probably ever happen again. For who has before seen a disciplined army formed at once from such raw materials? Who, that was not a witness, could imagine, that the most violent local prejudices would cease so soon; and that men, who came from the different parts of the continent, strongly disposed by the habits of education to despise and quarrel with each other, would instantly become but one patriotic band of brothers? Or who, that was not on the spot, can trace the steps by which such a wonderful revolution has been effected, and such a glorious period put to all our warlike toils?

It is universally acknowledged, that the enlarged prospects of happiness, opened by the confirmation of our independence and sovereignty, almost exceeds the power of description. And shall not the brave men, who have contributed so essentially to these inestimable acquisitions, retiring victorious from the field of war to the field of agriculture, participate in all the blessings, which have been obtained? In such a republic, who will exclude them from the rights of citizens, and the fruits of their labors? In such a country, so happily circumstanced, the pursuits of commerce and the cultivation of the soil will unfold to industry the certain road to competence. To those hardy soldiers, who are actuated by the spirit of adventure, the fisheries will afford ample and profitable employment; and the extensive and fertile regions of the West will yield a most happy asylum to those, who, fond of domestic enjoyment, are seeking for personal independence. Nor is it possible to conceive, that any one of the United States will prefer a national bankruptcy, and a dissolution of the Union, to a compliance with the requisitions of Congress, and the payment of its just debts; so that the officers and soldiers may expect considerable assistance, in recommencing their civil occupations, from the sums due to them from the public, which must and will most inevitably be paid.

In order to effect this desirable purpose, and to remove the prejudices, which may have taken possession of the minds of any of the good people of the States, it is earnestly recommended to all the troops, that, with strong attachments to the Union, they should carry with them into civil society the most conciliating dispositions, and that they should prove themselves not less virtuous and useful as citizens, than they have been persevering and victorious as soldiers. What though there should be some envious individuals, who are unwilling to pay the debt the public has contracted, or to yield the tribute due to merit; yet let such unworthy treatment produce no invective, or any instance of intemperate conduct. Let it be remembered, that the unbiassed voice of the free citizens of the United States has promised the just reward and given the merited applause. Let it be known and remembered, that the reputation of the federal armies is established beyond the reach of malevolence; and let a consciousness of their achievements and fame still incite the men, who composed them, to honorable actions; under the persuasion that the private virtues of economy, prudence, and industry, will not be less amiable in civil life, than the more splendid qualities of valor, perseverance and enterprise were in the field. Every one may rest assured, that much, very much, of the future happiness of the officers and men, will depend upon the wise and manly conduct, which shall be adopted by them when they are mingled with the great body of the community. And, although the General has so frequently given it as his opinion in the most public and explicit manner, that, unless the principles of the Federal Government were properly supported, and the powers of the Union increased, the honor, dignity, and justice of the nation would be lost forever; yet he cannot help repeating, on this occasion, so interesting a sentiment, and leaving it as his last injunction to every officer and every soldier, who may view the subject in the same serious point of light, to add his best endeavors to those of his worthy fellow citizens towards effecting these great and valuable purposes, on which our very existence as a nation so materially depends.

The Commander-in-chief conceives little is now wanting, to enable the soldier, to change the military character into that of the citizen, but that steady and decent tenor of behavior, which has generally distinguished, not only the army under his immediate command, but the different detachments and separate armies, through the course of the war. From their good sense and prudence he anticipates the happiest consequences; and, while he congratulates them on the glorious occasion, which renders their services in the field no longer necessary, he wishes to express the strong obligations he feels himself under for the assistance he has received from every class and in every instance. He presents his thanks in the most serious and affectionate manner to the general officers, as well for their counsel on many interesting occasions, as for their ardor in promoting the success of the plans he had adopted; to the commandants of regiments and corps, and to the other officers, for their great zeal and attention in carrying his orders promptly into execution; to the staff, for their alacrity and exactness in performing the duties of their several departments; and to the non-commissioned officers and private soldiers, for their extraordinary patience and suffering, as well as their invincible fortitude in action. To the various branches of the army, the General takes this last and solemn opportunity of professing his inviolable attachment and friendship. He wishes more than bare professions were in his power; that he were really able to be useful to them all in future life. He flatters himself, however, they will do him the justice to believe, that whatever could with propriety be attempted by him has been done.

And being now to conclude these his last public orders, to take his ultimate leave in a short time of the military character, and to bid a final adieu to the armies he has so long had the honor to command, he can only again offer in their behalf his recommendations to their grateful country, and his prayers to the God of armies. May ample justice be done them here, and may the choicest of Heaven's favors, both here and hereafter, attend those, who, under the Divine auspices, have secured innumerable blessings for others. With these wishes and this benediction, the Commander-in-chief is about to retire from service. The curtain of separation will soon be drawn, and the military scene to him will be closed for ever.

Address to Congress on resigning his Commission

ANNAPOLIS, 23 DECEMBER, 1783.

Mr. President,

The great events, on which my resignation depended, having at length taken place, I have now the honor of offering my sincere congratulations to Congress, and of presenting myself before them, to surrender into their hands the trust committed to me, and to claim the indulgence of retiring from the Service of my Country.

Happy in the confirmation of our Independence and Sovereignty, and pleased with the opportunity afforded the United States of becoming a respectable nation, I resign with satisfaction the appointment I accepted with diffidence; a diffidence in my abilities to accomplish so arduous a task, which, however, was superseded by a condence in the rectitude of our cause, the support of the supreme Power of the Union, and the patronage of Heaven.

The successful termination of the war has verified the most sanguine expectations; and my gratitude for the interposition of Providence, and the assistance I have received from my Countrymen, encreases with every review of the momentous contest.

While I repeat my obligations to the Army in general, I should do injustice to my own feelings not to acknowledge, in this place, the peculiar services and distinguished merits of the Gentlemen, who have been attached to my person during the war. It was impossible that the choice of confidential officers to compose my family should have been more fortunate. Permit me, Sir, to recommend in particular those, who have continued in Service to the present moment, as worthy of the favorable notice and patronage of Congress.

I consider it an indispensable duty to close this last solemn act of my official life, by commending the Interests of our dearest country to the protection of Almighty God, and those who have the superintendence of them to his holy keeping.

Having now finished the work assigned me, I retire from the great theatre of action; and, bidding an affectionate farewell to this august body, under whose orders I have so long acted, I here offer my commission, and take my leave of all the employments of public life.

Diary on Communication with the West

OCTOBER 4, 1784.

Hitherto, the people of the Western Country having had no excitements to Industry, labour very little;—the luxuriency of the Soil, with very little culture, produces provisions in abundance—these supplies the wants of the encreasing population—and the Spaniards when pressed by want have given high prices for flour—other articles they reject; and at times, (contrary I think to sound policy) shut their ports against them altogether—but let us open a good communication with the Settlements west of us—extend the inland Navigation as far as it can be done with convenience—and shew them by this means, how easy it is to bring the produce of their Lands to our Markets, and see how astonishingly our exports will be increased; and these States benefitted in a commercial point of view—wh. alone is an object of such Magnitude as to claim our closest attention—but when the subject is considered in a political point of view, it appears of much greater importance.

No well informed Mind need be told, that the flanks and rear of the United territory are possessed by other powers, and formidable ones too—nor how necessary it is to apply the cement of interest to bind all parts of it together, by one indissoluble band—particularly the middle States with the Country immediately back of them—for what ties let me ask, should we have upon those people; and how entirely unconnected shod. we be with them if the Spaniards on their right or great Britain on their left, instead of throwing stumbling blocks in their way as they now do; should invite their trade and seek alliances with them? What, when they get strength, which will be sooner than is generally imagined (from the emigration of Foreigners who can have no predeliction for us, as well as from the removal of our own Citizens) may be the consequence of their having formed such connections and alliances; requires no uncommon foresight to predict.

The Western Settlers—from my own observation—stand as it were on a pivot—the touch of a feather would almost incline them any way—they looked down the Mississippi until the Spaniards (very impolitically I think for themselves) threw difficulties in the way, and for no other reason that I can conceive than because they glided gently down the stream, without considering perhaps the tediousness of the voyage back, and the time necessary to perform it in; and because they have no other means of coming to us but by a long land transportation and unimproved Roads.

A combination of circumstances make the present conjuncture more favorable than any other to fix the trade of the Western Country to our Markets. The jealous and untoward disposition of the Spaniards on one side, and the private views of some individuals coinciding with the policy of the Court of G. Britain on the other, to retain the Posts of Oswego, Niagara, Detroit, &ca. (which tho' done under the letter of the treaty is certainly an infraction of the Spirit of it, and injurious to the Union) may be improved to the greatest advantage by this State if she would open her arms, and embrace the means which are necessary to establish it. The way is plain, and the expence, comparatively speaking deserves not a thought, so great would be the prize. The Western Inhabitants would do their part towards accomplishing it, weak as they now are, they would, I am persuaded meet us half way rather than be driven into the arms of, or be in any wise dependent upon, foreigners; the consequence of which would be, a seperation, or a War.

The way to avoid both, happily for us, is easy, and dictated by our clearest interest. It is to open a wide door, and make a smooth way for the produce of that Country to pass to our Markets before the trade may get into another channel—this, in my judgment, would dry up the other Sources; or if any part should flow down the Mississippi, from the Falls of the Ohio, in Vessels which may be built—fitted for Sea—and sold with their Cargoes, the proceeds I have no manner of doubt, will return this way; and that it is better to prevent an evil than to rectify a mistake none can deny—commercial connections of all others, are most difficult to dissolve—if we wanted proof of this, look to the avidity with which we are renewing, after a total suspension of Eight years, our correspondence with Great Britain;—So, if we are supine, and suffer without a struggle the Settlers of the Western Country to form commercial connections with the Spaniards, Britons, or with any of the States in the Union we shall find it a difficult matter to dissolve them altho' a better communication should thereafter, be presented to them—time only could effect it; such is the force of habit!

Rumseys discovery of working Boats against stream, by mechanical powers principally, may not only be considered as a fortunate invention for these States in general but as one of those circumstances which have combined to render the present epoche favorable above all others for securing (if we are disposed to avail ourselves of them) a large portion of the produce of the Western Settlements, and of the Fur and Peltry of the Lakes, also—the importation of which alone, if there were no political considerations in the way, is immense.

It may be said perhaps, that as the most direct Routs from the Lakes to the Navigation of Potomack are through the State of Pennsylvania—and the intert. of that State opposed to the extension of the Waters of Monongahela, that a communication cannot be had either by the Yohiogany or Cheat River;—but herein I differ—an application to this purpose would in my opinion, place the Legislature of that Commonwealth in a very delicate situation. That it would not be pleasing I can readily conceive, but that they would refuse their assent, I am by no means clear in. There is in that State, at least 100,000 Souls West of the Laurel hill, who are groaning under the inconveniences of a long land transportation. They are wishing, indeed looking, for the extension of inland Navigation; and if this can not be made easy for them to Philadelphia—at any rate it must be lengthy—they will seek a Mart elsewhere; and none is so convenient as that which offers itself through Yohiogany or Cheat River—the certain consequence therefore of an attempt to restrain the extension of the Navigation of these Rivers, (so consonant with the interest of these people) or to impose any extra duties upon the exports, or imports, to or from another State, would be a seperation of the Western Settlers from the old and more interior government; towards which there is not wanting a disposition at this moment in the former.

Letter to Henry Lee, in Congress, on Shays Rebellion

MOUNT VERNON, 31 OCTOBER, 1786.

My dear Sir,

I am indebted to you for your several favors of the 1st, 11th, and 17th of this instant, and shall reply to them in the order of their dates. But first let me thank you for the interesting communications imparted by them.

The picture which you have exhibited, and the accounts which are published of the commotions and temper of numerous bodies in the eastern States, are equally to be lamented and deprecated. They exhibit a melancholy proof of what our transatlantic foe has predicted; and of another thing perhaps, which is still more to be regretted, and is yet more unaccountable, that mankind, when left to themselves, are unfit for their own government. I am mortified beyond expression when I view the clouds, that have spread over the brightest morn that ever dawned upon any country. In a word, I am lost in amazement when I behold what intrigue, the interested views of desperate characters, ignorance, and jealousy of the minor part, are capable of effecting, as a scourge on the major part of our fellow citizens of the Union; for it is hardly to be supposed, that the great body of the people, though they will not act, can be so shortsighted or enveloped in darkness, as not to see rays of a distant sun through all this mist of intoxication and folly.

You talk, my good Sir, of employing influence to appease the present tumults in Massachusetts. I know not where that influence is to be found, or, if attainable, that it would be a proper remedy for the disorders. Influence is no government. Let us have one by which our lives, liberties, and properties will be secured or let us know the worst at once. Under these impressions, my humble opinion is, that there is a call for decision. Know precisely what the insurgents aim at. If they have real grievances, redress them if possible; or acknowledge the justice of them, and your inability to do it in the present moment. If they have not, employ the force of government against them at once. If this is inadequate, all will be convinced, that the superstructure is bad, or wants support. To be more exposed in the eyes of the world, and more contemptible than we already are, is hardly possible. To delay one or the other of these, is to exasperate on the one hand, or to give confidence on the other, and will add to their numbers; for, like snow-balls, such bodies increase by every movement, unless there is something in the way to obstruct and crumble them before the weight is too great and irresistible.

These are my sentiments. Precedents are dangerous things. Let the reins of government then be braced and held with a steady hand, and every violation of the constitution be reprehended. If defective, let it be amended, but not suffered to be trampled upon whilst it has an existence.

With respect to the navigation of the Mississippi, you already know my sentiments thereon. They have been uniformly the same, and, as I have observed to you in a former letter, are controverted by one consideration, only of weight, and that is, the operation which the conclusion of it may have on the minds of the western settlers, who will not consider the subject in a relative point of view, or on a comprehensive scale, and may be influenced by the demagogues of the country to acts of extravagance and desperation, under a popular declamation, that their interests are sacrificed. Colonel Mason at present is in a fit of the gout. What [his] sentiments on the subject are, I know not, nor whether he will be able to attend the Assembly during the present session. For some reasons, however, (which need not be mentioned,) I am inclined to believe he will advocate the navigation of that river. But in all matters of great national moment, the only true line of conduct, in my opinion, is dispassionately to compare the advantages and disadvantages of the measure proposed, and decide from the balance. The lesser evil, where there is a choice of them, should always yield to the greater. What benefits, more than we now enjoy, are to be obtained by such a treaty as you have delineated with Spain, I am not enough of a commercial man to give any opinion on. The china came to hand without much damage & I thank you for your attention in the procuring & forwarding it. Mrs. Washington joins me in best wishes for Mrs. Lee and yourself and I am very affectionately, Dear Sir Yr. Most Obedt. & Obligated Hble. Servant.

George Washington

Letter to Henry Knox on Crisis in the Confederation

MOUNT VERNON, 26 DECEMBER, 1786.

My dear Sir,

... I feel, my dear General Knox, infinitely more than I can express to you, for the disorders, which have arisen in these States. Good God! Who, besides a Tory, could have foreseen, or a Briton predicted them? Were these people wiser than others, or did they judge of us from the corruption and depravity of their own hearts? The latter I am persuaded was the case and that notwithstanding the boasted virtue of America we are very little if anything behind them in dispositions to every thing that is bad.

I do assure you, that even at this moment, when I reflect upon the present prospect of our affairs, it seems to me to be like the vision of a dream. My mind can scarcely realize it as a thing in actual existence; so strange, so wonderful does it appear to me. In this, as in most other matters, we are too slow. When this spirit first dawned, probably it might have been easily checked; but it is scarcely within the reach of human ken, at this moment, to say when, where, or how it will terminate. There are combustibles in every State, which a spark might set fire to. In this a perfect calm prevails at present; and a prompt disposition to support and give energy to the federal system is discovered, if the unlucky stirring of the dispute respecting the navigation of the Mississippi does not become a leaven that will ferment and sour the mind of it.

The resolutions of the present session respecting a paper emission, military certificates, &c., have stamped justice and liberality on the proceedings of the Assembly. By a late act, it seems very desirous of a general convention to revise and amend the federal constitution. Apropos; what prevented the eastern States from attending the September meeting at Annapolis? Of all the States in the Union it should have seemed to me, that a measure of this sort, (distracted as they were with internal commotions and experiencing the want of energy in the government,) would have been most pleasing to them. What are the prevailing sentiments of the one now proposed to be held in Philadelphia in May next? and how will it be attended? You are at the fountain of intelligence, where the wisdom of the nation, it is to be presumed, is concentrated; consequently better able, (as I have had sufficient experience of your intelligence, confidence, and candor,) to solve these questions.

The Maryland Assembly has been violently agitated by the question for a paper emission. It has been carried in the House of Delegates; but what has been or may be the fate of the bill in the Senate, I have not yet heard. The partisans in favor of the measure in the lower House threaten, it is said, a secession, if it is rejected by that branch of the legislature. Thus are we advancing. In regretting, which I have often done with the keenest sorrow, the death of our much lamented friend General Greene, I have accompanied it of late with a query, whether he would not have preferred such an exit to the scenes, which, it is more than probable, many of his compatriots may live to bemoan.

In both your letters you intimate, that the men of reflection, principle, and property in New England, feeling the inefficacy of their present government, are contemplating a change; but you are not explicit with respect to its nature. It has been supposed, that the constitution of the State of Massachusetts was amongst the most energetic in the Union. May not these disorders then be ascribed to an indulgent exercise of the powers of administration? If your laws authorized, and your powers are equal to the suppression of these tumults in the first instance, delay and unnecessary expedients were improper. These are rarely well applied; and the same causes would produce similar effects in any form of government, if the powers of it are not exercised. I ask this question for information. I know nothing of the facts.

That Great Britain will be an unconcerned spectator of the present insurrections, if they continue, is not to be expected. That she is at this moment sowing the seeds of jealousy and discontent among the various tribes of Indians on our frontiers, admits of no doubt in my mind; and that she will improve every opportunity to foment the spirit of turbulence within the bowels of the United States, with a view of distracting our governments and promoting divisions, is with me not less certain. Her first manoeuvres in this will no doubt be covert, and may remain so till the period shall arrive when a decided line of conduct may avail her. Charges of violating the treaty, and other pretexts, will then not be wanting to color overt acts, tending to effect the great objects of which she has long been in labor. A man is now at the head of their American affairs, well calculated to conduct measures of this kind, and more than probably was selected for the purpose. We ought not therefore to sleep nor to slumber. Vigilance in watching and vigor in acting is become in my opinion indispensably necessary. If the powers are inadequate, amend or alter them; but do not let us sink into the lowest state of humiliation and contempt, and become a by-word in all the earth. I think with you, that the spring will unfold important and distressing scenes, unless much wisdom and good management is displayed in the interim. Adieu. Be assured no man has a higher esteem and regard for you, than I have; none more sincerely your friend and more affectly. yr. hble. Servt.

G. Washington

Letter to Alexander Hamilton on The Federalist and Presidency

MOUNT VERNON, 28 AUGUST, 1788.

Dear Sir,

* * * * *

As the perusal of the political papers under the signature of PUBLIUS has afforded me great satisfaction, I shall certainly consider them as claiming a most distinguished place in my library. I have read every performance, which has been printed on one side and the other of the great question lately agitated (so far as I have been able to obtain them); and, without an unmeaning compliment, I will say, that I have seen no other so well calculated, in my judgment, to produce conviction on an unbiassed mind as the production of your triumvirate. When the transient circumstances and fugitive performances, which attended this crisis, shall have disappeared, that work will merit the notice of posterity, because in it are candidly and ably discussed the principles of freedom and the topics of government, which will be always interesting to mankind, so long as they shall be connected in civil society.

The circular letter from your convention I presume was the equivalent, by which you obtained an acquiescence in the proposed constitution. Notwithstanding I am not very well satisfied with the tendency of it, yet the federal affairs had proceeded, with few exceptions, in so good a train, that I hope the political machine may be put in motion, without much effort or hazard of miscarrying.

On the delicate subject with which you conclude your letter, I can say nothing, because the event alluded to may never happen, and because, in case it should occur, it would be a point of prudence to defer forming one's ultimate and irrevocable decision, so long as new data might be afforded for one to act with the greater wisdom and propriety. I would not wish to conceal my prevailing sentiment from you; for you know me well enough, my good Sir, to be persuaded, that I am not guilty of affectation when I tell you, that it is my great and sole desire to live and die in peace and retirement on my own farm. Were it even indispensable, a different line of conduct should be adopted, while you and some others who are acquainted with my heart would acquit, the world and posterity might possibly accuse me [of] inconsistency and ambition. Still I hope I shall always possess firmness and virtue enough to maintain (what I consider the most enviable of all titles), the character of an honest man, as well as prove, what I desire to be considered in reality, that I am, with great sincerity and esteem,

Dear Sir, &c.

Inaugural Address to Both Houses of Congress

APRIL 30, 1789.

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives,

Among the vicissitudes incident to life, no event could have filled me with greater anxieties, than that of which the notification was transmitted by your order, and received on the 14th day of the present month. On the one hand, I was summoned by my country, whose voice I can never hear but with veneration and love, from a retreat which I had chosen with the fondest predilection, and, in my flattering hopes, with an immutable decision, as the asylum of my declining years; a retreat which was rendered every day more necessary as well as more dear to me, by the addition of habit to inclination, and of frequent interruptions in my health to the gradual waste committed on it by time. On the other hand, the magnitude and difficulty of the trust, to which the voice of my country called me, being sufficient to awaken in the wisest and most experienced of her citizens a distrustful scrutiny into his qualifications, could not but overwhelm with despondence one, who, inheriting inferior endowments from nature, and unpractised in the duties of civil administration, ought to be peculiarly conscious of his own deficiencies. In this conflict of emotions, all I dare aver is, that it has been my faithful study to collect my duty from a just appreciation of every circumstance by which it might be affected. All I dare hope is, that, if in executing this task, I have been too much swayed by a grateful remembrance of former instances, or by an affectionate sensibility to this transcendent proof of the confidence of my fellow-citizens; and have thence too little consulted my incapacity as well as disinclination for the weighty and untried cares before me; my error will be palliated by the motives which misled me, and its consequences be judged by my country with some share of the partiality in which they originated.

Such being the impressions under which I have, in obedience to the public summons, repaired to the present station, it would be peculiarly improper to omit, in this first official act, my fervent supplications to that Almighty Being, who rules over the universe, who presides in the councils of nations, and whose providential aids can supply every human defect, that his benediction may consecrate to the liberties and happiness of the people of the United States a government instituted by themselves for these essential purposes, and may enable every instrument employed in its administration to execute with success the functions allotted to his charge. In tendering this homage to the great Author of every public and private good, I assure myself that it expresses your sentiments not less than my own; nor those of my fellow-citizens at large, less than either. No people can be bound to acknowledge and adore the invisible hand, which conducts the affairs of men, more than the people of the United States. Every step, by which they have advanced to the character of an independent nation, seems to have been distinguished by some token of providential agency. And, in the important revolution just accomplished in the system of their united government, the tranquil deliberations and voluntary consent of so many distinct communities, from which the event has resulted, cannot be compared with the means by which most governments have been established, without some return of pious gratitude along with an humble anticipation of the future blessings which the past seem to presage. These reflections, arising out of the present crisis, have forced themselves too strongly on my mind to be suppressed. You will join with me, I trust, in thinking that there are none, under the influence of which the proceedings of a new and free government can more auspiciously commence.

By the article establishing the executive department, it is made the duty of the President "to recommend to your consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." The circumstances, under which I now meet you, will acquit me from entering into that subject farther than to refer you to the great constitutional charter under which we are assembled; and which, in defining your powers, designates the objects to which your attention is to be given. It will be more consistent with those circumstances, and far more congenial with the feelings which actuate me, to substitute, in place of a recommendation of particular measures, the tribute that is due to the talents, the rectitude, and the patriotism, which adorn the characters selected to devise and adopt them. In these honorable qualifications I behold the surest pledges, that as, on one side, no local prejudices or attachments, no separate views or party animosities, will misdirect the comprehensive and equal eye, which ought to watch over this great assemblage of communities and interests; so, on another, that the foundations of our national policy will be laid in the pure and immutable principles of private morality, and the pre-eminence of a free government be exemplified by all the attributes, which can win the affections of its citizens, and command the respect of the world.

I dwell on this prospect with every satisfaction, which an ardent love for my country can inspire; since there is no truth more thoroughly established, than that there exists in the economy and course of nature an indissoluble union between virtue and happiness, between duty and advantage, between the genuine maxims of an honest and magnanimous policy, and the solid rewards of public prosperity and felicity; since we ought to be no less persuaded that the propitious smiles of Heaven can never be expected on a nation that disregards the eternal rules of order and right, which Heaven itself has ordained; and since the preservation of the sacred fire of liberty, and the destiny of the republican model of government, are justly considered as deeply, perhaps as finally staked, on the experiment intrusted to the hands of the American people.

Besides the ordinary objects submitted to your care, it will remain with your judgment to decide, how far an exercise of the occasional power delegated by the fifth article of the Constitution is rendered expedient at the present juncture by the nature of objections which have been urged against the system, or by the degree of inquietude which has given birth to them. Instead of undertaking particular recommendations on this subject, in which I could be guided by no lights derived from official opportunities, I shall again give way to my entire confidence in your discernment and pursuit of the public good; for I assure myself, that, whilst you carefully avoid every alteration, which might endanger the benefits of a united and effective government, or which ought to await the future lessons of experience; a reverence for the characteristic rights of freemen, and a regard for the public harmony, will sufficiently influence your deliberations on the question, how far the former can be more impregably fortified, or the latter be safely and advantageously promoted.

To the preceding observations I have one to add, which will be most properly addressed to the House of Representatives. It concerns myself, and will therefore be as brief as possible. When I was first honored with a call into the service of my country, then on the eve of an arduous struggle for its liberties, the light in which I contemplated my duty required, that I should renounce every pecuniary compensation. From this resolution I have in no instance departed. And being still under the impression which produced it, I must decline as inapplicable to myself any share in the personal emoluments, which may be indispensably included in a permanent provision for the executive department; and must accordingly pray, that the pecuniary estimates for the station in which I am placed may, during my continuance in it, be limited to such actual expenditures as the public good may be thought to require.

Having thus imparted to you my sentiments, as they have been awakened by the occasion which brings us together, I shall take my present leave; but not without resorting once more to the benign Parent of the human race, in humble supplication, that, since he has been pleased to favor the American people with opportunities for liberating in perfect tranquillity, and dispositions for deciding with unparalleled unanimity on a form of government for the security of their union and the advancement of their happiness; so his divine blessing may be equally conspicuous in the enlarged views, the temperate consultations, and the wise measures, on which the success of this government must depend.

Letter to John Jay on Democratic Societies and Whiskey Insurrection

PHILADELPHIA, 1 NOVEMBER, 1794.

My dear Sir,

On Tuesday last I returned from my tour to the westward. On Monday Congress by adjournment are to meet, and on the day following Mr. Bayard, according to his present expectation, is to leave this city for London. . . .

As you have been, and will continue to be, fully informed by the Secretary of State of all transactions of a public nature, which relate to, or may have an influence on, the points of your mission, it would be unnecessary for me to touch upon any of them in this letter, was it not for the presumption that the insurrection in the western counties of this State has excited much speculation, and a variety of opinions abroad, and will be represented differently according to the wishes of some and the prejudices of others, who may exhibit it as an evidence of what has been predicted, "that we are unable to govern ourselves." Under this view of the subject, I am happy in giving it to you as the general opinion, that this event having happened at the time it did was fortunate, although it will be attended with considerable expense.

That the self-created societies, which have spread themselves over this country, have been laboring incessantly to sow the seeds of distrust, jealousy, and of course discontent, thereby hoping to effect some revolution in the government, is not unknown to you. That they have been the fomenters of the western disturbances admits of no doubt in the mind of any one, who will examine their conduct; but fortunately they have precipitated a crisis for which they were not prepared, and thereby have unfolded views, which will, I trust, effectuate their annihilation sooner than it might otherwise have happened; at the same time that it has afforded an occasion for the people of this country to show their abhorrence of the result, and their attachment to the constitution and the laws; for I believe that five times the number of militia, that was required, would have come forward, if it had been necessary, in support of them.

The spirit, which blazed out on this occasion, as soon as the object was fully understood, and the lenient measures of the government were made known to the people, deserves to be communicated. There are instances of general officers going at the head of a single troop, and of light companies; of field-officers, when they came to the places of rendezvous, and found no command for them in that grade, turning into the ranks and proceeding as private soldiers, under their own captains; and of numbers, possessing the first fortunes in the country, standing in the ranks as private men, and marching day by day with their knapsacks and haversacks at their backs, sleeping on straw with a single blanket in a soldier's tent, during the frosty nights, which we have had, by way of example to others—nay more, many young Quakers, not discouraged by the elders, of the first families, character, and property, having turned into the ranks and are marching with the troops.

These things have terrified the insurgents, who had no conception that such a spirit prevailed, but, while the thunder only rumbled at a distance, were boasting of their strength, and wishing for and threatening the militia by turns; intimating that the arms they should take from them would soon become a magazine in their hands. Their language is much changed indeed, but their principles want correction.

I shall be more prolix in my speech to Congress on the commencement and progress of this insurrection, than is usual in such an instrument, or than I should have been on any other occasion; but, as numbers at home and abroad will hear of the insurrection, and will read the speech, that may know nothing of the documents to which it might refer, I conceived it would be better to encounter the charge of prolixity by giving a cursory detail of facts, that would show the prominent features of the thing, than to let it go naked into the world, to be dressed up according to the fancy or inclination of the readers, or the policy of our enemies.

I write nothing in answer to the letter of Mr. Wangenheim, enclosed by you to me. Were I to enter into correspondences of that sort, admitting there was no impropriety in the measure, I should be unable to attend to my ordinary duties. I have established it as a maxim neither to invite nor to discourage emigrants. My opinion is, that they will come hither as fast as the true interest and policy of the United States will be benefited by foreign population. I believe many of these, as Mr. Wangenheim relates, have been, and I fear will continue to be, imposed on by speculators in land and other things; but I know of no prevention but caution, nor any remedy except the laws. Nor is military or other employment so easily obtained as foreigners conceive, in a country where offices bear no proportion to the seekers of them.

With sincere esteem, & very grt. regd. I am Dr. Sir Yr. Affe. Sert.

George Washington

Letter to Secretary Randolph on Jay Treaty

MOUNT VERNON, 31 JULY, 1795.

My dear Sir,

* * * * *

To be wise and temperate, as well as firm, the present crisis most eminently calls for. There is too much reason to believe, from the pains which have been taken before, at, and since the advice of the Senate respecting the treaty, that the prejudices against it are more extensive than is generally imagined. This I have lately understood to be the case in this quarter, from men, who are of no party, but well-disposed to the present administration. How should it be otherwise, when no stone has been left unturned, that could impress on the minds of the people the most arrant misrepresentation of facts; that their rights have not only been neglected, but absolutely sold; that there are no reciprocal advantages in the treaty; that the benefits are all on the side of Great Britain; and, what seems to have had more weight with them than all the rest, and most pressed, that the treaty is made with the design to oppress the French, in open violation of our treaty with that nation, and contrary, too, to every principle of gratitude and sound policy? In time, when passion shall have yielded to sober reason, the current may possibly turn; but, in the mean while, this government in relation to France and England may be compared to a ship between the rocks of Scylla and Charybdis. If the treaty is ratified, the partisans of the French, (or rather of war and confusion,) will excite them to hostile measures, or at least to unfriendly sentiments; if it is not, there is no foreseeing all the consequences, which may follow, as it respects Great Britain.

It is not to be inferred from hence, that I am or shall be disposed to quit the ground I have taken, unless circumstances more imperious than have yet come to my knowledge should compel it; for there is but one straight course, and that is to seek truth and pursue it steadily. But these things are mentioned to show, that a close investigation of the subject is more than ever necessary, and that they are strong evidences of the necessity of the most circumspect conduct in carrying the determination of government into effect, with prudence as it respects our own people, and with every exertion to produce a change for the better from Great Britain.

The memorial seems well designed to answer the end proposed; and by the time it is revised and newdressed, you will probably (either in the resolutions, which are or will be handed to me, or in the newspaper publications, which you promised to be attentive to,) have seen all the objections against the treaty, which have any real force in them, and which may be fit subjects for representation in the memorial, or in the instructions, or both. But how much longer the presentative of the memorial can be delayed without exciting unpleasant sensations here, or involving serious evils elsewhere, you, who are at the scene of information and action, can decide better than I. In a matter, however, so interesting and pregnant of consequences as this treaty, there ought to be no precipitation; but, on the contrary, every step should be explored before it is taken, and every word weighed before it is uttered or delivered in writing.

The form of the ratification requires more diplomatic experience and legal knowledge than I possess, or have the means of acquiring at this place, and therefore I shall say nothing about it. I am, &c., &c.

George Washington's Farewell Address to the People of the United States

SEPTEMBER 17TH, 1796.

WASHINGTON'S Farewell Address to the people of the United States was issued September 17, 1796, primarily for the purpose of eliminating himself as a Presidential candidate for a third term. It was never read by the President in public, but was given to the people through the medium of David Claypoole's AMERICAN DAILY ADVERTISER, Philadelphia, in its issue of September 19, 1796.

The address may be analyzed as consisting of two parts: The first, the definite declination to serve a third term as President, and an explanation of Washington's reason therefor, together with the acknowledgment of his debt of gratitude to the country for the honors conferred upon him and the confidence with which the people had supported him.

The second, and more important part of the address, presents, as a last legacy of advice, Washington's thoughts upon the government of the United States, the result of his experience.

Friends, and Fellow-Citizens,

The period for a new election of a Citizen, to administer the Executive Government of the United States, being not far distant, and the time actually arrived, when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person, who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those, out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured, that this resolution has not been taken, without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation, which binds a dutiful citizen to his country—and that, in withdrawing the tender of service which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest, no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but act under and supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in, the office to which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire.—I constantly hoped, that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives, which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement, from which I had been reluctantly drawn.—The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign Nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.—

I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty, or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country, you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions, with which I first undertook the arduous trust, were explained on the proper occasion.—In the discharge of this trust, I will only say, that I have, with good intentions, contributed towards the organization and administration of the government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable.—Not unconscious, in the outset, of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and every day the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more, that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome.—Satisfied, that, if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services, they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe, that, while choice and prudence invited me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment, which is intended to terminate the career of my public life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude, which I owe to my beloved country,—for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal.—If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the Passions agitated in every direction were liable to mislead, amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging, in situations in which not unfrequently want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism, the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee of the plans by which they were effected.—Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to the grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that Heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue—that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these States, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete, by so careful a preservation and so prudent a use of this blessing as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and adoption of every nation, which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop.—But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments; which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a People.—These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsels.—Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.—

The Unity of Government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you.—It is justly so; for it is a main Pillar in the Edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquillity at home; your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity in every shape; of that very Liberty, which you so highly prize.—But as it is easy to foresee, that, from different causes, and from different quarters, much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth;—as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed, it is of infinite moment, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national Union to your collective and individual happiness;—that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the Palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can in any event be abandoned, and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our Country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest.—Citizens by birth or choice of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections.—The name of AMERICAN, which belongs to you, in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of Patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations.—With slight shades of difference, you have the same Religion, Manners, Habits, and political Principles.—You have in a common cause fought and triumphed together. The Independence and Liberty you possess are the work of joint councils, and joint efforts—of common dangers, sufferings and successes.—

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those, which apply more immediately to your Interest.—Here every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the Union of the whole.

The North in an unrestrained intercourse with the South, protected by the equal Laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise—and precious materials of manufacturing industry.—The South in the same intercourse, benefiting by the agency of the North, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the North, it finds its particular navigation invigorated;—and, while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength to which itself is unequally adapted.—The East, in a like intercourse with the West, already finds, in the progressive improvement of interior communications, by land and water, will more and more find, a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home.—The West derives from the East supplies requisite to its growth and comfort,—and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest, as one Nation.—Any other tenure by which the West can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength, or from an apostate and unnatural connexion with any foreign Power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While then every part of our Country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in Union, all the parts combined in the united mass of means and efforts cannot fail to find greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their Peace by foreign Nations; and, what is of inestimable value! they must derive from Union an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighboring countries, not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalships alone would be sufficient to produce; but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues would stimulate and embitter.—Hence likewise they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown Military establishments, which under any form of government, are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to Republican Liberty: In this sense it is, that your Union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind,—and exhibit the continuance of the UNION as a primary object of Patriotic desire.—Is there a doubt, whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere?—Let experience solve it.—To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. 'Tis well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to Union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those, who in any quarter may endeavor to weaken its bands.—

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as a matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by Geographical discriminations—North-ern and Southern—Atlantic and Western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief, that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of Party to acquire influence, within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts.—You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations;—They tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection.—The inhabitants of our Western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head.—They have seen, in the negotiation by the Executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the Senate, of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at that event, throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the General Government and in the Atlantic States unfriendly to their interests in regard to the MISSISSIPPI.—They have been witnesses to the formation of two Treaties, that with G. Britain, and that with Spain, which secure to them every thing they could desire, in respect to our Foreign Relations, towards confirming their prosperity.—Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the UNION by which they were procured?—Will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such there are, who would sever them from their Brethren, and connect them with Aliens?—

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a Government for the whole is indispensable.—No alliances however strict between the parts can be an adequate substitute.—They must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances in all times have experienced.—Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a Constitution of Government, better calculated than your former for an intimate Union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns.—This government, the offspring of your own choice uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support.—Respect for its authority, compliance with its Laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true Liberty.—The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their Constitutions of Government.—But the Constitution which at any time exists, 'till changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole People, is sacredly obligatory upon all.—The very idea of the power and the right of the People to establish Government, presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established Government.

All obstructions to the execution of the Laws, all combinations and associations, under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, controul, counteract, or awe the regular deliberation and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency.—They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force—to put in the place of the delegated will of the Nation, the will of a party;—often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community;—and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill-concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.—However combina-

may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the Power of the People and to usurp for themselves the reins of Government; destroying afterwards the very engines, which have lifted them to unjust dominion.—

Towards the preservation of your Government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular oppositions to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretexts.—One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the Constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown.—In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of Governments, as of other human institutions—that experience is the surest standard, by which to test the real tendency of the existing Constitution of a Country—that facility in changes upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion exposes to perpetual change, from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion:—and remember, specially, that, for the efficient management of your common interests, in a country so extensive as ours, a Government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of Liberty is indispensable.—Liberty itself will find in such a Government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest Guardian.—It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the Government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of Parties in the State, with particular reference to the founding of them on Geographical discriminations.—Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the Spirit of Party, generally.

This Spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind.—It exists under different shapes in all Governments, more or less stifled, controuled, or repressed; but, in those of the popular form, it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.—

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism.—But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism.—The disorders and miseries, which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an Individual: and sooner or later the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purposes of his own elevation, on the ruins of Public Liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight), the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of Party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise People to discourage and restrain it.—

It serves always to distract the Public Councils, and enfeeble the Public administration.—It agitates the community with ill founded jealousies and false alarms, kindles the animosity of one part against another, foment occasionally riot and insurrection.—It opens the doors to foreign influence and corruption, which find a facilitated access to the Government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country, are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the Administration of the Government, and serve to keep alive the Spirit of Liberty.—This within certain limits is probably true—and in Governments of a Monarchical cast, Patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favour, upon the spirit of party.—But in those of the popular character, in Governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged.—From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose,—and there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it.—A fire not to be quenched; it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent its bursting into a flame, lest, instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those entrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres; avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another.—The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism.—A just estimate of that love of power, and proneness to abuse it, which predominates in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position.—The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the Guardian of the Public Weal against invasions by the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern; some of them in our country and under our own eyes.—To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If in the opinion of the People, the distribution or modification of the Constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates.—But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed.—The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.—

Of all the dispositions and habits, which lead to political prosperity, Religion and morality are indispensable supports.—In vain would that man claim the tribute of Patriotism, who should labour to subvert these great Pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of Men and Citizens.—The mere Politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them.—A volume could not trace all their connexions with private and public felicity.—Let it simply be asked where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths, which are the instruments of investigation in Courts of Justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition, that morality can be maintained without religion.—Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure—reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.—

'T is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government.—The rule indeed extends with more or less force to every species of Free Government.—Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?—

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.—

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit.—One method of preserving it is, to use it as sparingly as possible:—avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering also that timely disbursements to prepare for danger frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it—avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions in time of Peace to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burthen which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your Representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate.—To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that towards the payment of debts there must be Revenue—that to have Revenue there must be taxes—that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant—that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper objects (which is always a choice of difficulties) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the Government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining Revenue which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.—

Observe good faith and justice towards all Nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all.—Religion and Morality enjoin this conduct; and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a People always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence.—Who can doubt that in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages, which might be lost by a steady adherence to it? Can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a Nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature.—Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others should be excluded; and that in place of them just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated.—The Nation, which indulges towards another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest.—Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable, when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur.—Hence frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed and bloody contests.—The Nation prompted by ill-will and resentment sometimes impels to War the Government, contrary to the best calculations of policy.—The Government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject;—at other times, it makes the animosity of the Nation subservient to projects of hostility instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives.—The peace often, sometimes perhaps the Liberty, of Nations has been the victim.—

So likewise a passionate attachment of one Nation for another produces a variety of evils.—Sympathy for the favourite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducement or justification: It leads also to concessions to the favourite Nation of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the Nation making the concessions; by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill-will, and a disposition to retaliate, in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambition, corrupted, or deluded citizens, (who devote themselves to the favourite Nation) facility to betray, or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity:—gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption or infatuation.—

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent Patriot.—How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practise the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils! Such an attachment of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, I conjure you to believe me, fellow-citizens, the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican Government.—But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial; else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defence against it.—Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike of another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other.—Real Patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favourite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.—

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign Nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little Political connection as possible.—So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.—

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation.—Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns.—Hence therefore it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships, or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course.—If we remain one People, under an efficient government, the period is not far off, when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected. When belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interest guided by our justice shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation?—Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground?—Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humour, or caprice?—

'T is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances, with any portion of the foreign world;—so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it—for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements, (I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than to private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy).—I repeat it therefore let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense.—But in my opinion it is unnecessary and would be unwise to extend them.—

Taking care always to keep ourselves, by suitable establishments, on a respectably defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.—

Harmony, liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand:—neither seeking nor granting exclusive favours or preferences;—consulting the natural course of things;—diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing;—establishing with Powers so disposed—in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our Merchants, and to enable the Government to support them—conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit; but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied, as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view that 't is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favours from another,—that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character—that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favours and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more.—There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favours from Nation to Nation.—'T is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my Countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression, I could wish,—that they will controul the usual current of the passions, or prevent our Nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of Nations.—But if I may even flatter myself, that they may be productive of some partial benefit; some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism, this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare, by which they have been dictated.—

How far in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public Records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to You, and to the world.—To myself the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have at least believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting War in Europe, my Proclamation of the 22d of April 1793 is the index to my plan.—Sanctioned by your approving voice and by that of Your Representatives in both Houses of Congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me:—uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound in duty and interest, to take a Neutral position.—Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it, with moderation, perseverance, and firmness.—

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe, that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the Belligerent Powers, has been virtually admitted by all.—

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without anything more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every Nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of Peace and Amity towards other Nations.—

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience.—With me, a predominant motive has been to endeavour to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress without interruption to that degree of strength and consistency, which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortune.

Though, in reviewing the incidents of my Administration, I am unconscious of intentional error—I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors.—Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend.—I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it, which is so natural to a man, who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations;—I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat, in which I promise myself to realize, without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow-citizens, the benign influence of good Laws under a free Government,—the ever favourite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labours, and dangers.

Letter to General Lafayette on Trouble with France

MOUNT VERNON, 25 DECEMBER, 1798.

My dear Sir,

* * * * *

To give you a complete view of the politics and situation of things in this country would far exceed the limits of a letter, and to trace effects to their causes would be a work of time. But the sum of them may be given in a few words, and amounts to this. That a party exists in the United States, formed by a combination of causes, which oppose the government in all its measures, and are determined (as all their conduct evinces) by clogging its wheels indirectly to change the nature of it, and to subvert the constitution. To effect this, no means which have a tendency to accomplish their purposes are left unessayed. The friends of government, who are anxious to maintain neutrality, and to preserve the country in peace, and adopt measures to secure these are charged by them as being monarchists, aristocrats, and infractors of the constitution, which, according to their interpretation of it, would be a mere cipher. While they arrogated to themselves (until the eyes of the people began to discover how outrageously they had been treated in their commercial concerns by the Directory of France, and that that was a ground on which they could no longer tread) the sole merit of being the friends of France, when in fact they had no more regard for that nation than for the Grand Turk, further than their own views were promoted by it; denouncing those who differed in opinion, (whose principles are purely American, and whose sole view was to observe a strict neutrality) with acting under British influence, and being directed by her counsels, now with being her pensioners.

This is but a short sketch of what requires much time to illustrate; and is given with no other view, than to show you what would be your situation here at this crisis under such circumstances as it unfolds.

You have expressed a wish, worthy of the benevolence of your heart, that I would exert all my endeavors to avert the calamitous effects of a rupture between our countries. Believe me, my dear friend, that no man can deprecate an event of this sort with more horror than I should, and that no one, during the whole of my administration, labored more incessantly, and with more sincerity and zeal, than I did, to avoid this, and to render every justice, nay favor, to France, consistent with the neutrality, which had been proclaimed, sanctioned by Congress, approved by the State legislatures, and the people at large in their town and county meetings. But neutrality was not the point at which France was aiming; for, whilst it was crying Peace, Peace, and pretending that they did not wish us to be embroiled in their quarrel with Great Britain, they were pursuing measures in this country so repugnant to its sovereignty, and so incompatible with every principle of neutrality, as must inevitably have produced a war with the latter. And when they found, that the government here was resolved to adhere steadily to its plan of neutrality, their next step was to destroy the confidence of the people in and to separate them from it; for which purpose their diplomatic agents were specially instructed, and in the attempt were aided by inimical characters among ourselves, not, as I observed before, because they loved France more than any other nation, but because it was an instrument to facilitate the destruction of their own government.

Hence proceeded those charges, which I have already enumerated, against the friends to peace and order. No doubt remains on this side of the water, that to the representations of, and encouragement given by, these people is to be ascribed, in a great measure, the infractions of our treaty with France; her violation of the laws of nations, disregard of justice, and even of sound policy. But herein they have not only deceived France, but were deceived themselves, as the event has proved; for, no sooner did the yeomanry of this country come to a right understanding of the nature of the dispute, than they rose as one man with a tender of their services, their lives, and their fortunes to support the government of their choice, and to defend their country. This has produced a declaration from them (how sincere let others judge), that, if the French should attempt to invade this country, they themselves would be amongst the foremost to repel the attack.

You add in another place, that the Executive Directory are disposed to accommodation of all differences. If they are sincere in this declaration, let them evidence it by actions; for words unaccompanied therewith will not be much regarded now. I would pledge myself, that the government and people of the United States will meet them heart and hand at fair negotiations; having no wish more ardent, than to live in peace with all the world, provided they are suffered to remain undisturbed in their just rights. Of this, their patience, forbearance, and repeated solicitations under accumulated injuries and insults, are incontestable proofs; but it is not to be inferred from hence, that they suffer any nation under the sun, (while they retain a proper sense of virtue and independence,) to trample upon their rights with impunity, or to direct or influence the internal concerns of their country.

It has been the policy of France, and that of the opposition party among ourselves, to inculcate a belief that all those, who have exerted themselves to keep this country in peace, did it from an overweening attachment to Great Britain. But it is a solemn truth, and you may count upon it, that it is void of foundation, and propagated for no other purpose, than to excite popular clamor against those, whose aim was peace, and whom they wished out of the way.

That there are many among us, who wish to see this country embroiled on the side of Great Britain, and others, who are anxious that we should take part with France against her, admits of no doubt. But it is a fact, on which you may entirely and absolutely rely, that the governing powers of the country and a large part of the people are truly Americans in principle, attached to the interest of it, and unwilling under any circumstances whatsoever to participate in the politics or contests of Europe; much less, since they have found that France, having forsaken the ground she first took, is interfering in the internal concerns of all nations, neutral as well as belligerent, and setting the world in an uproar.

After my Valedictory Address to the people of the United States, you would no doubt be somewhat surprised to hear, that I had again consented to gird on the sword. But, having struggled eight or nine years against the invasion of our rights by one power, and to establish our independence of it, I could not remain an unconcerned spectator of the attempt of another power to accomplish the same object, though in a different way, with less pretensions; indeed, without any at all.

On the politics of Europe I shall express no opinion, nor make any inquiry who is right or who is wrong. I wish well to all nations and to all men. My politics are plain and simple. I think every nation has a right to establish that form of government, under which it conceives it shall live most happy; provided it infracts no right, or is not dangerous to others; and that no governments ought to interfere with the internal concerns of another, except for the security of what is due to themselves.

I sincerely hope, that Madame de Lafayette will accomplish all her wishes in France, and return safe to you with renovated health. I congratulate you on the marriage of your eldest daughter, and beg to be presented to them both and to Virginia in the most respectful and affectionate terms. To George I have written. In all these things Mrs. Washington, as the rest of the family would do if they were at home, most cordially joins me; as she does in wishing you and them every felicity, which this life can afford, as some consolation for your long, cruel, and painful confinement and sufferings.

I shall now only add, what you knew well before, that, with the most sincere friendship and affectionate regard, I am always yours,

P. S. Your old aid de camp—and my worthy nephew George A. Washington; died about five years ago of a pulmonary complaint. He left 3 fine children, a daughter & two sons, the eldest of the boys was called after you.

The letters herewith enclosed and directed one to yourself, another to George and the third to Mr. Frestel, have been some time in my possession and detained to be delivered to you here upon the same principle that prevented me from writing to you at an earlier period.

Washington and the Constitution of the United States

THE correct text of the Federal Constitution and the first ten amendments find a place in the Highlights of the Writings of General George Washington because, though he had little to do with the wording of them, he did have much to do with the formation of them. Washington's Unionism dates back to the French and Indian War, and his insistence upon this is a prominent feature in his writings during the Revolution. He experienced more than any other man the evils of a Congress generally desirous of furnishing him with sufficient men and adequate means to carry on the war efficiently and in accordance with his plans, but with no power to carry out the measures and with no authority to compel the states to do so. Bitterly did Washington see his strategy brought to naught by failure of soldiers and supplies, and bitingly did he sum up the reasons for this when he exclaimed, "One nation to-day and thirteen to-morrow."

With peace came further elements of disintegration; and as in retirement he continued by word, pen, and action to combat this, the practicable character of his statesmanship is admirably illustrated by the fact that he recognized that the issue was primarily an economic one. He promoted commercial conferences between Virginia and Maryland, and recognized that the interstate interests of Delaware and Pennsylvania should be considered. The next step was the Annapolis Convention for a nation-wide conference on commercial welfare, of which he approved. Finally, when this convention, not sufficiently attended to produce results, suggested a more comprehensive gathering, Washington with great reluctance consented to be a delegate from Virginia; and his choice as president of this Federal Convention, which met at Philadelphia on May 25, 1787, was merely the formal recognition of his right of leadership.

We do not know precisely in what manner this leadership was exerted in the Convention. His diary is silent on the subject, and the journal and private notes of debates do not show direct participation in the proceedings, though Luther Martin declared that in committee of the whole Washington advocated a strong centralized government. We do know that the immortal document which the Convention framed was in harmony with his avowed principles and met with his approval, and that his approval was, more than any other fact, the cause of its ratification by the states.

Washington did not consider the document perfect, but pointed out that there was a "constitutional door open for alterations or amendments" if experience should show the need of such changes. He did not approve of amendment as a condition of ratification; but when many of the states made recommendations intended to prevent Congress from usurping power or adopting tyrannous measures, Washington in his inaugural address said: "It will remain with your judgment to decide, how far an exercise of the occasional power delegated by the fifth article of the Constitution is rendered expedient at the present juncture by the nature of objections which have been urged against the system, or by the degree of inquietude which has given birth to them. Instead of undertaking particular recom-mentations on this subject, in which I could be guided by no lights derived from official opportunities, I shall again give way to my entire confidence in your discernment and pursuit of the public good; for I assure myself, that, whilst you carefully avoid every alteration, which might endanger the benefits of a united and effective government, or which ought to await the future lessons of experience; a reverence for the characteristic rights of freemen, and a regard for the public harmony, will sufficiently influence your deliberations on the question, how far the former can be more impregably fortified, or the latter be safely and advantageously promoted." Following this suggestion, the first ten amendments, which became a part of the Constitution on November 3, 1791, are merely a bill of rights that does not diminish the powers granted to Congress.

This copy of the Federal Constitution has been carefully compared with the original manuscript in order to assure accuracy. As it is included here as a Washington document, the amendments after he ceased to be President of the United States are omitted.

The Constitution of the United States

We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

Article. I.

Section. 1. All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

Section. 2. The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second Year by the People of the several States, and the Electors in each State shall have the Qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous Branch of the State Legislature.

No Person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the Age of twenty five Years, and been seven Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

Representatives and direct Taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective Numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole Number of free Persons, including those bound to Service for a Term of Years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other Persons. The actual Enumeration shall be made within three Years after the first Meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent Term of ten Years, in such Manner as they shall by Law direct. The Number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty Thousand, but each State shall have at Least one Representative; and until such enumeration shall be made, the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to chuse three, Massachusetts eight, Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New-York six, New Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North Carolina five, South Carolina five, and Georgia three.

When vacancies happen in the Representation from any State, the Executive Authority thereof shall issue Writs of Election to fill such Vacancies.

The House of Representatives shall chuse their Speaker and other Officers; and shall have the sole Power of Impeachment.

Section. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six Years; and each Senator shall have one Vote.

Immediately after they shall be assembled in Consequence of the first Election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three Classes. The Seats of the Senators of the first Class shall be vacated at the Expiration of the second Year, of the second Class at the Expiration of the fourth Year, and of the third Class at the Expiration of the sixth Year, so that one third may be chosen every second Year; and if Vacancies happen by Resignation, or otherwise, during the Recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary Appointments until the next Meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such Vacancies.

No Person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty Years, and been nine Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

The Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no Vote, unless they be equally divided.

The Senate shall chuse their other Officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the Absence of the Vice President, or when he shall exercise the Office of President of the United States.

The Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments. When sitting for that Purpose, they shall be on Oath or Affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: And no Person shall be convicted without the Concurrence of two thirds of the Members present.

Judgment in Cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust or Profit under the United States: but the Party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment, according to Law.

Section. 4. The Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by Law make or alter such Regulations, except as to the Places of chusing Senators.

The Congress shall assemble at least once in every Year, and such Meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by Law appoint a different Day.

Section. 5. Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of its own Members, and a Majority of each shall constitute a Quorum to do Business; but a smaller Number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the Attendance of absent Members, in such Manner, and under such Penalties as each House may provide.

Each House may determine the Rules of its Proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly Behaviour, and, with the Concurrence of two thirds, expel a Member.

Each House shall keep a Journal of its Proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such Parts as may in their Judgment require Secrecy; and the Yeas and Nays of the Members of either House on any question shall, at the Desire of one fifth of those Present, be entered on the Journal.

Neither House, during the Session of Congress, shall, without the Consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other Place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

Section. 6. The Senators and Representatives shall receive a Compensation for their Services, to be ascertained by Law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States. They shall in all Cases, except Treason, Felony and Breach of the Peace, be privileged from Arrest during their Attendance at the Session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any Speech or Debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other Place.

No Senator or Representative shall, during the Time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil Office under the Authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the Emoluments whereof shall have been encreased during such time; and no Person holding any Office under the United States, shall be a Member of either House during his Continuance in Office.

Section. 7. All Bills for raising Revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with Amendments as on other Bills.

Every Bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a Law, be presented to the President of the United States; If he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his Objections to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the Objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such Reconsideration two thirds of that House shall agree to pass the Bill, it shall be sent, together with the Objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two thirds of that House, it shall become a Law: But in all such Cases the Votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and Nays, and the Names of the Persons voting for and against the Bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House respectively. If any Bill shall not be returned by the President within ten Days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the Same shall be a Law, in like Manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their Adjournment prevent its Return, in which Case it shall not be a Law.

Every Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of Adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the Same shall take Effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the Rules and Limitations prescribed in the Case of a Bill.

Section. 8. The Congress shall have Power To lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States; but all Duties, Imposts and Excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;

To exercise exclusive Legislation in all Cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding ten Miles square) as may, by Cession of particular States, and the Acceptance of Congress, become the Seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like Authority over all Places purchased by the Consent of the Legislature of the State in which the Same shall be, for the Erection of Forts, Magazines, Arsenals, dock-Yards, and other needful Buildings;—And

To make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof.

Section. 9. The Migration or Importation of such Persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the Year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a Tax or duty may be imposed on such Importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each Person.

No Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law; and a regular Statement and Account of the Receipts and Expenditures of all public Money shall be published from time to time.

No Title of Nobility shall be granted by the United States: And no Person holding any Office of Profit or Trust under them, shall, without the Consent of the Congress, accept of any present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State.

Section. 10. into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.

Article. II.

Section. 1. The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same Term, be elected as follows

Each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, equal to the whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or Person holding an Office of Trust or Profit under the United States, shall be appointed an Elector.

The Electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by Ballot for two Persons, of whom one at least shall not be an Inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And they shall make a List of all the Persons voted for, and of the Number of Votes for each; which List they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the Seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the Presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the Certificates, and the Votes shall then be counted. The Person having the greatest Number of Votes shall be the President, if such Number be a Majority of the whole Number of Electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such Majority, and have an equal Number of Votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately chuse by Ballot one of them for President; and if no Person have a Majority, then from the five highest on the List the said House shall in like Manner chuse the President. But in chusing the President, the Votes shall be taken by States, the Representation from each State having one Vote; A quorum for this Purpose shall consist of a Member or Members from two thirds of the States, and a Majority of all the States shall be necessary to a Choice. In every Case, after the Choice of the President, the Person having the greatest Number of Votes of the Electors shall be the Vice President. But if there should remain two or more who have equal Votes, the Senate shall chuse from them by Ballot the Vice President.

The Congress may determine the Time of chusing the Electors, and the Day on which they shall give their Votes; which Day shall be the same throughout the United States.

No Person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States, at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the Office of President; neither shall any Person be eligible to that Office who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty five Years, and been fourteen Years a Resident within the United States.

In Case of the Removal of the President from Office, or of his Death, Resignation, or Inability to discharge the Powers and Duties of the said Office, the Same shall devolve on the Vice President, and the Congress may by Law provide for the Case of Removal, Death, Resignation or Inability, both of the President and Vice President, declaring what Officer shall then act as President, and such Officer shall act accordingly, until the Disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

The President shall, at stated Times, receive for his Services, a Compensation, which shall neither be encreased nor diminished during the Period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that Period any other Emolument from the United States, or any of them.

Before he enter on the Execution of his Office, he shall take the following Oath or Affirmation:—"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the Office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my Ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States."

Section. 2. The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The President shall have Power to fill up all Vacancies that may happen during the Recess of the Senate, by granting Commissions which shall expire at the End of their next Session.

Section. 3. He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

Section. 4. The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

Article III.

Section. 1. The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Section. 2. The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls,—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State;—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

The Trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by Jury; and such Trial shall be held in the State where the said Crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the Trial shall be at such Place or Places as the Congress may by Law have directed.

Section. 3. Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying War against them, or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort. No Person shall be convicted of Treason unless on the Testimony of two Witnesses to the same overt Act, or on Confession in open Court.

The Congress shall have Power to declare the Punishment of Treason, but no Attainder of Treason shall work Corruption of Blood, or Forfeiture except during the Life of the Person attainted.

Article. IV.

Section. 1. Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof.

Section. 2. The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

No Person held to Service or Labour in one State, under the Laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in Consequence of any Law or Regulation therein, be discharged from such Service or Labour, but shall be delivered up on Claim of the Party to whom such Service or Labour may be due.

Section. 3. New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

The Congress shall have Power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to Prejudice any Claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

Section. 4. The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government, and shall protect each of them against Invasion; and on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic Violence.

Article. V.

The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of it's equal Suffrage in the Senate.

Article. VI.

The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution; but no religious Test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States.

THE
“OLIVE BRANCH” PETITION TO KING GEORGE III
FROM THE
SECOND CONTINENTAL CONGRESS
JULY 8, 1775

INTRODUCTION

THE "Olive Branch" Petition sent by the Continental Congress to King George III in July, 1775, is a valuable historic document. It was sent to England because of the feeling in the colonies that unless some final effort was made at reconciliation with the Mother Country, the middle colonies could not be aroused to action.

While it is couched in most respectful, even humble, language, it yet shows the determination of the people of the colonies to uphold their rights. By some it was considered as the final gesture of the people of this country to avoid war, which even then was considered by others as inevitable.

The document belongs with the other petitions and addresses of the early Congress, the failure of which left the way clear for the Declaration of Independence—an essential preliminary of that great state paper and referred to in it. This signed duplicate of the original petition has recently come to light, and was brought to the United States, the original petition being still preserved in the Public Record Office in London. It is certified by comparison with the original and is now presented as properly belonging to the history of our country. It has been duly authenticated by the historians of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission as a genuine document; and though it is not one of Washington's writings or unknown, the rediscovery of this duplicate makes opportune its inclusion in the historical material issued by this Commission.

SOL BLOOM.

A Study of the “Olive Branch” Petition

The “Olive Branch” petition, manuscript document, seven pages, folio, undated, but July 8, 1775, signed by John Hancock and forty-five other Members of the Second Continental Congress. To the King’s Most excellent Majesty. Stitched with old blue tape and enclosed in a polished Cambridge calf box, silk-lined, with protecting moiré silk covers. On the front cover of the box are the Fitzwilliam Arms.

This is practically the last official effort of the United Colonies to head off the American Revolution. Lexington, Concord, and Bunker Hill had already been fought. The second Continental Congress had assembled in Philadelphia, to decide what should be done next. On June 10, 1775, John Adams, of Massachusetts, delegate to Congress wrote his friend, Moses Gill, in Cambridge:

“I find the general sense abroad is, to prepare for a vigorous defensive war, but at the same time to keep open the door of reconciliation; to hold the sword in one hand and the olive branch in the other.”

Here is the “Olive Branch”—autographed by forty-six Members of Congress. Twenty-five of these forty-six also signed the Declaration of Independence a year later. Moreover, many of the “Olive Branch” signers who did not sign the Declaration are as important as those who affixed their autographs to the independence document. Patrick Henry, the orator of the Revolution; John Jay, first Chief Justice of the United States; Silas Deane, the first American diplomat; Robert R. Livingston, who officiated at the first inaugural of George Washington as President—all signed the “Olive Branch” but not the Declaration.

But what was the “Olive Branch?” The First Continental Congress met in 1774, and adopted a petition to the King, wherein it blamed all the trouble on the ministers of George III, and begged His Majesty to call them off before it was too late. The King gave little heed—and the result was seen at Lexington on the 19th of April, 1775. The Second Continental Congress met at Philadelphia on May 10, 1775, and adopted a “Declaration of the Causes of taking up Arms,” which it addressed to the people of Great Britain. Yet the colonies were not ripe for independence. Only nine months before, George Washington himself had said that no thinking man in all North America desired independence. It was not yet assured that the colony of Georgia would join in the general revolt. The conservative business men of two leading commercial cities, New York and Philadelphia, were by no means sure they wanted to make the final decision of war. Therefore, the Second Continental Congress drew up a second petition to the King, again requesting him to call off his minions.

Such a paper has far more significance than its importance in the history of the United States. The supreme problem of politics for a thousand years has been how to mediate between the claim of complete independence and the obvious fact that no nation can live unto itself alone. The lack of a political formula which will allow a nation political autonomy, yet prevent it from hurting its neighbors, underlies most of the wars of modern times—and many of the revolutions. Ireland, Poland, Manchuria, South Africa, India, and the Philippines are but a few of the states involved in this problem. In all truth it is the same problem which confronts the greater states. France and her “honor;” Italy and her “fascismo;” Russia and her “communism;” Germany and her “Deutschtum”—all the way down to California and her “immigration problem”—all these ought to be “internal problems,” if they did not constantly involve external difficulties. It is becoming increasingly difficult to draw any line between dependence and independence.

Now, among the most effective political thinkers who saw that problem as a problem were our Revolutionary ancestors. They did not want to break up the British Empire. They wanted political and economic autonomy within the British Empire. Lord Chatham spoke better than he knew, when he said that in ability and sagacity the Congress at Philadelphia was the equal of any similar assembly in history. These Americans were boldly attacking the supreme problem of politics, and in their many writings they made a contribution to the subject, the significance of which we are only just beginning to appreciate. The “Olive Branch” was the last effort of those who said, as they had said before, that what they wanted for America was dominion self government. Because they could not make the King of England understand that they would be loyal to him but wanted no truck with his Parliament, they cut the Gordian knot, and finally declared independence. But the Declaration of Independence was a confession of failure—failure to solve the great problem of politics. Therefore, this “Olive Branch” may be presented as a document of equal, if not greater, historical importance than the great Declaration of a year later.

Who wrote the “Olive Branch?” The first petition to the King of 1774, the Declaration of the Causes of taking up Arms, and the second petition to the King (the “Olive Branch”) were all three the products of that “penman of the Revolution,” John Dickinson, of Pennsylvania, author of the famous “Farmer’s Letters.” Two historians have attempted to disprove this general statement, because Jefferson had some hand in the Declaration of the Causes of taking up Arms. Both historians burned their fingers. It is of considerable interest that John Marshall and George Bancroft had publicly to retract their doubts about Dickinson’s claim to the authorship. As to the “Olive Branch”—we have Jefferson’s own evidence that Dickinson was solely responsible for writing it, and that an indulgent Congress adopted it very largely because of the respect they had for Dickinson’s opinions.

What is the history of the document? The Journals of Congress record that it was ordered engrossed and signed on July 8, 1775. John Adams records on July 10, “A petition was sent yesterday by Mr. Richard Penn in one ship and a Duplicate goes in another Ship this day.” When Penn reached London, he associated with him Arthur Lee, and the two waited on Lord Dartmouth, at the Colonial Office. His Lordship was down in the country. On August 21, Penn and Lee sent Dartmouth a “copy” by post, saying that they retained the “original” to present to the King. This “copy” was probably not the one which came over in John Adams’ “another Ship,” but that which is still in Lord Dartmouth’s family archives at Patshull. From the description given by the Historical Manuscripts Commission, it is apparently unsigned. It was not until September 1 that Penn and Lee were able to hand the “original” to Dartmouth, by whom they were told that “as His Majesty did not receive it upon the throne, no answer would be given.” George III is on record as giving a general refusal to receive any communications from any congress in America. Moreover, he may have been a little embarrassed by this one, because Penn and Lee appeared with it at the same time that he was delivering his own bloodthirsty proclamation on rebellion.

Of course, the “Olive Branch” was good American propaganda, as demonstrating the intense sincerity of the colonists. Many contemporary unsigned manuscript copies were made, which is the reason one finds them in the Archives des Affaires Etrangères at Paris, in the Rijks-Archiv at The Hague, and in the Archives at both Madrid and Simancas. The "original" signed copy delivered to Dartmouth is probably that in the Public Record Office, Chancery Lane, London. An excellent facsimile of the Record Office copy has been prepared by Mr. B. F. Stevens in his famous series, "Facsimiles of Manuscripts in European Archives relating to America, 1773 to 1783," and is now in the Library of Congress.

Up to the present time one might have been justified in assuming that the only surviving signed copy of the "Olive Branch" was that preserved in the Public Record Office. Whence, then, this second signed copy? John Adams' remark doubtless supplies the answer. In those days it was often necessary to prepare more than one copy of an important document, forwarding the duplicate or triplicate by different carriers to avoid loss at sea or in war. When Major Henry Gladwin was being besieged by Pontiac at Detroit, he sometimes sent the same letter by three different carriers, and there are instances where only the third signed copy reached its destination.

The present signed copy of the "Olive Branch" has recently been discovered at Milton, near Peterborough, in England. Milton was the country seat of the second Earl Fitzwilliam, a nephew of the second Marquis of Rockingham. Rockingham was a well-known Whig leader and an advocate of conciliation with America. When Cornwallis surrendered at Yorktown, it was Rockingham whom the King called to succeed Lord North and save the British Empire. Rockingham might well have had this paper given to him. He had no direct heirs, and his estates went to Earl Fitzwilliam. Later, the Earls Fitzwilliam moved, with most of their papers, to Rockingham's country estate in Yorkshire. This paper may have been left for the branch of the family which retained Milton.

There is another possibility. Edmund Burke was also a great friend of the colonies and at the time was acting as agent for New York. When Congress sent Richard Penn to England, it instructed him to associate with him the other colonial agents—hence Arthur Lee's participation. Burke was asked to be present with Penn and Lee when they presented the petition, but he declined on the ground that he had no definite instructions from the colony of New York. It is, however, altogether possible that Penn and Lee turned this second signed copy over to Burke. At all events, Burke was at this time closely associated with both Rockingham and the second Earl Fitzwilliam—so intimate was he with the latter that at Burke's death, Mrs. Burke turned most of Burke's papers over to Earl Fitzwilliam. Which of these explanations is correct, or whether some third story of the document's provenance will yet be worked out, it is at present difficult to say. At all events the signed copy of the "Olive Branch" was found at Milton, by its present owner, Mr. George C. W. Fitzwilliam.

That there is nothing unusual about this copy's having found its way to private hands may be seen by the fact that Benjamin Franklin himself kept the second signed copy of the first Petition to the King of 1774. It was found among the Franklin papers by Henry Stevens of Vermont. This copy of the 1774 petition is now in the Library of Congress, but only because the Library bought it from Mr. Stevens.

Who signed the "Olive Branch"? This question is best answered in the following tabulated form. Because of the variety of terms then used to designate the various colonial assemblies, the word "legislature" is here used to mean the supreme legislative body of both colonies and states. The modern name of colleges and universities is employed. All these men were, of course, members of the Second Continental Congress. At least seventeen members of the Congress did not sign the "Olive Branch"—and for a variety of reasons. General George Washington of Virginia had already gone to take command of the army at Cambridge, and with him went Thomas Mifflin of Pennsylvania as a member of his staff. General John Sullivan of New Hampshire was commanding his brigade outside of Boston. George Clinton and General Philip Schuyler of New York were busy organizing the defences of the state. Richard Caswell and Robert Goldsborough were absent on official business connected with the new constitutional organization of their respective states of North Carolina and Maryland. Peyton Randolph of Virginia was ill. Lyman Hall of the Parish of St. Johns, in Georgia, could not sign, as his state had not yet properly accredited its delegation to Congress.

Charles Humphrey of Pennsylvania, Henry Middleton and Edward Rutledge of South Carolina signed the Public Record Office copy of the "Olive Branch" but not this copy.

A word should be said about John Dickinson, whose reputation at this time was so great as to compel the adoption of the "Olive Branch." A year later he suffered an eclipse by declining to vote for independence—but when most of the Signers of the Declaration affixed their autographs, Colonel John Dickinson was absent from Congress because he was commanding his regiment of Pennsylvania troops against Sir William Howe near Elizabeth, New Jersey. That was not exactly timidity, at any rate.

Yet the "Olive Branch" ought not to be considered merely because of the Signers it contains. Its historic importance should in no way be subordinated to that of the Declaration of Independence. Since George III would not receive what John Adams called the olive branch, there was no alternative for the people of America but to take up the sword which Adams noted was being carried in the other hand. Years later, in 1807, John Dickinson wrote: "After the rejection [of this petition], not a syllable, to my recollection, was ever uttered in favor of reconciliation with Great Britain."

THE CONTINENTAL CONGRESS IN SESSION

After a painting by Robert Edge Pine and Edward Savage. Now in Independence Hall, Philadelphia.

To the Kings most excellent Majesty

Most gracious Sovereign,

We your Majesty's faithful subjects of the colonies of New-hampshire, Massachusetts-bay, Rhode-island and Providence plantations, Connecticut, & New-York, New-Jersey, Pennsylvania, the counties of New-Castle Kent & Sussex on Delaware, & Maryland, Virginia, North-Carolina and South Carolina in behalf of ourselves and the inhabitants of these colonies, who have deputed us to represent them in general Congress, entreat your Majesty's gracious attention to this our humble petition.

The union between our Mother Country and these colonies, and the energy of mild and just government, produced benefits so remarkably important and afforded such an assurance of their permanency and increase, that the wonder and envy of other Nations were excited, while they beheld Great-Britain rising to a power the most extraordinary the world had ever known.

Her rivals observing, that there was no probability of this happy connection being broken by civil dissensions, and apprehending its future effects if left any longer undisturbed, resolved to prevent her receiving such continual and formidable accretions of wealth and strength, by checking the growth of those settlements from which they were to be derived

In the prosecution of this attempt, events so unfavourable to the design took place, that every friend to the interests of Great Britain and these colonies entertained pleasing and reasonable expectations of seeing an additional force and extention immediately given to the operations of the union hitherto experienced, by an enlargement of the dominions of the crown, and the removal of ancient and warlike enemies to a greater distance

At the conclusion therefore of the late war, the most glorious and advantageous that ever had been achieved on by British arms, your loyal colonists having contributed to its success, by such repeated and strenuous exertions, as frequently procured them the distinguished approbation of your Majesty, of the late king, and of parliament doubted not, but that they should be permitted with the rest of the empire, to share in the blessings of peace and the emoluments of victory and conquest.

While these recent and honorable acknowledgments of their merits remained on record in the journals and acts of that august legislature the parliament, undefaced by the imputation or even the suspicion of any offence, they were alarmed by a new system of statutes and regulations adopted for the administration of the colonies, that filled their minds with the most painful fears & jealousies; and to their unexpressible astonishment, perceived the dangers of a foreign quarrel quickly succeeded by domestic dangers, in their judgment of a more dreadful kind.

Nor were their anxieties alleviated by any tendency in this system to promote the welfare of their Mother country:

For

For tho' its effects were more immediately felt by them, yet its influence appeared to be injurious to the commerce and prosperity of Great Britain .

We shall decline the ungrateful task of describing the various variety of artifices practised by many of your Majesty's ministers, the delusive pretences, fruitless terrors, and unavailing severities, that have from time to time been dealt out by them in their attempts to execute this impolitic plan, or of tracing thro' a series of years past the progress of the unhappy differences between Great Britain and these colonies, that have flowed from this fatal source .

Your Majesty's ministers, persevering in their measures and proceeding to open hostilities for enforcing them, have compelled us to arm in our ^{own} defence, and have engaged us in a controversy so peculiarly abhorrent to the affections of your still faithful colonists, that when we consider whom we must oppose in this contest, and if it continues what may be the consequences, our own particular misfortunes are accounted by us, only as parts of our distress .

Knowing, to what violent resentments and incurable animosities, civil discords are apt to exasperate and inflame the contending parties, we think ourselves required by indispensable obligations to Almighty God, to your Majesty, to our fellow subjects, and to ourselves, immediately to use all the means in our power not incompatible with our safety, for stopping the further effusion of blood, and for averting the impending calamities that threaten the British empire .

Thus

Thus called upon to address your Majesty on af-fairs of such moment to America, and probably to all your dominions, we are earnestly desirous of per-forming this office with the utmost deference for your Majesty; and we therefore pray, that your royal mag-nanimity and benevolence may make the most favourable construction of our expressions on so uncommon an oc-casion. Could we represent in their full force the sentiments that agitate the minds of us your dutiful subjects, we are persuaded, your Majesty would ascribe any seeming deviation from reverence, in our lan-guage, and even in our conduct, not to any reprehensible intention, but to the impossibility of reconciling the usual appearances of respect with a just attenti-on to our own preservation against those artful and cruel enemies, who abuse your royal confidence and authority for the purpose of effecting our destruc-tion.

Attached to your Majesty's person, family and government with all the devotion that principle and affection can inspire, connected with Great Bri-tain by the strongest ties that can unite societies, and deploring every event that tends in any degree to weak-en them, we solemnly assure your Majesty, that we not only most ardently desire the former harmony between her and these colonies may be restored, but that a concord may be established between them upon so firm a basis, as to perpetuate its blessings uninterrupted by any future dissensions to succeeding generations in both countries, and to transmit your Majesty's name to posterity adorned with that signal and lasting glory that has attended the memory of those illustrious person-
 -ages, whose virtues and abilities have extricated states from dangerous convulsions, and by securing happi-ness to others have erected the most noble and durable monuments to their own fame.

We

We beg leave further to assure your Majesty, that notwithstanding the sufferings of your loyal colonists during the course of the present controversy, our breasts retain too tender a regard for the kingdom from which we derive our origin, to request such a reconciliation, as might in any manner be inconsistent with her dignity or her welfare. These, related as we are to her, honor & duty, as well as inclination induce us to support and advance; and the apprehensions that now oppress our hearts with unspeakable grief, being once removed, your Majesty will find your faithful subjects on this continent, ready and willing at all times, as they ever have been, with their lives and fortunes to assert and maintain the rights and interests of your Majesty and of our Mother country.

We therefore beseech your Majesty, that your royal authority and influence may be graciously interposed to procure us relief from our afflicting fears and jealousies occasioned by the system before mentioned, and to settle peace thro' every part of your dominions, with all humility submitting to your Majesty's wise consideration, whether it may not be expedient for facilitating those important purposes, that your Majesty be pleased to direct some mode by which the united applications of your faithful colonists to the throne in pursuance of their common councils may be improved into a happy and permanent reconciliation; and that in the mean time, measures be taken for preventing the further destruction of the lives of your Majesty's subjects; and that such statutes as more immediately distress any of your Majesty's colonies be repealed: For by such arrangements as your Majesty's wisdom can form, for collecting the united sense of your American people, we are convinced, your Majesty would receive such satisfactory proofs of the disposition of the colonists towards their sovereign and the parent State, that the wished for opportunity would be restored to them, of evincing the sincerity of their professions by every testimony of devotion becoming the most dutiful subjects and the most affectionate colonists

That your Majesty may enjoy a long & prosperous reign, and that your descendants may govern your dominions with honor to themselves and happiness to their subjects is our sincere and fervent prayer.

WASHINGTON THE NATION-BUILDER

BICENTENNIAL POEM

Written especially for the CELEBRATION OF THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF GEORGE WASHINGTON

By

EDWIN MARKHAM

Author of "The Man With the Hoe"

A Spartan mother called him into Time,
And kindled duty in him as a flame;
While he was schooled by the primeval hills
Of old Virginia—schooled by her mighty woods,
Where Indians war-whooped and the wild beast prowled.
His name was written on no college scroll;
But he drank wisdom from the wilderness.
The mountains poured into his soul their strength,
The rocks their fortitude, the stars their calm.

He grew a silent man;
Yet carried on all roads
The lofty courtesies, the high reserves.
He seemed to know, even in this noise of time,
The solemn quiet of Eternity.
But fiery energy, a live crater, slept
Under that mountain calm; yet never blazed
Into a passion, save in some black hour
When craven souls betrayed the people. Then
He was all sword and flame, a god in arms.

With the heart of a child, the wisdom of a sage,
He toiled with no self to serve.
He grew in greatness, year by luminous year
Until he carried empire in his brain.
Yet if no Cause, no high commanding Cause,
Had called him to the hazard of the deed,
None would have guessed his power
To build a nation out of chaos, give
To her the wings of soaring destinies.
But at the Hour, the People knew their Man,
The one ordained of Heaven, ordained to stand
In the deadly breach and hold the gate for God.

And when the Scroll was signed and the glad Bell
Of Independence echoed round the world,
He led his tattered host on stubborn fields,
Barefoot and hungry, thru the ice and mire—
Thru dolours, valors, desperations, dreams—
Thru Valley Forge on to world-startling hours
When proud Cornwallis yielded up his sword.
And all the way, down to the road's last bend,
Cool Judgment whispered to his listening mind.
Where there was faltering, he was there as faith;
Where there was weakness, he was there as strength;
Where there was discord, he was there as peace.

His trust was in the Ruler of Events—
In Him who watches. He could say, "The ends
Are in God's hand. I trust,
But while I trust I battle." In this creed,
His soul took refuge and his heart found rest,
When, after Yorktown, all the guns were husht,
Still was our Chieftain on a battle line,
Fighting old laws, old manners, old beliefs.
He fought the outworn old,
And lit new torches for the march ahead.

Life tried his soul by all the tests of time—
By hardship, treachery, ingratitude;
Yes, even by victory and the loud applause.
When fortune flung to him a crown, he flung
The bauble back and followed the People's dream.
He turned from all the tempters,
Stood firm above the perils of success—
Stood like Monadnock high above the clouds.

He did the day's work that was given him;
He toiled for men until he flamed with God.
Now in his greatness, ever superbly lone,
He moves in his serene eternity,
Like far Polaris wheeling on the North.
